[1] The next ground of the motion for a new trial is that the court refused the defendant a continuance upon the following showing: The defendant testified that he was arrested and was required to sign two appearance bonds, one for his appearance before the recorder of the city of Augusta on the charge of violating the city ordinance as to keeping liquor on hand for illegal sale, the other for his appearance at the city court on the charge of violating the state prohibition law; that he understood that his trial before the recorder was for the purpose of determining not only as to violation of the city ordinance, but also as to whether there was sufficient evidence to bind him over to the city court, the recorder being also a committing officer; that the trial before the recorder resulted in his dismissal, and he was under the impression that this dismissal carried with it a dismissal of the state charge; that at the March term of the city court, at which the motion for a continuance was made, he looked over a list of the cases assigned for that term, published in one of the daily newspapers of the city, and his case was not listed there; that he was notified the day before the trial that his case would come up about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and he immediately employed counsel to defend him; that "there was a witness, Annie Spires, in Columbia county, Ga., who was present on the Sunday that John Bird contended that he bought whisky from defendant, and who would have testified that defendant sold no whisky, but he had not had an opportunity to procure said witness at the present trial, and had not had an opportunity to prepare his defense." The defendant's counsel stated that he could not safely go to trial, owing to the fact that he was employed the day before in the afternoon, and had not had an opportunity to examine the witnesses. Although the accusation had been drawn a week before the trial, and the case had been assigned for trial, the solicitor did not sign the accusation until the night before the trial. It was testified that the defendant's bondsman had been notified several days before the case came up for trial that it would be tried. The defendant denied that he had received notice from his bondsman, but it is stated that "his bondsman had called up his place and stated that said case would be tried on the 14th of April, and told his clerk, who notified defendant." The trial was on the 20th of April. The warrant on which the accusation was based was sworn out on the 20th of February, and its issuance was immediately followed by his arrest and the giving of the bond by which he obligated himself to appear at the March term of the court to answer this charge. There was no abuse of discretion in refusing a continuance on this state of facts. "The party making an application for a continuance must show that he has used due diligence." Penal Code 1910, § 991. It can hardly be seriously contended that this defendant used due diligence, when, instead of regarding the requirement of his appearance bond and making due inquiry as to his case in the state court, he assumed that he was relieved from any further duty in the matter by the dismissal of a different charge against him in a municipal court and by the fact that the recorder did not bind him over upon a charge which he had already given bond to answer in the state court, or that he was entitled to rely upon a newspaper report which did not mention his case in giving a list of cases assigned for trial, especially when "his bondsman had called up his place and stated that said case would be tried on the 14th of April," which date was six days before the date of the trial, "and told his clerk, who notified defendant." It was his own fault if his counsel did not have sufficient time to prepare his defense. Moreover, it appears that after the employment of counsel, there was a part of a day, a night, and until 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the next day, in which to prepare for trial. It does not appear that his counsel was ill or occupied with other cases. The witnesses were few, and there is nothing to indicate that in the development of the facts anything would have been gained for the defendant by delay, or that he was not as well defended as he would have been if a postponement had been granted. Only one of his witnesses was absent, and the statement that he "had not had an opportunity to procure said witness at the present trial" falls short of the showing required by Penal Code 1910, § 987. Besides, it seems that her testimony would have been of merely negative character, and would have related to but one sale, and the case was abundantly made out by proof as to other sales and as to the keeping of liquor. Injury to the accused must clearly appear before a reversal will be granted for refusal to postpone. Hightower v. State, 9 Ga. App. 236, 70 S. E. 1022.

[3] It is complained that the court erred in admitting testimony of Britt, a police officer, as follows: "Gus Hughes and Felix Apperson brought that whisky to me at the police headquarters. I have tasted pretty near all kinds of gin, and it is intoxicating. I gave Gus Hughes $1 to see if he could buy some whisky. He remained away probably three-quarters of an hour or an hour, when he returned and brought me that bottle of whisky and another bottle half full." The sole objection made to this testimony was that "any sayings had out of the presence of the defendant would not be binding upon the defendant, and were hearsay." This testimony, however, does not give any sayings; and it was clearly admissible in connection with the testimony of Gus Hughes as to his having delivered to this witness whisky which he had bought from the defendant with $1 which had been given to him by the witness for that purpose.

[4] The allowance of a leading question, as to which complaint is made in the sixth ground of the motion for a new trial, was a matter within the discretion of the trial judge.

John Bird testified to a sale of whisky by the defendant to one Stetson on "the 20th of last February." This testimony was objected to (1) because it was not offered until after the state had made out its main case and rested, and the defendant had put in his evidence, and it was not in rebuttal, but related to a separate criminal transaction from the one made out in the main case; and (2) because it was irrelevant, the date of the warrant being the 20th of February, and it being incumbent on the state to show that the sale occurred prior to the issuing of the warrant.

[5] Reopening the case for the reception of additional evidence was discretionary with the court; and the defendant was not surprised by this testimony, for a postponement of the case had been asked before the trial began, in order to procure a witness to rebut it.

[6] As to the date of the sale, the witness testified positively that the day was Sunday. The calendar shows that the 20th of February was on Monday. The jury were authorized to believe that he was correct as to the day of the week and in error as to the day of the month; that is, that the date of this sale was the 19th, instead of the 20th. The judge instructed them that they could not consider any sale occurring after the swearing out of the warrant.

[7] There is no merit in the contention that the statute forbidding the expression or intimation of an opinion by the court as to the facts, in charging the jury, was violated by the statement, "that makes the crime complete," etc., in the following instruction: "If you find that he carried on any mercantile business or carried on a 'near beer' establishment, and that he had prohibited liquors at his 'near beer' saloon, then he would be guilty of violating the law, even if there is no evidence of a sale or giving away. That makes the crime complete—having it at his place of business." Reading in connection with its immediate context the extract from the instructions of the court on the effect of evidence of good character, it is not subject to the objection made in the motion for a new trial. Besides, there was no evidence on which to base a charge on this subject.

There is no other ground requiring a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

WILKES v. GROOVER et al.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. DEEDS (§ 144) — CONSTRUCTION — CONDITION SUBSEQUENT OR LIMITATION.

An owner of land conveyed it by warranty deed to his grandson, upon the expressed consideration of natural love and affection "and in consideration of support and maintenance of the said [grantor] and his wife." The deed contained this clause: "It is further provided herein that should the said [grantee] voluntarily refuse and fail to care for and maintain the said [grantor] and his wife, that that fact will cancel, annul, and void this deed." Held, that the provision as to avoidance created a condition subsequent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 469, 470, 472; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

2. DEEDS (§§ 165, 166*) — CONDITION SUBSEQUENT — WAIVER.

The grantor having survived his wife, if the grantee did not comply with the condition as to maintenance, the grantor had the right to enter and repossess himself of the land, if he saw fit to do so. But he could waive such right; and, if he accepted such partial support as was given as being a compliance and waived a forfeiture, after his death, his administrator could not recover the land from the grantee.

3. TRIAL (§ 255*) — INSTRUCTIONS — NECESSITY FOR REQUEST.

The exceptions as to failure to charge, in the absence of requests, are without merit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 627-641; Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 273*) — PRESENTING QUESTIONS IN TRIAL COURT — RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE.

An exception that the court did not rule out certain evidence, without showing what objection was made thereto when offered, furnishes no ground for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1620-1680, 1764; Dec. Dig. § 273.* Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 256, 257, 689, 690, 694-696.]

5. WITNESSES (§ 159*) — COMPETENCY — TESTIMONY AS TO TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT.

Where a deed was made which contained the provision stated in the first headnote above, and, after the death of the grantor, his administrator filed a petition against the grantee, alleging that the latter had voluntarily failed and refused to care for and maintain the grantor and his wife and seeking to have the deed canceled, and to recover possession of the premises with mesne profits and damages on account of the cutting and removing of timber therefrom, the grantee was not a competent witness to testify as to what care and maintenance he had furnished to the grantor.

Error from Superior Court, Liberty County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Action by A. C. Wilkes, administrator, against James J. Groover and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

L. L. Thomas, of Glennville, and Hines & Jordan, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Way & Burkhalter, of Reidsville, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. [1] The provision contained in the deed, and which is set out in the first headnote, created a condition subsequent, not a limitation. Shannon v. Fuller, 20 Ga. 566; Moss v. Chappell, 126 Ga. 196 (5), 54 S. E. 968, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 398; Civil Code, § 3717.

[2] If the grantee voluntarily failed or refused to comply with such condition in the deed, the grantor had a right of re-entry for condition broken. He was not obliged to declare a forfeiture or to re-enter. The evidence tended to show at least some degree of care and maintenance furnished to him and his wife. If it was not a full compliance with the obligation resting upon the grantee, the grantor could, if he chose, accept it as a sufficient compliance and waive the forfeiture. It cannot be declared, however, as an arbitrary rule that the mere failure of the grantor to re-enter or to bring suit before his death amounted to a waiver. By way of illustration, if in such a case the grantor became insane or imbecile, or was upon a lingering bed of sickness before his death, his failure to take action might not evidence an intention to waive a breach of the condition. The mere fact that the grantor did not bring suit before his death is not conclusive evidence of a waiver. But if he did waive any breach of condition that might have existed, his waiver would bind his administrator and his heirs. If he did not waive any breach of the condition which may have existed, the right of re-entry or recovery would survive him.

3, 4. The third and fourth headnotes need no elaboration.

[5] 5. The action was brought by the administrator of the deceased grantor against the grantee. The basis of it was that the grantee had voluntarily failed to supply the care and maintenance for which he was obligated under the terms of the deed, and had thus committed a breach of the condition subsequent contained therein. The grantee was allowed, over objection, to testify, in substance that he had complied with the obligation, and to give various instances in which he had furnished such care and maintenance to the grantor. This was error. Parker v. Ballard, 123 Ga. 441 (1), 51 S. E. 465; Civil Code, § 5858, par. 1; Acts 1900, p. 57. The furnishing of care and maintenance by the grantee to the grantor was a transaction between the two. The grantee was no more competent to testify to this than if the question had been whether he paid the grantor a pecuniary consideration. The distinction between transactions with a deceased person and independent facts in no way involving transactions with such persons is pointed out in Nugent v. Watkins, 129 Ga. 382, 58 S. E. 888. The Code provision just referred to must be considered in connection with the act of 1900, supra.

The decision in Horton v. Smith, 115 Ga. 66, 41 S. E. 253, in no way conflicts with the ruling now made. In that case the grantor in a deed brought a suit against the administrator of the grantee to recover for an alleged violation of a contract to support the plaintiff. Pending the action the plaintiff died, and his administrator was made a party. Two of his children, who were not parties to the suit, though interested in the result, were held competent to testify that the defendant had not furnished support and maintenance to their father. This in no way involved any transaction between the defendant and the witnesses, but between the defendant and another person. The case arose prior to the act of 1900, and was not affected by it.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

BUICK MOTOR CO. v. THOMPSON.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 57*)—REQUISITES AND VALIDITY—MUTUALITY.

If mutual promises are relied on as a consideration to support a contract, the obligations of the contract must be mutually binding upon the respective parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 345, 352, 353; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 10*)—REQUISITES AND VALIDITY—MUTUALITY.

If parties agree that one will buy and the other sell articles of a certain character at stated prices, without specifying any number or amount of such articles, leaving the purchaser to give orders, the giving of an order or orders for certain things included in the offer to sell, before its withdrawal or termination, makes a contract as to the things so ordered, and the contract is no longer unilateral as to them.

3. SALES (§ 411*)—REMEDIES OF PARTIES—ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT—PLEADING.

A corporation manufacturing automobiles wrote to a person, agreeing that not later than a fixed date it would, "conditions permitting," supply him with goods of its manufacture at certain specified prices, that it was agreed that such person should not sell the cars outside of a certain county, that the contract could be terminated upon 10 days' written notice, that he should make reports of sales made by him, and that the receipt of $200 was acknowledged as a deposit, to be retained by the company and returned to the other party at the termination or cancellation of the contract, provided a full and complete settlement of all accounts due to the company had been made. An acceptance of this agreement was written under the communication of the company, and signed by the person to whom it was addressed. Held that, in a suit for a breach of contract in failing and refusing to furnish cars ordered by such person from the company, it was not incumbent on the plaintiff to allege and prove that conditions permitted the defendant to supply him with the machines ordered.

(a) A petition which alleged such a breach of contract, and that the company had frequently promised to send the automobiles, but had finally failed and refused so to do, was not demurrable, on the ground that it failed to allege that conditions permitted the defendant to do so.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by D. V. Thompson against the Buick Motor Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

D. V. Thompson brought suit against the Buick Motor Company. The petition contained two counts. The first alleged substantially as follows: The defendant entered into a contract with the plaintiff, of which a copy was attached to the petition. The plaintiff deposited the $200 specified in the contract, and became the sales agent for defendant in Mitchell county, and at once opened an agency for the sale of automobiles, and devoted his time to securing orders therefor. He was not to be paid any salary, but was to receive, for the orders secured or which could be secured by him, the difference between the "list" and "price" figures, as shown on the contract. Where no "quantity limit" was placed upon a particular model, the orders which he could secure, and the number of such models which the defendant should deliver, were not limited. A list was set out, stating certain orders which the plaintiff sent to the defendants during the months of April to July, 1909, inclusive, together with the model for which each order was given, the "price," and the amount of compensation claimed upon such orders, respectively. At various times the defendant promised to have the cars shipped, in order that they might be delivered to the purchasers, but finally failed and refused to deliver them, thus breaking its contract. The plaintiff could have made three additional sales, described, had the defendant complied with its contract. He did not actually send in the orders and make the sales, because the defendant had broken its part of the contract and did not ship the machines for which orders had previously been sent in. The plaintiff, in endeavoring to get the defendant to comply with its part of the contract and ship the cars for which he had secured orders, incurred an expense of $60 on account of trips to Atlanta. Damages were laid at $2,260. The second count differed from the first in alleging that the defendant wrote to the plaintiff a letter on August 14, 1909, after the date for the expiration of the contract by its terms (July 31st), extending the time, and that he accepted the proposition contained in this letter. All of the orders sent by him to the defendant were within the time thus extended, though some of them were after August 31st. The other allegations were similar to those in the first count, including the averment that the defendant at various times promised to have the cars shipped, in order that they might be delivered, but finally failed and refused to do so.

The contract relied on was headed "Memorandum," and was dated January 21, 1909. It was directed, like a letter, to "D. V. Thompson, Pelham, Ga." It proceeded as follows: "Until further advised, but not later than July 31, 1909, provided the handling of your business is not in conflict with policy of our company, the Buick Motor Company, will, the conditions permitting, supply you with goods of its manufacture, herein described by letter and number (and more particularly described in its 1909 catalogue), at the following prices and terms." Then followed a list, of which the following item will serve as an illustration:

Model.	List.	Price.	Quantity	Limit.
F.	$1250.00.	$800.00.		1.

It then contained the following: "It is expressly understood and agreed that none of the above models will be sold by you to parties residing outside of the following territory, viz.: Mitchell county. It is hereby agreed that this contract can be terminated upon ten days' notice to this effect given in writing. It is also understood and agreed that, within five days from the date of sale by you of any Buick automobiles, you will furnish the office of the Buick Motor Company at Atlanta, Georgia, with a report of such sale, giving the name and address of the party purchasing same, the motor and serial number, the model sold, and the price paid. The receipt of two hundred and 00/100 ($200.00) dollars is hereby acknowledged as a deposit, same to be retained by the Buick Motor Company and returned to you at the termination or cancellation of this contract, provided a full and complete settlement of all accounts due the Buick Motor Company has been made." This paper was signed by the company, and followed by the word "Accepted," and by the signature of the plaintiff.

The letter attached as an exhibit to the second count of the petition was dated August 14, 1909, and contained the following: "Replying to your letter of August 12th, beg to say that we have a deposit of $200.00 from you, and, if you wish it, will be very glad indeed to send you check immediately; but, in the event we do this, we will not be able to ship you any more cars, as your contract would then be canceled. We think that within a short time we will be able to give you quite a few of them, and probably before our 1910 prices and contracts are out. We therefore ask you to advise us whether or not you will want to get some cars within the next 30 days, which, of course, you could do if your deposit remains with us, or if you prefer having us return the deposit to you."

To the petition the defendant interposed a demurrer containing general and special grounds. It was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Colquitt & Conyers, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). Thompson sued the Buick Motor Company for a breach of contract. The defendant filed a demurrer, which was overruled, and it excepted. In addition to the general grounds there were also certain special grounds; but they are not urged or referred to in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, and therefore, under the uniform ruling of this court, will be treated as abandoned, and we will deal with the general grounds only.

[1, 2] 1, 2. It was urged that the contract was unilateral, and that it did not bind the plaintiff to buy, and accordingly did not bind the defendant to sell. Where mutual promises are relied on as the consideration to support a contract, the obligations of the contract must be mutually binding upon the respective parties. Morrow v. Southern Express Co., 101 Ga. 810, 28 S. E. 998. This does not exclude the fact that one may, for a valuable consideration other than such mutual promises, bind himself by an option or offer to sell on certain terms during a specified time. In such a case he is bound to keep the offer open during the specified time, for the other party to accept or decline to buy. If acceptance is made within the time prescribed, the transaction then ceases to be a mere option or offer, and becomes a contract to sell and buy. Simpson & Harper v. Sanders & Jenkins, 130 Ga. 265, 60 S. E. 541.

It was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff in error, that this agreement belonged to the class first mentioned; that there was no consideration for the making of the contract, unless there were mutual promises; that in any event the defendant in error did not bind himself to buy cars, and the plaintiff in error was not bound to sell cars; that the agreements limiting sales by the defendant in error to Mitchell county, declaring the contract terminable on 10 days' notice, requiring a report of any sales made, and a deposit of $200 by the defendant in error, were not considerations for the making of the contract, so as to bind the plaintiff in error to sell to the defendant in error any automobiles. If it should be conceded that the agreements as to territory and reports were merely regulatory, in case sales were made to the defendant in error, and that the deposit was not a payment or such part performance as to be a consideration for a promise to sell, but only a guaranty of settlement if sales should be made, still how stands the case? An offer to sell on certain terms, without consideration therefor, is unilateral, and may be withdrawn before acceptance. After acceptance while still open and an agreement to buy, it ceases to be unilateral and becomes bilateral and binding. Black v. Maddox, 104 Ga. 157, 30 S. E. 723. If the offer is not for any specified amount, or an amount determinable by proof, such as what is necessary for a certain purpose, but is generally to furnish upon order, then the giving of an order for a certain thing or amount included in the offer, before its withdrawal or termination, makes a definite and fixed contract as to the thing or things so ordered. McCaw Mfg. Co. v. Felder & Rountree, 115 Ga. 408, 41 S. E. 664; Harrison & Garrett v. Wilson Lumber Co., 119 Ga. 6, 45 S. E. 730; 1 Page, Con. 456, § 307.

The first count of the petition alleged in effect that, during the time specified in the contract for its continuance and in accordance with its terms, the defendant in error received orders and made sales of several automobiles. The second count, in addition to the original contract, set out a letter treating the contract as continuing after the time fixed for its expiration, and the taking of orders and the making of sales while it was in force. Each of them alleged promises by the defendant to ship the cars ordered, and a subsequent failure and refusal to do so. In the first count was an allegation seeking to set up liability on account of certain cars not ordered; but, if it did not set out a right of recovery as to such item, that would not furnish ground to dismiss the entire case.

[3] 3. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff in error that the words "conditions permitting," in the contract, created a condition precedent, and that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to allege that conditions permitted, and also (as stated in the brief) that "these words reserved to the company the decision as to whether conditions permitted." For the defendant in error it was argued that, if these words have any force to relieve the company of liability, they do not create a condition precedent, but such conditions should be set up by way of defense, and also that the allegations showed a waiver by promise to deliver the machines. If those words created a condition precedent, the burden of alleging and showing the happening of the event would be on the plaintiff. If they created a condition subsequent, the burden of setting it up would rest on the defendant. If the contention of the plaintiff in error is correct, the entire agreement as to sales amounted to no more than this: If the defendant in error desired to buy, and the plaintiff in error thought the conditions permitted it to sell, there would be a trade; otherwise, not. Such an agreement would amount to no contract at all as to sales. It can hardly be supposed that these parties went through the idle form of making a written proposition and an acceptance merely to declare that there might be a trade if each desired to make it. They fixed a limit of time for the operation of the contract, and the number of certain models which might be ordered, provided for a termination of the contract on 10 days' notice, and stated the making of a deposit of $200 by the defendant in error. Was all this an elaborate method of declaring that no contract was actually intended to be made, but only in case one party ordered cars and the other thought conditions permitted their sending them? What conditions? What was to be considered—the number of cars on hand, or of orders already accepted from others, or the capacity of the manufactory, or the number of laborers whom the company might see fit to employ or discharge, or its financial condition, or the general financial condition of the country, or the condition of the weather, or what conditions?

It will be readily seen that if the words "conditions permitting" create a condition precedent, and impose on the defendant in error, suing for a breach of such contract, the duty of pleading and proving that conditions permitted the plaintiff in error to fill the orders, it places on him an impossible burden. On the other hand, if there were conditions legitimately excusing the plaintiff in error from performance, they were peculiarly within its knowledge. It has been held that, where one of two contracting parties prepares a written or printed contract and obtains the signature of the other party, if it contains ambiguous terms, and such ambiguity is not explained, the construction which goes most strongly against the party so preparing it will be generally preferred. Moorefield v. Fidelity Mutual Life Insurance Co., 135 Ga. 186, 69 S. E. 119, and citations. In Griswold v. Scott, 13 Ga. 210, suit was brought on a written contract by which the defendant acknowledged the receipt from the plaintiff of a gin, "and if on trial it performs well, I promise to pay said Griswold [the plaintiff], or bearer, $80, for value received, by the 25th of December, 1910." It was held that this created a condition subsequent, that the vendee was prima facie liable to pay the specified amount, and that the defendant could set up that the machine failed to perform well on the trial of it.

Considering the contract involved in this case as a whole, we are of the opinion that the words "conditions permitting" did not create a condition precedent, requiring the plaintiff in the court below, defendant in error here, to allege and prove that conditions permitted before he would be entitled to recover. Whatever force they may have may be invoked by the defendant in the court below by way of defense. Moreover, the defendant in error alleged that at various times the plaintiff in error promised to have the cars shipped, in order that they might be delivered to the purchasers from him, but that the company finally failed and refused to do so. There was no error in overruling the general demurrer to the petition.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

THOMPSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 959*)—NEW TRIAL—PROCEEDING TO PROCURE—CONTINUANCE.

Where one convicted of murder has made a motion for a new trial, and the same is set for hearing in a county other than that in which the trial was had, and the defendant offers and the court allows an amendment to the motion, setting up that certain witnesses residing in the county in which the case was tried know facts which are material to his case and refuse to testify thereto voluntarily by affidavit or otherwise, and that such testimony is newly discovered, all of which is supported by proper affidavits, it is error for the court to refuse to grant the motion of the defendant, contained in such amendment, that the court continue the hearing and afford him its aid in procuring the desired testimony. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5918, 5919, do not apply to the case above outlined.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 959*)—NEW TRIAL—PROCEEDING TO PROCURE—HEARING.

It is error for the trial judge before whom a motion for a new trial is pending in a criminal case to receive and consider an affidavit of a witness whose testimony is material and favorable to the state, after the hearing of the motion for a new trial is closed and before his judgment on the motion is made up; no previous notice of such affidavit having been given to the defendant or his counsel.

Error from Superior Court, Jefferson County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Will Thompson was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed, with directions.

Will Thompson was tried and convicted of murder, without recommendation. The record discloses that from the date of his arrest the defendant was confined in jail, in a county different from the one in which the homicide occurred, until the day before his trial; that he was, from poverty, unable to employ counsel, and counsel were appointed to defend him by the court at the trial, who have since not represented him; and that he has since secured other counsel. After the verdict the counsel appointed by the court made a formal motion for a new trial, which seems not to have been pressed by them. The motion for a new trial was set for hearing in a county different from the one in which the trial took place. At the time and place set for the hearing the motion was continued to still another county and on another date. At the latter time and place, the present counsel for the plaintiff in error offered an amendment to the original motion for new trial, which was allowed, and also moved the court for a continuance of the motion for a new trial, which amended motion was in part as follows:

"Because, since the trial and rendition of the verdict in said case, certain material evidence, not merely cumulative or impeaching in its character, but relating to and proving new and material facts, has been discovered by the movant; said evidence being in substance as follows, to-wit: Haman Green, who is a resident of Avera, will testify on another trial as follows: That he saw the latter part of the tragedy in which Mr. Claude Humphrey was shot by the movant, and saw what transpired immediately at and before the time of the shooting, and the facts and circumstances as he knows them are that the deceased and his brother, Mr. Carlos Humphrey were together and were following movant at very close range. His attention was first attracted by some statement made by deceased to movant (the exact words of which he did not catch), to which statement movant replied, 'That's all right, white folks,' and continued walking away from deceased and his brother. Deceased then remarked to movant, 'You don't believe I'll do it, do you?' to which movant again replied, 'That's all right, white folks,' and kept on walking away from the deceased and his brother, who were still following movant. Deceased then turned to his brother, and, handing something to him (either a bundle or little satchel), said, 'Here, Carlos, hold this; I'll show the damned son of a bitch whether I'll do or not,' and immediately rushed on movant; and, as movant partially turned on his approach, deceased struck movant in the face and immediately threw his right hand to his hip pocket in an effort, apparently, to draw his pistol, the while clutching and holding movant with his other hand; and while the deceased was thus in the act of drawing his weapon movant got his pistol out first and fired upon the deceased. Movant had no weapon and made no attempt or effort to draw one until after deceased had struck him and was apparently actually endeavoring to draw his pistol from his hip pocket. After the shooting witness was sure that the deceased had killed movant and was surprised to learn otherwise. Witness was only 10 or 15 feet from the parties at the time of the shooting, and was in a position to see and did see just what happened between them. Antony Kelly, who is a resident of Avera, in said county of Jefferson, will testify on another trial as follows: That immediately after the shooting he saw a fresh wound on movant's neck, made apparently by a knife cut, and that the wound was bleeding. Dr. J. C. Raley, who is a resident and practicing physician of Avera, in said county of Jefferson, will testify on another trial that movant was forced to kill the deceased in order to save his own life, and will give the particulars of the killing as he saw them. This witness has refused and still refuses to give movant or his counsel an affidavit setting forth his knowledge of the particular facts and circumstances, or to voluntarily tell them the particulars of the killing as he saw and knows them; but he has stated enough to movant's counsel and to others, as shown by the affidavits of J. W. Neal and D. W. Barfield hereto attached, to prove clearly and positively that he saw the shooting and knows the truth of the transaction, and that his testimony will be most favorable to movant, and will exonerate him from criminal blame. Movant attaches hereto and makes a part of this ground of his amended motion for a new trial the affidavits, respectively, of M. M. Williams (and the supporting affidavit of W. H. Walden, M. M. Williford, Tom May, and J. H. Wilcher), J. W. Neal, D. W. Barfield, G. F. Dixon, and M. M. Williams jointly, J. R. Phillips, J. C. Newsome, and A. R. Wright, which affidavits show the truth of the existence of the material testimony set forth in this ground of the amended motion, and that the same was unknown to movant and his counsel before the trial. Movant also attaches his own affidavit as a part of this ground of the motion. Movant asserts and shows to the court that he has diligently sought to obtain from the above-named witnesses, Haman Green, Antony Kelly, and Dr. J. C. Raley, affidavits setting forth their testimony as above narrated; but each firmly and positively refuses to voluntarily give the same, stating that they will not testify until required to do so by the court. Movant therefore prays that the court take such action and grant such order as will require the witnesses above named to appear and give their testimony to be used for and on behalf of movant upon this motion for a new trial and upon this ground thereof, and to that end that a time and place be fixed to and at which said witnesses may be subpoenaed to appear and give their testimony in accordance with the provisions of law, and that this motion be continued until such time. In addition to the foregoing it can be proved, on another trial, as shown by the attached affidavit of J. H. Wilcher, that Carlos Humphrey, brother of the deceased, was a participant with the deceased in the difficulty, and with the deceased was making a deadly assault with a deadly weapon upon movant at the time of the shooting, and that the said Carlos Humphrey has since the trial admitted and stated 'that the reason he did not kill William Thompson was because it was dark, and he could not see where he was cutting him, and his knife blade was too short to reach through his clothes'; and movant has reason to believe that the said Carlos Humphrey will so testify upon another trial, as the facts above stated are the truth, and movant has the right to rely upon the witness admitting and testifying the truth. The said Carlos Humphrey was not present at the trial of movant, and was inaccessible at the time; he being too sick to attend the court, as is shown by the record in said case."

The required affidavits accompanied the motion in support of it. The motion to continue was overruled by the court.

Between the date of the motion to continue and the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial, the court received on the part of the state, without notice to the defendant, and considered, the following affidavit of Dr. J. C. Raley: "Personally appeared J. C. Raley, a practicing physician at Avera, Ga., who makes this affidavit for the purpose of being used in the above motion, and on oath says that he has never said to any one that the defendant Will Thompson had to kill the deceased; nor has he ever said that the deceased made the defendant kill him; nor has deponent ever said that the said Will Thompson was justified in killing the deceased; and this deponent says that he knows no facts that are material in said case." The court overruled the motion for a new trial, and the defendant excepted.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. We think the court erred, under the facts of this case, in not granting a continuance of the hearing of the motion for a new trial, as asked by the plaintiff in error. The record shows that the defendant had been confined in jail in a different county from that in which the homicide occurred, from the date of his arrest until the day previous to the trial, and that from his poverty the defendant was unable to employ counsel to represent him and prepare for his trial. The court, on the day before the trial, appointed counsel to defend the plaintiff in error; and after representing him at the trial and making a formal motion for a new trial, the attorneys so appointed, it seems, no longer represented him. The newly discovered evidence appears not to have been known to the original or present counsel, or to the plaintiff in error, nor under the facts of this case do we well see how it could have been. When the present counsel for the plaintiff in error came into the case, he discovered the evidence and asked a continuance of the motion in order to secure and present it for the consideration of the court. The witnesses refused voluntarily to testify for the plaintiff in error, and counsel asked a continuance of the motion in order that the process of the court could be invoked to compel the witnesses to give evidence. The testimony, if true, is material and vital to the defense. By what method could the defendant get this testimony for use on the hearing?

In cases heard on affidavits, including motions for a new trial, Civil Code, § 5918, provides a method of forcing testimony from an unwilling witness who is a resident of the county in which the suit is pending. Application is made to the clerk of the superior court of that county and subpoena obtained, calling upon the witness to appear at the hearing, when the trial judge can require the witness to answer questions propounded to him, or can appoint a commissioner for that purpose, or, the witness consenting, his affidavit may then be prepared and sworn to. Section 5919 provides that in cases where the witness resides out of the county (that is, construing the two sections together, out of the county in which the suit is pending), subpoena may be obtained from the clerk of the superior court of the county of the residence of the witness, and the witness thus be required to appear before some officer of that county authorized to administer oaths, and answer written questions prepared for him, the answers to be reduced to writing, sworn to before the officer and by the latter forwarded to the clerk of the court in which the case is pending, as in case of interrogatories. It seems that the Legislature by these two sections was providing for only two contingencies: By section 5918, to obtain the testimony of an unwilling witness at a hearing on written testimony in the county in which the case or suit was pending, when the witness resided in that county; and by section 5919, when the witness resided out of the county in which suit or case was pending. A criminal case is pending in the county in which the venue for trial is laid. If the motion for a new trial is granted, wherever passed upon, it is granted for a new trial in the county of the venue. The effect of an order for the hearing of a motion for a new trial subsequently to the regular adjournment of the term of court at which the trial is had is to keep that term of the court open with respect to that particular case until the hearing and determination of the motion at the time it is first set, or pursuant to further specific orders of continuance passed on the day set for the hearing. Herz v. Frank, 104 Ga. 638, 30 S. E. 797; Atlanta Ry. Co. v. Strickland, 114 Ga. 998, 41 S. E. 501.

The present case was pending in Jefferson county. A hearing of the motion was set in Washington county. The witnesses whose newly discovered testimony the defendant sought to obtain by compulsion resided in Jefferson county, where the case was pending. If the defendant had any right under these sections, therefore, it was to proceed under section 5918; but this could not avail him, because it provides only for an attendance of the witnesses at a hearing in that county, and the hearing was set elsewhere. He had no method, under the general law, of compelling witnesses to attend a hearing in a county other than that of their residence. If Penal Code, §§ 1143, 1147, are applicable to hearings of this kind held outside of the county of the residence of a witness, they do not give a defendant an absolute right to compel the attendance of a witness, but only upon procuring subpoena signed by the clerk and solicitor general. If there be any general inherent power in the court to compel a witness, under the circumstances of this case, to testify for the defendant, its exercise is discretionary with the court, and the defendant by the motion itself was seeking the aid of the court in procuring evidence which he had no absolute legal method of securing. If the motion for a continuance had been granted and a hearing set in Jefferson county, the defendant could have then proceeded under section 5918 to make his showing as to what the witnesses would testify with respect to the circumstances attending the homicide, of which, according to the affidavits filed with the motion, they were eyewitnesses. We think a sufficient showing was made with respect to the diligence of the defendant and his counsel in discovering the alleged testimony and of the nature thereof; and upon the showing made by the defendant and that he could not secure voluntary evidence from the witnesses, it was the duty of the court to continue the hearing and set it at such time and place as would give the defendant the opportunity of forcing the witnesses to testify concerning the facts material to his case, of which they were alleged to have knowledge.

[2] 2. Error is assigned in that the court, between the time of the hearing of the motion for a new trial and the rendition of judgment overruling it, permitted the state's counsel to file with and read to the judge the affidavit of a witness for the state which was antagonistic to the defendant's case, that this was done without notice to or knowledge of the defendant or his counsel, and that this affidavit was considered by the judge in forming his judgment overruling the motion. We find no criminal case in which this precise question was involved; but the rulings in a number of civil cases, by analogy, would seem to apply. And if the rule laid down in civil cases is to reverse the judgment in such cases, how much more strongly ought it to apply to a criminal case, where personal liberty and life are involved. In the case of Atlantic, etc., Ry. Co. v. Cordele, 125 Ga. 373 (4), 54 S. E. 155, it was held: "The presiding judge who heard the issues involved in the application for injunction, including the questions of whether the required removal was in fact for the convenience and welfare of the public or only for the benefit of another corporation, whether there was a necessity for the proposed change, whether the proposed act would be unreasonable or arbitrary, and what would be the effect, if any, upon the operation and property of the plaintiff, having stated, in his order refusing to grant an injunction, that he heard evidence and argument, and also that 'this order [is] granted after a personal inspection and observation of the tracks and surroundings of the street crossing and tracks involved,' and it thus appearing that the judge's personal inspection and observation were made an integral part of his judgment, and it not appearing that this was done with the consent of counsel or parties, the judgment will be reversed, with direction that the case be heard upon the evidence which may be introduced, unless inspection by the judge as part of the proceedings be had with the consent of both parties." And see Horton v. Fulton, 130 Ga. 466 (4), 60 S. E. 1059; Sylvania Water Co. v. Overstreet, 124 Ga. 235, 52 S. E. 164; City Bank of Macon v. Kent, 57 Ga. 286 (24).

We hold, in view of the peculiar facts of this case, that the judgment of the court below overruling the motion for a new trial should be vacated and set aside, and the motion for a new trial be set for hearing at such time and place as will afford the plaintiff in error an opportunity to examine his witnesses according to the provisions of the law as contained in Civil Code, § 5918 et seq., or in such other manner as may be provided by law, and that the trial judge will rehear the motion and the testimony of the witnesses, and pass upon the motion for a new trial in the light of the showing made as to the newly discovered evidence, if produced at the next hearing.

Judgment reversed, with direction. All the Justices concur.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 955*)—NEW TRIAL—DISMISSAL OF MOTION—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

Under the ruling in Blount v. State, 9 Ga. App. 575, 71 S. E. 877, and rulings cited therein, the judge of the trial court was compelled to dismiss the motion for a new trial, because of the failure to comply with the order, passed during term, requiring that a brief of the evidence should be made out and tendered for approval within a specified time.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Andrew Rogers, Jr., was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

Chas. H. Griffin and Geo. F. Gober, both of Marietta, for plaintiff in error. J. P. Brooke Sol. Gen., of Alpharetta, for the State.

HILL, C. J. This case is here on exceptions to the judgment dismissing the motion for a new trial. The facts are as follows:

During the term of the court at which the verdict of guilty was rendered the defendant filed and had approved his motion for a new trial, and during the term an order was passed setting down the hearing of the motion "on the 11th day of May, 1912, in vacation, at Marietta, Ga."; and it was further ordered that "movant have until the 4th day of May, 1912, to prepare and file in the clerk's office and present for approval a brief of the evidence in the case, and the presiding judge may enter his approval thereon at any time either in term or vacation." On the 4th day of May, 1912, the judge of the superior court passed the following order (after stating the case): "The above-stated motion having been set for the 11th day of May, 1912, at Marietta, in vacation, and by the terms of the order fixing said hearing, etc., it was ordered that the defendant file in the clerk's office a brief of the evidence on this the 4th day of May, 1912, it appearing to the court that the stenographer has been unable to write out the evidence and furnish the same to counsel for movant, it is ordered that the movant have until the hearing, whenever it may be, to make out, file, and present for approval a brief of the testimony in said case. This 4th day of May, 1912." The above order was passed in vacation.

On May 11, 1912, when the motion for new trial came on to be heard in accordance with the original order passed during the term, the solicitor general made a motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial upon the following grounds: "This case was tried, and the defendant convicted, and a motion for a new trial made during the March term, 1912, of Cobb superior court. The hearing of the motion was fixed by regular order of the court for May 11, 1912. In the same order movant was directed to file a brief of the evidence and present the same for approval on or by May 4, 1912. The March term of said court was adjourned on March 23, 1912. On May 4, 1912, N. A. Morris, judge of said court, at the request of defendant's counsel, signed an order granting the defendant additional time, to wit, until the hearing of said case, to file and present a brief of the evidence. There was no brief of the evidence filed and presented on or by May 4, 1912, as required in the original order. Movant says that the order granted by the judge on May 4, 1912, is a nullity and is void, because the court was not in session and the judge had no jurisdiction to grant said order. Wherefore movant insists that said motion for new trial should be dismissed, because no brief of evidence has been filed and approved in the manner required by law, nor in the manner and within the time pointed out by the order granted to the movant when the court was in session and had jurisdiction of said case." The court granted the motion and dismissed the motion for a new trial.

Under the above recital of facts there was nothing else that the court could do. It has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court and this court that when, by an order passed in term, a motion for a new trial is set to be heard on a particular day, and the same order requires the movant to present a brief of the evidence for the approval of the judge in vacation on another day, prior to that set for the hearing, the judge is without jurisdiction, on the day fixed for the presentation of the brief, to lawfully extend the time for such presentation. Blackburn v. Alabama Midland Railway Co., 116 Ga. 936, 43 S. E. 366; Blount v. State, 9 Ga. App. 575, 71 S. E. 877, and citations.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error endeavors to take the case out of this well-settled rule because of the following facts: When the order nisi was made on the original motion, the matter of the brief of evidence was discussed by counsel with the presiding judge, who stated to counsel that, in the event the court reporter was unable to furnish the record so that the brief could be filed in vacation, he (the judge) would protect the movant. Subsequently, on the 11th day of April, the court was convened in special session, at which time counsel for the movant called up the question of the preparation of the brief of evidence, and stated to the court that the stenographer would probably be unable to furnish the record so that the brief could be filed by the time fixed in the original order. At this time, while the court was in session, and when an order protecting the movant's rights could have been taken, the court stated to the movant's counsel that he would protect the movant, and it would be unnecessary to take an order. On the 4th day of May, the time that the order required that the brief be filed the stenographer had not presented a brief of the evidence to counsel, and on that day the judge, at the request of counsel for movant, passed an order extending the time for filing the brief of the evidence until the hearing, whenever it might be. It was not disputed that the stenographer had not furnished or written out the evidence, and it was not disputed that the judge had promised movant's counsel in that event to protect the movant in his rights in reference to the filing of the brief of the evidence.

The order granted on the 4th day of May showed that the judge endeavored to fulfill his promise; but the trouble was that the judge on that day in vacation had no jurisdiction to pass the order, and it was a mere nullity, and therefore could not operate as a protection to the movant. Under the facts, in the absence of any order to extend the time for the preparation and the filing of the brief of the testimony taken in term, the judge was without any power to fulfill his promise to protect the movant. The law took away from him any jurisdiction to pass the order on May 4th, in vacation; and there being no brief of evidence prepared and filed on that day, as provided by the order previously passed in term, the judge was absolutely without jurisdiction to pass any order in the case, and he was bound to dismiss the motion, in obedience to the repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court. It has also been repeatedly held that the failure or inability of the stenographer to furnish to counsel for the movant a transcript of his notes of the brief of the testimony in time to make a brief to present to the court furnishes to the movant no excuse for his failure to do so. Guthrie v. Hendley, 8 Ga. App. 101, 68 S. E. 654, and citations.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error requests that we review and reverse the decision in Blount v. State, 9 Ga. App. 575, 71 S. E. 877. We cannot comply with this request. That decision announces no novel or original proposition of law, but simply follows the repeated rulings of the Supreme Court on the same subject. Under the facts recited in the bill of exceptions as approved by the trial judge, we would personally be glad to give the movant an opportunity to present and have heard his motion for a new trial; but, under the repeated rulings controlling this case, we are powerless to do so, and, under the conceded facts, the judgment dismissing the motion for a new trial must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

PARENT AND CHILD (§ 13*)—TAKING OF MONEY—PARENT'S PROMISE TO REPAY—CONSIDERATION.

Where a minor unlawfully took possession of money of another, and appropriated it to his own use, no legal obligation was imposed upon his parent to repay the money to the owner, and an agreement or promise of the parent to do so was nudum pactum and unenforceable.

Error from Superior Court, Walton County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by J. B. Wilkins against A. C. Barnes. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. O. Dean, of Monroe, for plaintiff in error. Walker & Roberts, of Monroe, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Wilkins brought suit against Barnes in a justice court on an account, and the case was appealed to the superior court. In the latter court the presiding judge, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted. The facts are as follows: The plaintiff's son and the defendant's son, two minors about 16 years of age, took and carried off from the plaintiff $102 of the plaintiff's money, which they spent, and the two boys were arrested and brought to Athens and lodged in jail. The two fathers went to Athens for the purpose of rendering assistance to their boys. The defendant had no money. The plaintiff proposed to the defendant that he would pay the expenses of the arrest, which amounted to $8, and the boys could be released from custody, if the defendant would agree to pay him back in the fall a half of this amount, and $55, half of the amount of money which the two boys had taken from the plaintiff and spent without authority. The defendant agreed to do this. The boys were thereupon discharged. Subsequently the defendant paid to the plaintiff $4, being a half of the $8 costs which had accrued in the arrest of the boys, but refused to pay a half of the money which the boys had spent, and the suit was brought by plaintiff to recover this half, based upon the promise of the defendant to pay it.

At the conclusion of the evidence the defendant moved for a nonsuit, and the court stated that the defendant could take either a verdict or an order of nonsuit. The defendant elected to take a verdict. The proper procedure would have been the grant of a nonsuit, if the plaintiff was not entitled to recover under the evidence. This fact is immaterial, however, in view of the fact that we think it very clear, under the undisputed evidence, that the agreement which the defendant made to repay the plaintiff the money which the boy had spent was a mere nudum pactum, and was not enforceable. It is insisted by the defendant that the case is within the statute of frauds, and the agreement to pay, not being in writing, was void. It is insisted by the plaintiff that it was an original agreement, and, further, that the payment by the plaintiff of the $4, was such part performance of the contract as would take it out of the statute.

Irrespective of whether the case is within the statute of frauds or not, as the contract would have been without any consideration even if it had been in writing, the question is unimportant. We affirm the judgment because, under the admitted facts, the contract sued upon was simply nudum pactum.

It is contended by the plaintiff that the contract was a binding obligation on the parent because it was an assumption by the father of the debt of his minor son. The answer to this is that the father, under the facts of the case, was under no legal obligation to pay the debt of his minor son, incurred as this one was. While a parent might be willing to pay the debt of his minor child, he is under no valid obligation to do so, unless for necessities furnished the minor under certain circumstances.

Judgment affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1195*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—EFFECT OF DECISION.

When this case was previously before this court, it was held that under the undisputed evidence the plaintiff was as a matter of law not entitled to recover, and for that reason the verdict was set aside, and a new trial granted. North American Accident Insurance Co. v. Watson, 6 Ga. App. 193, 64 S. E. 693. On the second trial the evidence was substantially the same as on the first trial, and the trial court did not err in granting a nonsuit.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1195*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

The decision of this court when the case was first here was a conclusion of law, based upon uncontroverted facts, and is in no sense at variance with the repeated rulings that this court is without jurisdiction to determine mere issues of fact. The decision as there announced will not be reviewed; a majority of the court being satisfied with its soundness. In addition to other citations in the opinion, then delivered (6 Ga. App. 193, 64 S. E. 693), see United Benevolent Society v. Freeman, 111 Ga. 355, 36 S. E. 764.

Russell, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by O. H. Watson against the North American Accidental Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Frank L. Neufville, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Shepard Bryan, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Judgment affirmed.

POTTLE, J. (concurring specially). Without committing myself to all the reasoning in the opinion of the CHIEF JUDGE when this case was before the court the first time, I agree that the case was rightly decided by the majority of the court on the facts. Moreover, I question the right of this court to review and overrule a decision previously made in the same case. I am inclined to think that the judgment rendered when the case was here before is res adjudicata. See Ingram v. Mercer University, 102 Ga. 226, 29 S. E. 273, and citations; Evans v. Nail, 7 Ga. App. 133 (2), 66 S. E. 543.

RUSSELL, J. I dissent for the reasons stated in my former dissenting opinion (6 Ga. App. 199, 64 S. E. 693); and while I agree that, primarily, the ruling herein announced by the majority of the court would be res judicata as to this case, even if it should be later reviewed and overruled as to other cases, still I conceive it to be within the prerogative of a court of last resort in any case, should the identical point be again presented which was previously adjudicated in the particular case (if the court should be convinced that the prior judgment was wrong), to correct that judgment, so as to relieve even that particular case from the operation of the rule. If this court can modify, withdraw, or reverse its opinion in one case, why not in another? The reason for the application of the principle of res judicata to the particular case in which the ruling was made I apprehend to be due to the fact that the rights of the parties involved in the particular case are fixed thereby, and all subsequent rulings of the lower court concerning the case must be in conformity with the decision of the court of review. Naturally it could not be held to be error upon the part of the trial court to try the case according to the precepts of the court of review.

The principle of res judicata is generally applied in a case which has been reviewed from necessity for the reasons above stated, and because it is not likely that the court of review will in that case have an opportunity of correcting the error, if there was an error in its prior decision. But if in any case, as in this, the opportunity is presented of reviewing the prior decision, it is certainly within the power of the court to declare the true law. What I have said above does not affect the present case, because a majority of the court still adheres to its previous decision; but I cannot concur in the opinion of Judge POTTLE that a prior ruling in a pending case cannot be changed by the court of review. The rule might be different if the case had been concluded, or if all opportunity to consider its controlling questions had passed, but this case is still before us, and no final judgment has ever been rendered.

2. HOMESTEAD (§ 118*) — DISPOSITION — DEVISE—"OTHERWISE."

Const. art. 3, § 28, includes a devise, and prevents the alienation of the homestead, either by deed or devise, or in any other manner, unless the wife joins the husband in the disposition.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5105-5113.]

3. HOMESTEAD (§ 118*)—SETTING OFF HOMESTEAD—RIGHTS ACQUIRED.

Const. art. 3, § 28, does not create any new estate, but the title in the husband is burdened with the homestead for the enjoyment of himself and wife.

4. HOMESTEAD (§ 136*)—SETTING OFF HOMESTEAD—RIGHTS ACQUIRED.

A husband who purchased land subsequent to Const. art. 3, § 28, and laid it off as a homestead, could not, without the assent of the wife, devise it during her life, so as to deprive her of the benefits of the homestead, but, after her death, a devise would be valid.

Fraser, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; T. H. Spain, Judge.

Action by F. G. Davis, administrator of John Milady, deceased, against Susan Milady and others for the construction of the will of deceased. From a judgment construing the will, defendant Trannie Cooper appeals. Modified.

W. H. Townsend, of Columbia, for appellant. John J. Earle, Shand & Shand, and Barron, Moore, Barron & McKay, all of Columbia, for respondent.

WATTS, J. John Milady acquired a tract of land in 1900. It was assigned to him as a homestead in 1902 and the assignment recorded. He died in 1910, survived by a widow, Susan Milady, and his next of kin were some cousins, owing no debts contracted prior to 1896 and leaving of force a will whereby he devised this tract of land to a stranger without assent, written or otherwise, of his surviving widow. This action was commenced to obtain a construction of the will of John Milady. All issues of law and fact were referred to A. D. McFadden, Esq., master for Richland county, to try all issues and report his findings of facts and conclusions of law. His report and exceptions thereto and the decree of his honor, Judge Spain, and exceptions thereto should be set out in the report of the case.

The only question on this appeal is whether the devise under the will of John Milady is valid; the master holding that it was, and the circuit court reversing the master's report, and Susan Milady denies that the devise is valid. Such devise would be valid if testator had died prior to the Constitution of 1895, or if the homestead had been laid off to him prior to 1895 (Bostick v. Chovin, 55 S. C. 429, 33 S. E. 508; Beaty v. Richardson, 56 S. C. 186, 34 S. E. 73, 46 L. R. A. 517) or, perhaps, if he had purchased the land prior to 1895. In Ex parte Bullock, 58 S. C. 239, 36 S. E. 563, no homestead had been laid off. So, too, in Geiger v. Geiger, 57 S. C. 521, 35 S. E. 1031.

[1] But the Constitution of 1895 (article 3, § 28) provides "that after a homestead has been set off and recorded the same shall not be waived by deed of conveyance, mortgage or otherwise, unless the same be executed by both husband and wife, if both be living." See, also, Code of Laws 1902, § 2630. This limitation of the power of disposition was not in the Constitution of 1868, and therefore was purposely added to make some change in the rights which the court had held to exist under the former instrument. Judge Cooley says the court "must lean in favor of a construction which will render every word operative, rather than one which may make some idle and nugatory. This rule is applicable with special force to written constitutions in which the people will be presumed to have expressed themselves in careful and measured terms corresponding with the immense importance of the powers delegated, leaving as little as possible to implication. It is scarcely conceivable that a case can arise when a court would be justifiable in declaring any portion of a written constitution nugatory because of ambiguity." Cooley's Const. Lim. § 58. What is the force of the word "waived"? It is clear that it cannot exclude a grant or a mortgage or any other disposition which may be included in the word "otherwise." In R. & L. Dict. p. 1342, it is said: "A person is said to waive a benefit when he renounces or disclaims it. * * * A waiver may be expressed or implied." And the Century Dictionary defines it to be "the intentional relinquishment of a known right." Therefore a deed or devise would be a relinquishment of a right of ownership, and a devise of the right of inheritance which the party waiving would otherwise possess. A deed operates as a grant, but also as an estoppel and as a waiver.

[2] The other word which requires a construction is the word "otherwise." Does it include a devise? We think so. The Constitution intended to prevent the alienation of the homestead when once set off, either by deed or devise or in any other manner, unless the wife joined with the husband in the execution of the conveyance, whether by deed, mortgage, or whatever means it was attempted to be conveyed or waived. Prior to 1895 it was held by the courts that the homestead allowed under the Constitution of 1868 did not prevent the head of a family from conveying it, mortgaging it, or devising it. The framers of the Constitution of 1895 knew this when they declared that, after a homestead had been set off and recorded, it could "not be waived by deed of conveyance, mortgage or otherwise, unless the same be executed by both husband and wife, if both be living. This prevents an alienation by deed or an incumbrance by mortgage, except by an instrument signed by both husband and wife, if both be living, and in our opinion was intended by the framers of the Constitution of 1895 to include every species of disposition, permanent or temporary, which would deprive the family for whose benefit, and by reason of whose existence, the homestead was allowed. Therefore, the word "otherwise" was intended to include leases, devises, dedication, grants of right of way, confession of judgment with waiver of homestead claim, and every other possible device by which a husband might deprive his family of the homestead upon whose existence alone he had been able to keep it away from his creditors.

In the case of Larson v. Reynolds, 13 Iowa, 579, 583, 81 Am. Dec. 446, 447, it appears that under the law of that state a conveyance of a homestead is of no validity unless the husband and wife concur in and sign the same, and that such provision prevented a valid mortgage by the husband alone, nor is it made good by the subsequent death of his wife. The court further says: "Upon his death she has a right to continue in its occupation, and it cannot be taken from her by his will or devise." The Mississippi courts have held in McDonald v. Sandford, 88 Miss. 633, 41 South. 369, 117 Am. St. Rep. 758, 9 Ann. Cas. 1, a mortgage executed by the husband alone is held to be an absolute nullity. In that case Chief Justice Whitehead says: "Whatever name may be given to the wife's interest in the homestead, whether it be called an estate or an interest, or a claim, or a right or a veto power merely, it is such an interest or a right as the statute requires to be conveyed by deed, and a deed to the homestead without the wife joining in the conveyance has been correctly held in Gulf v. Singleton, 78 Miss. 772 [29 South. 754], to be an absolute nullity." In Thomas v. Craft, 55 Fla. 842, 46 South. 594, 15 Ann. Cas. 1118, the court, construing the provision of the Florida Constitution that a homestead should not be alienable without the joint consent of husband and wife, held as to the word "alienable" that "no instrument is effectual as an alienation or a conveyance or transfer of title or of any interest in the homestead real estate without the joint consent of husband and wife when that relation exists." This position is also sustained in Griffith v. Griffith, 59 Fla. 512, 52 South. 609, 138 Am. St. Rep. 138, 21 Ann. Cas. 246. "A power in the husband to terminate this freehold with his life by disposing of the land in his will is inconsistent with the spirit and intent of the statute as manifested in the clauses declaring that no release or waiver, except by deed, and no deed from husband alone without his wife should be valid in law; and that the exemption should continue after his death for the benefit of his widow and children." Brettun v. Fox, 100 Mass. 235. In Nebraska the homestead of a married person cannot be conveyed or incumbered unless the instrument by which it is conveyed or incumbered is executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife, and it was held in Kolke v. Wolff, 78 Neb. 504, 111 N. W. 134, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 99, that this prevented a lease of the homestead by the husband alone, and he recovered the land from the lessee.

[3] This court has held that the homestead provisions do not create any new estate. Chief Justice McIver says in Stewart v. Blalock, 45 S. C. 64, 22 S. E. 775: "It is well settled, in this state at least, that the homestead provisions create no new estate and do not invest estates already existing with any new qualities or subject them to any restrictions, but simply secure a right of exemption by forbidding the use of the process of the court to sell certain property for the payment of debts"—citing Elliott v. Mackorell, 19 S. C. 242, and Chalmers v. Turnipseed, 21 S. C. 126.

[4] We are of the opinion that John Milady having purchased this land subsequent to the Constitution of 1895, and laid off to him as a homestead in 1902, and no assent by the wife having even been given, he had no power to devise it so that the devise would take effect during his wife's, Susan Milady's, life, and thereby deprive her of the benefits of the homestead. At the time the homestead was set off, his family consisted of his wife and himself. The homestead was allowed for their benefit and by reason of their existence and once set off could not be disposed of, permanently or temporary, in any manner, whatsoever, by deed, mortgage, devise, or otherwise, except that both husband and wife joined in the conveyance by whatever name it was called, so as to deprive the family of the homestead upon whose existence he had been able to keep it away from his creditors. Once set apart as a homestead, it had to remain in tact as a homestead for the benefit of both, as long as both or either lived, unless both joined in the conveyance. John Milady having died, Susan Milady, his widow, is entitled to enjoy undisturbed the possession of this homestead during her natural life, but, after her death, it goes as devised by John Milady. The title to the property was in him, and under the case of Stewart v. Blalock, supra, no new estate was created, but only his fee burdened with the homestead for the enjoyment of himself and wife, and after his wife's death his devise will be valid. We do not think by the fundamental and organic law, even such as a constitutional convention has as to how people shall be governed or by an act of the General Assembly of the state, they can dictate to a person how his property shall be disposed of finally and take the disposition of it out of his hands. Under the Constitution of 1895 (article 3) it gives the Legislature power to enact laws to exempt a homestead from sale, etc., under process of court, and discharges the title to the homestead from all debts then existing, etc., but it does not create any new estate, and in our opinion in the case at bar Mrs. Milady has the right to continue in exclusive occupation and enjoyment of the homestead during her natural life and at her death it goes as devised under the will of John Milady. Judgment of circuit court should be modified as indicated by the views herein expressed.

Judgment modified.

FRASER, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in so much of the opinion of Judge WATTS as limits the invalidity of the devise to the life of the widow. It seems to me that a waiver in which the wife does not join is void, whether the waiver is by deed, mortgage, devise, or otherwise, and that this position is fully sustained by the authorities cited.

STATE v. JOHNSON et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 25, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 598*)—CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF WITNESSES.

The trial of an indictment against defendants was continued by the state from a day when all of defendants' witnesses were present, having been regularly subpoenaed, with announcement by the solicitor for the state and by defendants' attorney that all witnesses must attend the first day of the next term of court. Defendants, relying upon the original subpoena and service and the notice in open court, did not resubpoena their witnesses for the next term, and, on the ground of their absence, moved to continue, supporting the motion by affidavit reciting what they expected to prove by such witnesses. The motion was overruled, and the court also refused to require the state to admit what the absent witnesses would swear to, if present. Held, that there was no abuse of discretion.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 586, 1151*)—APPEAL—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT — CONTINUANCE.

The granting or refusing of a continuance is within the discretion of the trial judge; and an appellate court will not disturb his decision, except in a clear case of abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1311, 3045-3049; Dec. Dig. §§ 586, 1151.*]

Hydrick and Fraser, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

George Johnson and Enoch Ware were convicted of violating the dispensary law, and they appeal. Affirmed.

A. H. Dagnall, of Anderson, for appellants. Solicitor P. A. Bonham, for the State.

WATTS, J. The agreed statement of facts in the case show that the appellants were tried and convicted, in their absence, of violating the dispensary law, in the court of general sessions for Anderson county, at the January term of court, 1912, and duly sentenced by his honor, Judge Memminger. The indictment was found against them at the September term of court, 1911, and the case was continued by the state at that time. All of the defendants' witnesses were present, having been regularly subpoenaed. When the case was continued, the solicitor announced in open court that all witnesses must be on hand the first day of the next term of the court, and defendants' attorney made a similar announcement to defendants' witnesses. Defendants did not resubpoena their witnesses for the January term of the court, relying upon the original subpoena and service and notice in open court at the September term. At the call of the case for trial on the first day of the term in January, 1912, none of defendants' witnesses were present, and defendants moved to continue the case until the next day, or until the next term, as none of defendants' witnesses were present, and also asked that a rule be issued against defendants' witnesses. This motion was supported by affidavit reciting these facts, and also set forth what defendants expected to prove by these witnesses. The motion was overruled, and the case ordered to trial. The court also refused to require the state to admit what the absent witnesses would swear to, if present. After sentence, appellants appeal and allege error on the part of his honor in forcing the case to trial, and allege error and abuse of discretion on his part in not requiring the state to admit what absent witnesses would swear to, if present.

[1, 2] A careful examination of the whole record in the case will fail to disclose that his honor in any manner abused his discretion. Granting or refusing a continuance is within the discretion of the trial judge; and an appellate court will not disturb his decision, except in a clear case of abuse of discretion. Latimer v. Latimer, 42 S. C. 209, 20 S. E. 159; State v. Murphy, 48 S. C. 5, 25 S. E. 43.

Possibly it was unfortunate that the defendants' witnesses were not present; but his honor had all of the facts of the case before him, and, after conviction, if he was not satisfied of their guilt, it is reasonable to suppose that he would have set the verdict aside, and have allowed them another chance to get the witnesses. The exceptions are overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

Hydrick, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; R. C. Watts, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by Elias Ramsey, as administrator of A. W. Ramsey, deceased, against W. L. Hill, doing business under the name and style of the Hill Banking & Mercantile Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Lewis, of Yorkville, for appellant. Thos. F. McDow, of Yorkville, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The plaintiff, as the administrator of A. W. Ramsey, who died in October, 1908, brings this action for the balance amounting to $400.25, alleged to be due upon an account, an itemized statement of which is attached to the complaint as an exhibit. One of the items in the account, amounting to $150, is for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the unsoundness of a mule sold by the defendant to plaintiff's intestate on the 2d of March, 1908. The defendant, in its answer, denied various items of the account, among which was the item of $150 for the unsoundness of the mule, as to which it also alleged that, "if there ever was any unsoundness in said mule, same was waived by plaintiff's intestate." The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $100, whereupon the defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was refused, and the defendant then appealed. The appellant's attorney in his argument says: "The appeal presents two questions for consideration: (1) There was absolutely no testimony that the mule sold plaintiff's intestate was unsound at time it was sold, and no testimony from which such an inference could be drawn. (2) That, even if the mule was unsound when sold, the plaintiff and his intestate both waived same."

[1] We proceed to the consideration of the first question. The plaintiff testified as follows: "Q. Mr. Ramsey, do you know the mule that your son got from Hill? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long have you had it in your possession? A. It is going on to four years. Q. Well, sir, he agreed to give $200, and gave a mortgage for it? A. Yes, sir. Q. What kind of a mule was that? A. It was a mule, a weakly mule, and was not able to do any day's work. Q. Was it an unhealthy mule? A. It was not to say a sickly mule. It was a weak mule, couldn't do a day's work. Q. Was it able to do any work? A. No, sir; might plow for a few days, then give out. Q. Was $200 a sound price for a good mule? A. At that time it was. Q. About what part of a day's work could this mule do? A. This mule would give out about 9 or 10 o'clock; lie down. Q. You never saw a mule like that before? A. Never in my life. Q. Did she eat heartily? A. No, sir. She didn't eat heartily no time. Q. What in your judgment was the value of that mule at the time she was sold? A. I wouldn't have had the mule, Mr. McDow. Mr. Lewis (Defendant's Attorney): Ask him if he knew the condition of the mule at the time it was sold. Q. Well, I will ask him that. A. I didn't know anything about it, then. Q. How long after the mule was sold until you did know it? A. About two weeks. Mr. McDow (Plaintiff's Attorney): I submit that is close enough, your honor. The Court: I think so. Q. Is that the condition of the mule to-day? A. Yes, sir. The mule never has been right." In the first place, the long continuance of the mule's condition tended to show that the weakness was inherent or chronic; and the jury might reasonably have inferred that it existed prior to the sale to plaintiff's intestate. In the second place, not only was the foregoing testimony introduced without objection, but, at the suggestion of plaintiff's attorney, his honor, the presiding judge, ruled that testimony as to the condition of the mule two weeks after the sale was competent, and there was no exception to this ruling.

[2] If testimony is received without objection, which would otherwise be incompetent, it becomes competent, and cannot be disregarded upon a motion for nonsuit, but its sufficiency must be left to the jury. Ashe v. Railway, 65 S. C. 134, 43 S. E. 393.

We will now consider the second question, which relates to waiver.

[3] The burden was on the defendant to prove waiver of the alleged unsoundness of the mule. A. W. Ramsey, the purchaser of the mule, was dead, and for this reason his administrator was at great disadvantage in meeting the defendant's claim that he had made no complaint of the defects in the mule.

[4] The jury were at liberty, however, to reject the defendant's testimony that no complaint had ever been made to him. The following extract shows that his testimony was not necessarily convincing on that subject: "Q. Now, Mr. Hill, didn't Mr. Wallace Ramsey bring this mule back to you in his lifetime, and ask you to take it back? A. Why, no, sir. Q. Sir? A. Never did. Q. Now, didn't he do it, and tell you he would give you $25 to take it back? A. I don't remember anything about that. Q. Think; I want you to remember. If he did do it, you don't remember it. If he didn't do it, you don't remember it. A. I know one thing, that he didn't make any complaint about anything being unsound." The plaintiff testified that he did complain of the mule after his son's death. The evidence does not show conclusively that the plaintiff voluntarily paid the claim of the defendant. On the contrary, there was evidence that A. W. Ramsey was defendant's tenant, and that his cotton crop was hauled to the defendant's gin, that the defendant retained it, and placed the proceeds on the account, and that the plaintiff was all the time claiming an allowance of credit on account of the weakness of the mule. There was abundant ground in the evidence for the jury to reject the defense of waiver.

Judgment affirmed.

WOODS and FRASER, JJ., concur.
WATTS, J., disqualified.

HYDRICK, J. (dissenting). According to the evidence in this case, plaintiff's son and intestate bought a mule from defendant for $200, and gave defendant his note for that amount, dated March 5, 1908, payable October 1, 1908, secured by chattel mortgage. He kept the mule and made a crop with it. He died in October, 1908. While there is some evidence that the mule was "weakly," there is not a particle of evidence that any complaint was ever made to the defendant by plaintiff's son as to her condition during his life, or that he ever tendered her back to defendant. Nor is there any evidence that plaintiff himself ever made any complaint to defendant about the mule or tendered her to defendant after he was appointed administrator of his son's estate. Plaintiff himself says that, when he was settling with defendant in the fall of 1908, he asked him if he was not going to take off something on account of the condition of the mule, and that defendant said he would not. Nevertheless, plaintiff paid the defendant and kept the mule two years longer, and in 1910 brought this action.

No principle of law or of justice is better settled than that money paid voluntarily, with full knowledge of all the facts, cannot be recovered back. Hardaway v. Railway, 90 S. C. 475, 73 S. E. 1020. There is not a title of evidence that plaintiff did not know all the facts when he paid for the mule, or that the payment was not voluntary. On the contrary, his own evidence is that he did know of her defects, and asked defendant to deduct something from the purchase price on account of them, which defendant declined to do. I know of no principle of law or justice that will permit plaintiff to recover the money paid under such circumstances.

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 107*)—SUFFICIENCY OF MEMORANDUM.

There was sufficient written memorandum to take a contract of sale out of the statute of frauds, where there was a memorandum made to the "Spartan Grain & Flour Company," though the buyer traded under the name "Spartan Grain & Mill Company," and where there were letters from the buyer, referring to and admitting the contract, and letters from the seller to the buyer, calling on him to order the goods out, and inclosing a bill therefor.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by R. E. Allen Bro. & Co. against Warren Dupre Burnett. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Carson & Boyd, of Spartanburg, for appellant. Sanders & De Pass, of Spartanburg, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This cause was tried before Judge Ernest Gary and a jury on November 22, 1911. The plaintiff brought action to recover damages for breach of contract for sale of 1,000 barrels of flour for future delivery to the defendant at the price of $6.35 per barrel on March 31, 1910, on which date the defendant's right to order out the flour expired. The plaintiff alleged the price of flour went down, and he was damaged in the sum of $750 by reason of the defendant's failure to order the flour out. The complaint alleged that it was the bona fide intention of the parties that the flour should be actually delivered and received in kind. The answer admitted that the defendant was doing business under the name of Spartan Grain & Mill Company; denied all the other allegations of the complaint, and set up as defense the statute of frauds. Verdict was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals on exceptions set out in the record. These exceptions raise practically three questions:

[1] (1) The sufficiency of the written memorandum to take the case out of the statute of frauds. The record shows that when attorney for plaintiff offered in evidence the memorandum referred to and testified to as made by R. E. Allen, Jr., defendant's attorney simply objected to the introduction of the memorandum, and stated no grounds of objection. In addition to this, the defendant in his evidence admits purchasing the flour, and the letters of defendant to plaintiff, three in number, admitted by the evidence of defendant, establish the fact that the defendant purchased the flour. Defendant, while testifying, admitted that he had purchased the flour; and his reason for not taking it was that he was overstocked. In the case of Louisville Co. v. Lorick & Lowrance, 29 S. C. 533, 8 S. E. 8, 2 L. R. A. 212, it was decided that there was a memorandum made by the salesman, and afterwards there was a letter written by the defendant, countermanding the same; that the two papers together constituted a sufficient writing to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Here we have the memorandum made out to the Spartan Grain & Flour Company, instead of to the Spartan Grain & Mill Company; but we have the admission of the defendant in his testimony that he was the Spartan Grain & Mill Company, and that he purchased the flour. We have in evidence letters from the defendant company, referring to and admitting the contract to purchase the flour; also letters from the plaintiff to defendant, calling on defendant to order the flour out, and inclosing a bill for the flour. This is a sufficient compliance to take it out of the statute of frauds. This exception is overruled.

[2] Exceptions 2 and 3 question the rulings of the court on the admissibility of the evidence over defendant's objection. The letters referred to in the exceptions are from the defendant to the plaintiff. They were competent, as far as they went, to show an admission on the part of the defendant that he had purchased the flour and admitted the contract and wished a cancellation of it. Any admission in the letters as to whether the parties had made the contract in dispute was competent to go to the jury. They were admitted for this purpose, and were competent to that extent. They were not admitted for the purpose of showing an offer of compromise had been made, but to establish the fact that the contract of sale had been entered into. The issue here was, Was there a contract entered into between the parties? and any admission on the part of defendant, either orally or in writing, to establish that fact or elucidate it was competent to go to the jury. In considering the question whether the evidence offered is an offer of compromise or the admission of a fact, the court says, in Hartford Bridge Co. v. Granger, 4 Conn. 143: "The law on this subject has often been misconceived; and it is time that it would be firmly established. It is never the intentment of the law to shut out the truth, but to repel any inference which may arise from the proposition made, not with design to admit the existence of a fact, but merely to buy one's peace. If an admission, however, is made because it is a fact, the evidence to prove it is competent, whatever motive can have prompted the declaration." In the same case the court says that the question to be considered is, What was the view and intention of the party making the admission? If the intention was to admit a fact, then the testimony is competent.

In Colburn v. Groton, 66 N. H. 151, 28 Atl. 95, 22 L. R. A. 763, we find: "The preliminary question always is, not merely whether an admission of a fact was made during a settlement or negotiation, but whether a statement or act was intended to be an admission. It is a question, not of time or circumstance, but of intention. An offer of payment, whether accepted or rejected, is evidence, when the party making it understood it to be and made it as an admission of his liability." "Any declaration or admission made by a party to a suit against his or her interest, either in or out of court, can be established by any one who heard the declaration or admission." McGahan v. Crawford, 47 S. C. 578, 25 S. E. 127. "The voluntary declarations or admissions of a party to a civil suit against his interest are clearly receivable in evidence." McGahan v. Crawford, 47 S. C. 578, 25 S. E. 127. These exceptions are overruled.

[3] Exceptions 4 and 5 allege error on the part of the circuit judge in charging on the facts and passing upon the force and effect of the testimony, and excluding from the jury the consideration of any facts in the case, except the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff, and in not setting aside the verdict of the jury and granting a new trial. An inspection of the whole record will show that the contract in the case is made up by the memorandum of sale, the correspondence between the plaintiff and defendant, and the admissions by the defendant. It is the duty of the judge to construe all contracts which are in writing. We do not think that the record anywhere shows any reversible error on the part of his honor, the circuit judge.

The exceptions are overruled, and judgment of the circuit court affirmed.

JOHNSON v. BONNER.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1003*)—REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY AND WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

Questions, in actions at law, as to the sufficiency of evidence to sustain a verdict, and as to preponderance of evidence, cannot be considered by the Supreme Court on appeal.

2. TRIAL (§ 25*)—ORDER OF PROOF.

Defendant, having admitted plaintiff's case and set up an affirmative defense, was entitled to the opening and reply.

3. TRIAL (§ 68*)—ORDER OF PROOF.

The trial judge did not abuse his discretion in allowing plaintiff to introduce evidence at the close of the case, preserving defendant's right to reply.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Cherokee County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

Action by H. M. Johnson, trading as the Gaffney Live Stock Company, against E. B. Bonner. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ottis & Dobson, of Spartanburg, for appellant. Butler & Hall, of Gaffney, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The plaintiff brought this action, in claim and delivery, for the possession of the mule described in the mortgage set up in the complaint.

The mortgage was executed by one William Sam'l Lipscomb, from whom the defendant bought the mule. The answer of the defendant alleges "that the said mule is in his possession, and admits, on information and belief, the execution of the mortgage referred to in said paragraph and the outstanding indebtedness on the same, but alleges that the said mule was released from the lien of said mortgage by the agreement and facts hereinafter set out." The defendant further set up that the mule seized in this action was turned over to this defendant by the said Lipscomb, by agreement with the plaintiff, in place of another mule, also under mortgage, which the plaintiff had previously seized, and that before the exchange the plaintiff had released his mortgage on the mule sued for.

For a third defense, the defendant alleges "that defendant, having paid $200 in good and lawful money to W. S. Lipscomb for the mule which was seized first by plaintiff, and having accepted the mule described in the complaint herein in the place and stead of said mule, as a complete satisfaction for the purchase price paid, as aforesaid, and relying on the agreement and release on the part of plaintiff, as hereinbefore set forth, and not having any knowledge or notice that the said plaintiff had or would make any further interest or claim whatever on the said mule, is a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, from the said W. S. Lipscomb."

It is thus seen that there was but a single question in the case: Did the plaintiff release the mortgage on the mule? The answer to that question was one of fact for the jury, with which this court has nothing to do. That question the presiding judge distinctly and unmistakably presented to the jury. In order not to complicate the matter and confuse the mind of the jury, the judge refused all requests to charge. When there is but a single question, the clearest and shortest statement that can be made is much to be commended.

The jury found for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed upon the following exceptions:

[1] 1. (1) "Because the presiding judge erred in not granting a new trial to defendant on his motion for same, in that the evidence, as adduced before the jury at the trial of this case, was not sufficient to support the verdict of the said jury."

(2) "Because the presiding judge erred in not granting a new trial, in that the testimony clearly shows, by the preponderance of the evidence, that the plaintiff had released the mule referred to in the complaint, and had no right to bring claim and delivery for the possession of same."

Mere insufficiency of evidence and preponderance of evidence cannot be considered by this court in actions at law, and these exceptions are overruled.

[2, 3] 2. (3) "Because the presiding judge erred in allowing the witness H. M. Johnson to testify in reply after the defendant had closed its testimony in reply, the said presiding judge having forced said defendant to open the testimony in the case, in that same was in violation to the rule of evidence and prejudicial to the case of defendant."

The defendant, having admitted the plaintiff's case and set up an affirmative defense, was entitled to the opening and reply. His honor had the right to allow the introduction of the evidence after the other evidence had closed, preserving the defendant's right to reply. The defendant, however, not only did not claim this right, but strenuously denied it. This exception is overruled.

[4] 3. (4) "Because the presiding judge erred in failing to charge the jury the legal bearing of a release in law; and, further, that said release need not be in writing, where same referred to personal property, as defendant requested should be done."

(5) "Because the presiding judge erred in failing to charge the jury that, if the plaintiff did verbally release the said mule from the lien of the mortgage, under which same was seized in this action, as contended by defendant, the plaintiff was estopped from recovering same under this action; defendant having requested that the jury be charged as to same."

His honor presented the question of a release without any restrictions or qualifications, and, as presented, included any form of release. The defendant has no right to complain. This exception is overruled.

[5] 4. (6) "Because the presiding judge erred in holding that the answer of defendant would entitle plaintiff to a judgment, in case defendant put up no testimony, and in further holding that defendant should open the testimony, in that the said answer did not admit that the said mortgage debt was past due, nor that plaintiff was entitled to the possession of said mule, nor that same was in the possession of defendant at the time of seizure."

The sole question raised by the answer was that the mortgage had been released, and that was an affirmative defense; and, unless made out by proof, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. The question as to whether the debt was due or not was not raised in the circuit court, although his honor called for the reason. The objection there was as to a "demand." This exception is overruled.

5. (7) "Because the remarks of the presiding judge as to the plaintiff being entitled to judgment, if defendant put up no testimony, had a tendency to prejudice the case of defendant in the minds of the jury." It is not prejudice, but prejudicial error, that entitled one to a new trial. This exception is overruled.

[6] 6. (8) "Because the presiding judge erred in allowing the witness H. M. Johnson to testify as to the amount of money that he had lost on the party, W. Sam Lipscomb, from whom defendant had purchased the said mule, as said testimony was not relevant, and tended to prejudice defendant's rights." The record shows no objection to this testimony; hence this exception cannot be considered.

[7] 7. (9) "Because the presiding judge erred in not charging the jury as to the defense of innocent third purchaser for value, and without notice; same being set up as a defense in the answer of defendant, and there being some evidence to support said defense." The want of notice was based upon the release. The defendant pleaded the release of this very mortgage. Purchaser for value, without notice, does not apply.

8. (10) "Because the presiding judge further erred in his charge to the jury, in that he used the following language: 'Now, a great many questions have been brought out in this case by the parties on both sides that I do not think are germane to the issues in any respect whatever; therefore I am not going to incur the case with these propositions. The questions for you to decide are those which I have presented to you; they are the rules that are pertinent to this subject, and those are the only questions. I am going to leave them thus, because they will decide the points you may have on that issue.' By charging thus, the presiding judge thus in effect charged on the evidence in the case, taking from the consideration of the jury the issues referred to in the above exceptions, and narrowing the compass of the case in the minds of the jury to an extent particularly prejudicial to defendant's rights." What has already been said fully disposes of this exception, and it is overruled.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

RICHARDSON v. ATLANTIC COAST LUMBER CORPORATION.†

1. ESTOPPEL (§ 38*)—DEEDS—AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE.

Where the grantor of land, with the usual covenants, had no title, but afterwards acquired it, he is estopped to claim that he did not have title at the time of the sale; and the after-acquired title inures to the benefit of his grantee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 99-107; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

2. ESTOPPEL (§ 45*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—NOTICE—RECORDS.

At the time of a conveyance of land, the title to a portion of it was of record in a person other than the grantor, and such person was in possession. The grantor later obtained a conveyance from such owner, but reconveyed before his first grantee had knowledge of the conveyance, and without notice to the later grantee of the prior conveyance. Held, that the first grantee is estopped to rely on the record of the conveyance to him as constructive notice to the subsequent purchaser without actual notice, because of his own constructive notice of his grantor's lack of title, and so cannot assert his title as a cloud on that of the later taker.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 231*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—NOTICE—RECORDS.

A grantor conveyed land, the title to which was of record in another, who later conveyed to him, but accepted a reconveyance without actual knowledge that there had been a transfer, including such land, prior to the time the grantor acquired title. Held, that to require a grantee in good faith to search the records prior to the time his grantor obtained title would entail upon him too much inconvenience, contrary to the spirit of the recording act and public policy, and, as the grantor's title was clear after the conveyance to him, the prior conveyance could not be asserted as a cloud on the later.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marion County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Thomas Monroe Richardson against the Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. C. Woods, of Marion, for appellant.
L. M. Gasque and A. F. Woods, both of Marion, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This appeal raises the question whether the record of a deed conveying certain lands, with the usual covenants of warranty, which includes a tract of which the grantor was not then owner, but which was subsequently conveyed to him by the owner, and afterwards reconveyed to the owner by him, affords such constructive notice as will prevent the owner from relying upon the plea of purchaser for valuable consideration, without notice, against the grantee of the recorded deed, when it appears that the owner was in the actual possession of his land, under a previously recorded deed, at the time it was wrongfully conveyed.

The facts are thus stated in the brief of the appellant's attorney: "B. Talley Richardson and T. Monroe Richardson are father and son, and reside together in Button's Neck township, Marion county. On February 24, 1899, B. Talley Richardson conveyed to Tilghman Lumber Company, with general warranty, certain timber and easement on 168 acres, more or less. This conveyance was duly recorded. By successive conveyances, also all duly recorded, the timber and easements conveyed by Richardson to Tilghman Lumber Company became the property of Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation. It subsequently transpired that Richardson did not own all of the land within the boundaries, on which he undertook to convey the timber and easements, but that the boundaries in his grant included about 25 acres that belonged to his son, T. Monroe Richardson. On October 22, 1904, while the grant to Tilghman Lumber Company was still of force, T. Monroe Richardson conveyed to B. Talley Richardson the 25 acres in question, and B. Talley Richardson became the owner in fee of all of the land embraced within the boundaries of the timber deed. B. Talley Richardson retained title to the 25 acres until November 8, 1907, a little over three years, when he conveyed the same back to T. Monroe Richardson. In 1908 the Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, claiming under the grant to Tilghman Lumber Company, which was still of force, entered upon the entire tract of land and cut the timber therefrom, including the 25 acres which originally belonged to T. Monroe Richardson, which T. Monroe Richardson had conveyed to his father, B. Talley Richardson, and which B. Talley Richardson had reconveyed to his son, T. Monroe Richardson. T.

Monroe Richardson then sued for damages for the timber cut, and recovered a verdict for $750 actual damages and $150 punitive damages. The Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation in due time appealed to this court, and the cause now comes to this court on the exceptions set forth in the record."

To which should be added the statement that the respondent, T. M. Richardson, went into possession of the 15 acres of land under a deed from J. T. and Martha Dimery, dated the 3d of May, 1892, which was recorded on the 21st of July, 1892, and he has continued in actual possession thereof without interruption, except by the alleged trespass of the defendant, until the commencement of this action.

In the language of the appellant's attorneys, the ruling of his honor, the presiding judge, was as follows: "Defendant claimed at the trial below, and still claims under this state of facts, that when B. Talley Richardson acquired the title to the land on which his son's timber stood, under his general warranty, the title to the timber which stood on this land immediately inured to the benefit of the grantees of the Tilghman Lumber Company, and became vested in them. His honor ruled and charged that, had B. Talley Richardson continued to hold title to the land which originally belonged to his son, he would be estopped from denying the title of Tilghman Lumber Company's grantees, but that his son would not be estopped from denying such title, unless the son had actual notice of the claim of the grantee of the Tilghman Lumber Company; and, further, that the fact that the deed of the Tilghman Lumber Company and its grantees being recorded was no notice with which the son was chargeable." We shall discuss this question at some length, as it is, perhaps, one of the most important, affecting the title to real estate.

[1] The principle is settled beyond controversy in this state that if a grantor conveys land, with the usual covenants of warranty, to which at that time he has no title, but afterwards acquires a title, he is estopped from claiming that he did not have title at the time of the sale; and the after-acquired title inures to the benefit of his grantee. Craig v. Reeder, 3 McCord, 411; Robertson v. Sharpton, 17 S. C. 592; Gaffney v. Peeler, 21 S. C. 55. But the question now under consideration has not heretofore been judicially determined in this state.

The principle is thus stated in Pom. Eq. Jur. vol. 2, § 658: "If the records show a good title vested in the vendor at a certain date, and nothing done by him after that time to impair or incumber the title, it would seem that the policy of the registry acts is thereby accomplished; the purchaser is protected; he is not bound to inquire further back, and to ascertain whether the vendor has done acts which may impair his title, prior to the time at which it was vested in him, as indicated by the records. This view is supported by many decisions—it seems by the weight of authority—which hold that a purchaser need not prosecute a search for deeds or mortgages, made by his own vendor, further back than the time at which the title is shown by the records to have been vested in such vendor; or, in other words, a purchaser is not bound by the registry of deeds or mortgages from his vendor, made prior to that time."

When B. T. Richardson reconveyed the land to T. M. Richardson on the 8th of November, 1907, there was nothing upon the record indicating that B. T. Richardson had ever acquired any other title than that derived from T. M. Richardson on the 22d of October, 1904.

Section 214 of Wade on Notice is as follows: "The purchaser is not charged with notice from the record of conveyances from his grantor, prior to such grantor's acquisition of title. In such cases the subsequent purchaser would not be estopped by the record of a mortgage from his grantor prior to the date of his grantor's deed. To hold otherwise would be to impose on the purchaser the duty of examining the records indefinitely." And in section 216 the same author says: "Upon both principle and authority, it seems more consonant with the recording acts to absolve purchasers from the duty of examining the records for conveyances from their grantors prior to the time when they had a title to convey."

In Wheeler v. Young, 76 Conn. 44, 55 Atl. 670, the rule is thus stated: "To carry this doctrine to the extent of giving priority to the title of one who, from his negligent failure to examine the records, has been induced to purchase land of a person having no title, over that of one who, without negligence, in good faith and for value, and without knowledge of such prior deed, has purchased after his grant, or has acquired title from one having both the legal and record title, is opposed to the principles of equity and to the spirit of our registry laws. * * * The doctrine of estoppel is one which, when properly applied, 'concludes the truth in order to prevent fraud and falsehood, and imposes silence on a party only when, in conscience and honesty, he should not be allowed to speak.' Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 11 How. 297 [13 L. Ed. 703]."

In the case of Doswell v. Buchanan's Executors, 3 Leigh (Va.) 365, 23 Am. Dec. 280, the court uses this language: "The enrollment and registry acts of England and our recording acts are expressly declared to be made for the benefit of subsequent purchasers; to protect them from secret conveyances. These acts, then, ought not to be turned to the injury of those for whose benefit they were made, unless it be in obedience to some express provision contained in them. But there is none such. They declare that all deeds, etc., shall be void as to subsequent purchasers, unless duly recorded; but they nowhere declare that such recording shall charge the subsequent purchasers with notice of the deed. If not recorded, the deed is void as to him; if recorded, it is only so far valid that it passes to the bargainee the title it purports to convey, provided the bargainor had that title; if he had it not, the deed cannot pass it, though recorded, nor will the putting of it on record affect the conscience of a subsequent purchaser of the legal title with the equity which the deed raised between the bargainor and the bargainee. The laws had no such intention; nor will their words bear such construction. That this is settled doctrine in England, there are many cases to show"—citing numerous cases.

The court, in the case of Bingham v. Kirkland, 34 N. J. Eq. 229, thus discusses the effect that would follow if the record in such cases should be construed to give constructive notice: "It would involve a search against every person whom the title in its transmission had ever touched, not merely for the period during which such person held the title, but for a period anterior thereto, during which any incumbrance might have been made and still exist. Such a construction of the scope of constructive notice, imputed to a subsequent purchaser by our recording acts, is opposed to the sentiment of the bar of this state, as it has existed from the earliest period of their enactment. The system of searching practiced, so far as I know or have been informed, without any deviation, has been to trace the line of record title, and search against each owner during the period that he held the title. The titles to the real estate in this state rest upon searches made in conformity to this view. And it is a sensible view. No one is supposed to convey or incumber property which he does not own. 'Non dat qui non habet.'"

In Blake v. Graham, 6 Ohio St. 580, 67 Am. Dec. 360, the rule is thus stated: "It is well settled that the record or registry of a deed is constructive notice only to those who claim through or under the grantor by whom such deed was executed. * * * In the last-named case (Bates v. Norcross, 14 Pick. [Mass.] 224), the court says: 'To hold the proprietors of land to take notice of the records of deeds, to determine whether some stranger has without right made conveyances of their lands, would be a most dangerous doctrine, and cannot be sustained with any color of reason or authority. * * * These rules rest upon the obvious reason that a searcher can be fairly supposed to be made acquainted with the contents of such deeds only as, in the process of tracing link by link his chain of title on the record, necessarily pass under his inspection.'"

Judge Hare, in a note to the Duchess of Kingston's Case, 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. (8th Ed.) 734, says: "It necessarily tends to give a vendee, who has been careless enough to buy what the vendor has not to sell, a preference over subsequent purchasers, who have expended their money in good faith, and without being guilty of negligence." He was therefore opposed to a doctrine that was so unjust.

In the case of Ford v. Unity Church, 120 Mo. 498, 25 S. W. 394, 23 L. R. A. 561, 41 Am. St. Rep. 711, to which there is a valuable and exhaustive note, the court quotes with approval the following language from Mr. Rawle's excellent work on Covenants for Title, as follows: "This rule, when applied to the case of a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, cannot harmonize with the spirit of our registry laws in force in this country, and leads to the position, which certainly cannot be considered as tenable, that a purchaser must search the registry of deeds, not only from the time when his grantor acquired title, but also for a series of years before that time, in order to discover whether he had previously made any conveyance (though without title) to any other person; for, if he had, that person, according to this doctrine, holds the estate as against this person, and, if the property has passed through several hands, a similar search must be made as to each." After making this quotation, the court uses this language: "He says nothing is more simple than what is termed 'the line of title.' It is that the first purchaser should search the title for the deed to his vendor, and trace the title thence back to its source. If he finds no title in him, as would have been the case here, then it is his fault if he takes the deed. Now, as to the second purchaser—one who buys after the vendor acquires a title. He searches until he finds the deed to his vendor, and traces the title back to its source. He finds it regular, and that since his vendor acquired the title he has not conveyed to any one else. He is not expected to look for conveyances from his vendor prior to the time the vendor acquired the title. 'Yet,' as Mr. Rawle says, 'according to the practical effect of the doctrine now being considered, and apart from counterequities, the purchaser who has brought himself within all the provisions of the registry laws, is not protected at all, if his vendor had, before he had acquired title, conveyed to another, with covenants, a title which was without existence or value.'"

The court announced the rule just stated, although the following statute was then of force: "If any person shall convey any real estate by conveyance, purporting to convey the same in fee simple absolute, and shall not at the time of such conveyance have the legal estate in such real estate, but shall afterwards acquire the same, the legal estate subsequently acquired shall immediately pass to the grantee, and such conveyance shall be void, as if such legal estate had been in the grantor at the time of the conveyance."

[2, 3] The reasons which gave rise to the rule in such cases are: (1) That the grantee is estopped by his conduct from relying upon the record as constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser for value, without notice, because he is guilty of an act of wrong by failing to exercise due diligence to ascertain whether his grantor has a good title, and thus by his negligence participate in casting a cloud upon the title of the owner. (2) A contrary doctrine would not only entail much inconvenience in searching the records, but would render titles to land, to a great extent, uncertain; such a result being against the spirit of the recording acts, as well as against public policy.

The rule is especially applicable in the present case, for the reason that both the grantor and grantee had at least constructive notice of T. M. Richardson's title, not only from the fact that he was in possession, but from his recorded deed. The exceptions raising this question are overruled.

All other questions presented by the exceptions are either dependent upon the conclusions hereinbefore announced, or the appellant has failed to show that there was prejudicial error.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. HERTZOG et al.

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 83*)—IMPRISONMENT—VIOLATION OF CONSTITUTION.

Cr. Code 1902, § 338, providing that it shall be the duty of any contractor or contractors, in the erection or repairing of any building, to pay all laborers, subcontractors, and materialmen out of the money furnished for such erection or repairing, and that said laborers, subcontractors, and materialmen shall have the first lien on such money, but that nothing shall prevent any contractor from borrowing money on such contract, and that no contractor who shall expend money loaned upon such contract or received thereon, and on that account fail to pay any laborers, subcontractors, or materialmen, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment, is not a violation of the Constitution in providing imprisonment for debt; the offense arising out of the wrongful misappropriation of money received under the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 150-151½; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 48*)—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—VALIDITY.

It is the duty of the court, when a statute can be given a reasonable meaning consistent with the Constitution, to construe it as having such meaning, in order to uphold its validity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 46; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 238*)—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAW—REASONABLE CLASSIFICATION.

Nor is the above section a violation of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, or Const. art. 1, § 5, in depriving building contractors of the equal protection of laws by an arbitrary classification; the state having a wide discretion in making classifications in the exercise of its police power, and building contractors being usually of a much less financial responsibility than railroad and paving contractors.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 15*)—REPEAL—GENERAL LAW—SPECIAL LAW—OFFENSES.

Cr. Code 1902, § 337, contains the general law for the punishment of the offense of disposing of personal property which is subject to liens; while section 338, enacted subsequently, makes it a misdemeanor for building contractors to dispose of moneys received under the contract, without paying laborers, materialmen, and subcontractors. Held that, as the latter section specifically applies to offenses of building contractors, those offenses are taken out of the scope of the general provision of the earlier section.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1030*)—APPEAL—PRESENTATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW IN COURT BELOW.

An objection that a criminal statute is unconstitutional, because its penal provision is not a subject expressed in the title of the act, not having been raised in the court below, cannot be reviewed on appeal.

Gary, C. J., and Watts and Fraser, JJ., and De Vore, Circuit Judge, dissenting.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Marlboro County.

"To be officially reported."

E. L. Hertzog and R. H. Rudisall were indicted for disposing of money subject to a statutory lien, and from an order denying a motion to quash the indictment, they appeal. Modified and affirmed.

The following are the reasons of appeal which the court requests shall be published:

"First. Because the indictment contains three counts, two under the act of 1896 [Act March 2, 1896, 22 St. at Large, p. 198], as amended by the act of 1897 [Act March 2, 1897, 22 St. at Large, p. 487]. And the third under the act making it a misdemeanor to dispose of property under a lien without the written consent of the lienor, and cannot be sustained as to the third count of the indictment, for the reason that the special remedy provided by the acts of 1896 and 1897 is exclusive and must be pursued.

"Second. Because the indictment does not state facts sufficient to constitute an offense, as to the first and second counts, against the laws of South Carolina, in that the statute under which it is brought is in violation of article 1, § 24, of the Constitution, which is as follows, 'No person shall be imprisoned for debt, except in cases of fraud,' in that the statute makes the mere failure of the contractor, erecting buildings, to pay laborers or persons furnishing materials received by him, a misdemeanor, without providing that the failure to pay must be fraudulent, or that there must be fraud on the part of the contractor in failing to do so. The statute punishes a person by imprisonment for failing to pay a debt.

"Third. In that the said statute is in violation of Article 1, § 5, of the Constitution of South Carolina, which is as follows: 'The privileges and immunities of citizens of this state and of the United States under this Constitution shall not be abridged, nor shall any person be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, nor shall any person be denied the equal protection of the laws.'

"(A) In that contractors, building houses, are only made indictable for failure to pay over to laborers and materialmen money received by them, while all other contractors are exempt from indictment.

"(B) The statute does not give equal protection to other kinds of laborers than laborers on buildings, and to other materialmen than those furnishing materials for buildings.

"(C) The statute discriminates in favor of laborers on buildings and persons furnishing materials for buildings, and against all other kinds of laborers and materialmen.

"(D) The statute does not give the equal protection of the law to a class similarly situated, because all laborers are to be classified together, and all materialmen are to be classified together; whereas in the statute only laborers on buildings and persons furnishing materials on same are entitled to be paid, else the contractor makes himself criminally liable.

"(E) All contractors belong to a class similarly situated. But this statute discriminates against contractors erecting buildings, makes them liable to indictment for doing that which other contractors may do with impunity.

"Fourth. The statute is in conflict with the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it does not afford equal protection of the laws.

"Fifth. Because by the terms of the act the offense of breach of trust with fraudulent intent is not created, for the reason that the lien is created on the property of the contractor, and not on that of the laborer or person furnishing materials, and there could be no breach of trust in the using of money, which is his own property, by the contractor."

Solicitor J. Monroe Spears, of Darlington, D. D. McColl, J. W. Le Grand, and J. K. Owens, all of Bennettsville, for the State. Nicholls & Nicholls, of Spartanburg, and Townsend & Rogers, of Bennettsville, for appellants.

WOODS, J. This appeal is from an order of the court of general sessions, refusing to quash an indictment against the defendant containing counts charging disposition by him of money subject to a statutory lien, in violation of sections 337 and 338 of the Criminal Code. Section 337 is the familiar statute which, in general terms, made a criminal offense the disposition of any personal property upon which a lien exists, without paying the lien debt, or depositing the amount of it with the clerk of the court.

[1, 2] The case turns mainly on the constitutionality of the penal provisions of section 338, which reads as follows: "It shall be the duty of any contractor or contractors, in the erection, alteration or repairing of buildings in the state of South Carolina, to pay all laborers, subcontractors and materialmen for their lawful services and material furnished out of the money received for the erection, alteration or repairs of buildings upon which said laborers, subcontractors and materialmen are employed or interested, and said laborers, as well as all subcontractors and persons who shall furnish material for said building, shall have a first lien on the money received by said contractor or contractors for the erection, alteration or repair of said buildings in proportion to the amount of their respective claims. Nothing herein contained shall make the owner of the building responsible in any way: Provided, that nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prevent any contractor or contractors or subcontractors from borrowing money on such contract. Any contractor or contractors or subcontractors who shall, for other purposes than paying the money loaned upon said contract, expend and on that account fail to pay to any or all laborers, subcontractors and materialmen out of the money received as provided in this section and as admitted by such contractor or contractors, or as may be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction, when the consideration for such work and material shall exceed the value of one hundred dollars, shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, or imprisonment not less than three months nor more than twelve months; and when such consideration shall not exceed the value of one hundred dollars, shall be fined not more than one hundred dollars or imprisoned not longer than thirty days: Provided, said contractor or contractors or subcontractors may have the right of arbitration by agreement with said laborers, subcontractors and materialmen."

The specific charge against the defendant under this section is that, as a contractor for the alteration and repair of certain buildings of W. S. Mowry, he collected $1,723.12, and expended it for other purposes than paying the money loaned on the contract, and on that account failed to pay R. J. Easterling Company for material furnished to the amount of $606.62.

Defendant contends that the criminal enactment of section 338 is unconstitutional, in that (1) it provides imprisonment for debt without proof of fraud; and (2) it arbitrarily discriminates against contractors for buildings by creating a lien on money received by them in favor of subcontractors, laborers, and materialmen, and by making them criminally liable for failure to apply the money received on their contracts to the discharge of the lien, while no such burdens are imposed on other contractors.

If the court can discern in the statute any reasonable meaning consistent with the Constitution, it must adopt that as the true meaning, in order to uphold the statute. Taking the section in its entirety, it cannot fairly be construed to provide for imprisonment for the mere failure to pay a debt. The first paragraph impresses on the money received by the contractor on his contract a lien in favor of laborers, subcontractors, and materialmen. The second paragraph enacts that, if the contractor shall pay out the specific fund which has come into his hands, and which must remain there subject to the lien, for other purposes than paying the money loaned on his contract, and on that account fail to pay laborers, subcontractors, and materialmen out of the money so subject to their lien, then he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. This being so, the natural and, indeed, the only reasonable construction of the statute is that it makes penal, not the mere failure to pay a debt, but the disposition by the contractor of a specific sum of money held by him under a lien, so as to defeat the lien. Under this construction, the statute does not violate the constitutional inhibition against imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud. On this point the case falls entirely outside the principle on which Ex parte Hollman, 79 S. C. 9, 60 S. E. 19, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242, 14 Ann. Cas. 1105, was decided, and within the rule laid down in State v. Barden, 64 S. C. 207, 41 S. E. 959.

[3] Unsound, also, is the objection that the statute violates the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States and section 5, art. 1, of the Constitution of this state. The rules with respect to the legislative power under the fourteenth amendment have been thus restated by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the recent case of Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 31 Sup. Ct. 337, 55 L.

Ed. 369: "(1) The equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment does not take from the state the power to classify in the adoption of police laws, but admits of the exercise of a wide scope of discretion in that regard, and avoids what is done only when it is without any reasonable basis, and therefore is purely arbitrary. (2) A classification having some reasonable basis does not offend against that clause, merely because it is not made with mathematical nicety, or because in practice it results in some inequality. (3) When the classification in such a law is called in question, if any state of facts reasonably can be conceived that would sustain it, the existence of that state of facts at the time the law was enacted must be assumed. (4) One who assails the classification in such a law must carry the burden of showing that it does not rest upon any reasonable basis, but is essentially arbitrary."

A like construction has been placed by this court on section 5, art. 1, of the state Constitution, which, on this point, is like the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Simmons v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 63 S. C. 430, 41 S. E. 521, 57 L. R. A. 607; Johnson v. Spartan Mills, 68 S. C. 339, 47 S. E. 695, 1 Ann. Cas. 409. The classification here is far from being arbitrary. Contractors for the erection, alteration, and repair of buildings in the main, do work on a much smaller scale than contractors for railroads or streets or other works. Many, if not the majority, of the former are men of small means, and generally their laborers, subcontractors, and materialmen must be paid, if paid at all, from the funds received on the contract. Without casting about for other reasonable grounds of classification, it is enough to say that the defendant has not discharged the burden which the law places on him of showing that the classification is altogether arbitrary.

[4] The motion to quash the third count of the indictment, framed under section 337 of the Criminal Code, we think, should have been granted. Section 337 contains the general law for punishment of the offense of disposing of personal property under liens. Section 338, enacted later, contains the special provisions on the same subject applicable only to liens in favor of certain persons on certain moneys in the hands of contractors for the erection, repair, and alteration of buildings. Construing the two statutes together, it is manifest that section 338 must be regarded as taking the special liens and the disposition of money subject to them out of the general provision of law contained in section 337, and providing a different and an exclusive punishment for the disposition of money subject to such liens. It follows that, for the criminal disposition of money subject to the lien provided for in section 338, a contractor can be indicted only under that section.

[5] The point that the statute now standing in the Criminal Code as section 338 was not enacted as required by the Constitution, because the penal provision is a subject not expressed in the title of the act as passed in 1896, not having been made in the circuit court, is not available to the defendant in this court.

The judgment of the circuit court is modified according to the views herein expressed.

HYDRICK, J., and ERNEST GARY, PRINCE, GAGE, MEMMINGER, WILSON, SEASE, and FRANK B. GARY, Circuit Judges, concur.

GARY, C. J. (dissenting). This is an appeal from an order refusing to quash an indictment, charging the defendant with a violation of sections 337 and 338 of the Criminal Code, which are as follows:

Section 337: "Any person or persons, who shall sell or dispose of any personal property, on which any mortgage or other lien exists, without the written consent of the mortgagee or lienor, or the owner or holder of such mortgage or lien, and shall fail to pay the debt secured by the same, within ten days after such sale or disposal, or shall fail in such time to deposit the amount of the said debt with the clerk of the court of common pleas for the county in which the mortgage or lien debtor resides, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned," etc.

Section 338: "It shall be the duty of any contractor or contractors, in the erection, alteration or repairing of buildings in the state of South Carolina, to pay all laborers, subcontractors and materialmen for their lawful services and material furnished out of the money received for the erection, alterations or repairs of buildings upon which said laborers, subcontractors and materialmen are employed or interested, and said laborers, as well as all subcontractors and persons who shall furnish material for said building, shall have a first lien on the money received by said contractor or contractors for the erection, alteration or repair of said buildings in proportion to the amount of their respective claims. Nothing herein contained shall make the owner of the building responsible in any way: Provided, that nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prevent any contractor or contractors or subcontractors from borrowing money on such contract. Any contractor or contractors or subcontractors, who shall, for other purposes than paying the money loaned upon said contract, expend and on that account fail to pay to any or all laborers, subcontractors and materialmen out of the money received as provided in this section and as admitted by such contractor or contractors, or as may be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction, when the consideration for such work and material shall exceed the value of one hundred dollars, shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, or imprisonment not less than three months nor more than twelve months; and when such consideration shall not exceed the value of one hundred dollars, shall be fined not more than one hundred dollars or imprisoned not longer than thirty days: Provided, said contractor or contractors or subcontractors may have the right of arbitration by agreement with said laborers, subcontractors and materialmen."

The appellant's exceptions will be reported.

The first question that will be considered is whether laborers, subcontractors, and materialmen have a lien, under section 338, for services rendered and material furnished by them, on money received by the contractor from those with whom he entered into the contract to erect the buildings, etc.

The appellant's attorneys, in their argument, contend that the act of 1896 (Act March 2, 1896, 22 St. at Large, p. 198), whose provisions are incorporated in the Criminal Code as section 338, is unconstitutional, on the ground that it violates section 17, art. 3, of the Constitution, which provides that "every act or resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." This question, however, is not properly before the court for consideration, as it was not urged on circuit, and there has been no ruling upon it.

As the statute, in express terms, gives a lien to laborers, subcontractors, and materialmen, it must be held that they have such right, unless it is obnoxious to some other provision of the Constitution. And it is next contended that it is repugnant to section 24, art. 1, of the Constitution, which provides that "no person shall be imprisoned for debt, except in cases of fraud."

The title of the act of 1896 is "An act to require contractors, in the erection, alteration or repairing of buildings, to pay laborers, subcontractors and materialmen for their services and material furnished." Our construction of that act is that section 1 thereof was intended to provide a civil remedy to protect the rights of laborers, subcontractors and materialmen. It creates a lien in their favor on money received by the contractor for the erection, alteration, or repairing of buildings, and likewise makes it the duty of the contractor to pay them, for their services and the material furnished, out of the money received by the contractor. Section 2 was intended to punish the contractor criminally for failing to pay the laborers, subcontractors, and materialmen out of the money received by him for the erection, alteration, or repairing of buildings. The act was not intended to punish him for disposing of property under lien. The title of the act and the language of section 2 show that it was not intended to provide a punishment for disposing of property under lien (as the word "lien" is not mentioned in either of them), but for failure to pay the amount due the laborers, sub-laborers, and materialmen. Section 2 of the act of 1896 is therefore repugnant to section 24, art. 1, of the Constitution. Ex parte Hollman, 79 S. C. 9, 60 S. E. 19, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242, 14 Ann. Cas. 1105; Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219, 31 Sup. Ct. 145, 35 L. Ed. 191.

The next question to be determined is whether the first and second sections of the act of 1896 are so interdependent that one cannot operate without the other. The rule is thus stated in Cooley's Con. Lim. p. 209: "If, when the unconstitutional portion is stricken out, that which remains is complete in itself, and capable of being executed, in accordance with the apparent legislative intent, wholly independent of that which was rejected, it must be sustained. * * * If a statute attempts to accomplish two or more objects, and is void as to one, it may still be in every respect complete and valid as to the other. But if its purpose is to accomplish a single object only, and some of its provisions are void, the whole must fall, unless sufficient remains to effect the object, without the aid of the invalid portion. And, if they are so mutually connected with and dependent upon each other, as conditions, considerations, or compensations for each other, as to warrant the belief that the Legislature intended them as a whole, and, if all could not be carried into effect, the Legislature would not pass the residue independently, then, if some parts are unconstitutional, all the provisions which are thus dependent, conditional, or connected must fall with them." See, also, Gilreath v. Greenville, 63 S. C. 75, 40 S. E. 1023.

Section 1 of the act of 1896 was intended to create a civil remedy; while section 2 had in contemplation a criminal proceeding for the punishment of a contractor who failed to pay the parties therein mentioned out of the money received by him. The two remedies are, in every respect, separate and distinct; and there is no reasonable ground for supposing that the Legislature would not have enacted section 1, if it had known that section 2 could not be carried into effect.

The appellant's attorneys recognize this principle; for, in their argument, they say: "We do not contend that the first section is unconstitutional, for the reason that the power of the Legislature to create liens by statute cannot be denied; but we contend that the second section is unconstitutional."

The next question for consideration is whether the statute is in violation of section 5, art. 1, of the Constitution, which is as follows: "The privileges and immunities of citizens of this state, and of the United States under this Constitution, shall not be abridged, nor shall any person be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, nor shall any person be denied the equal protection of the laws."

The principle is thus stated in the case of Simmons v. Telegraph Co., 63 S. C. 425, 41 S. E. 521, 57 L. R. A. 607: "Legislation is not unequal nor discriminatory, in the sense of the equality clause of the Constitution, merely because it is special or limited to a particular class. The decisions of the United States Supreme Court establish that the Legislature has power to make a classification of persons or property, for public purposes, provided such classification is not arbitrary and bears reasonable relation to the purpose to be effectuated, and that the equality clause is not violated, when all within the designated class are treated alike."

The case of Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 17 Sup. Ct. 255, 41 L. Ed. 666, decides that the classification must not be arbitrary; that is, "must always rest upon some difference which bears a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect to which the classification is proposed." Also that such classification must be "based upon some reasonable ground, some difference which bears a just and proper relation to the attempted classification, and is not a merely arbitrary selection." This language is quoted with approval in Porter v. Railway, 63 S. C. 169, 41 S. E. 108, 90 Am. St. Rep. 670, Simmons v. Telegraph Co., 63 S. C. 425, 41 S. E. 521, 57 L. R. A. 607, and Oil Co. v. Spartanburg, 66 S. C. 37, 44 S. E. 377. These authorities are conclusive of this question; and show that the classification is not obnoxious to section 5, art. 1, of the Constitution.

The appellant also contended that the act of 1896 was inimical to the fourteenth amendment of the United States Constitution, which provides that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. What has just been said disposes of this question.

Construing the valid portion of section 338 with section 337 of the Criminal Code, it will be seen that section 338 creates a lien on money received by contractors in the manner therein mentioned; and that section 337 is applicable to such a lien. Section 337 was construed by the court in the case of State v. Barden, 64 S. C. 206, 41 S. E. 959, and it was held that it was not in conflict with section 5, art. 1, of the Constitution.

The defendants cannot be tried under that count of the indictment charging a violation of section 338 of the Criminal Code, but can be tried under section 337 for unlawfully disposing of the money covered by the lien described in section 338 of the Criminal Code.

For these reasons, I dissent.

WATTS, J., concurs.

FRASER, J. (dissenting). I do not see my way clear to concur in either of the opinions which have been prepared in this case. It would be a needless waste of time and space to again copy the statutes. I know the Supreme Court, in State v. Barden, 64 S. C. 207, 41 S. E. 959, held that section 337 is constitutional; but be it remembered that we are now in the court en banc, the great constitutional court of this state; and, if the court en banc is bound by any other decision, it certainly is bound by its own decision in Ex parte Hollman, 79 S. C. at page 13, 60 S. E. at page 21, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242, 14 Ann. Cas. 1105: "We shall not discuss at length the doctrine of stare decisis. It seems obvious it has less force when the constitutional right of the citizen to his personal liberty is involved than in those cases involving the fixedness of property rights and the regularity of procedure. With the profoundest respect for the judges who delivered and concurred in these opinions, we cannot avoid the conclusion that the statute in question provides for imprisonment for debt without proof of fraud, and therefore attempts to deprive the citizen of one of the personal rights guaranteed by the Constitution of the state."

It seems to me we are bound to follow the Hollman Case, and not the Barden Case, which, in my judgment, is overruled by the Hollman Case. In my opinion, the cases are hopelessly in conflict, and the decision of the court en banc must govern. In the Hollman Case, at 79 S. C. at page 16, 60 S. E. at page 22, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242, 14 Ann. Cas. 1105, this court says: "The legislative power to make acts criminal and punishable by imprisonment cannot be extended to an invasion of the rights guaranteed the citizen by the Constitution. It is impossible to frame a valid statute punishing by imprisonment the exercise of the right to religious liberty, or the right to petition for the redress of grievances, or the right to be exempt from imprisonment for debt, except in a case of fraud. These are all constitutional rights, which cannot be abridged under the guise of legislation against crime. The exercise of them cannot be crime."

The province of this court is to decide principles, rather than cases. The principle decided in the Hollman Case is that imprisonment for nonpayment of debts is allowed only in cases of fraud. In the Reeder Case, the court held that motive or intent is immaterial. No other construction is possible. Intent is not in the statute, and no court is justified in supplying it.

Section 337, in short, provides, that, if any one, with knowledge of the existence of the lien, shall sell any personal property, without the written consent of the lienee, and shall fail to pay the debt within 10 days (deposit is equivalent to payment), he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined or imprisoned, or both.

The statute, in the Hollman Case, provided for a willful default without just excuse, and yet the statute was declared to be unconstitutional, because willfulness and inexcusable conduct did not necessarily mean fraudulent conduct. Section 337 contains no such modifying words. Let me illustrate. A mortgagor has in his possession personal property worth $1,000, covered by a mortgage for $700. By the act of God, two-thirds of it is destroyed. The mortgagor finds a purchaser for the remnant at a price far beyond its market value. He is offered $800 for the remnant to-day. He cannot raise the other $100. What shall he do? Shall he sell and save the mortgagee as much as possible, and take the imprisonment and the inheritable shame of a convict to himself and family, or shall he refuse and save himself at the expense of his creditor? He meets the mortgagee and tells him the condition of affairs. The mortgagee verbally urges the sale, not merely consents. The sale is made. The entire purchase price is delivered to the mortgagee. The mortgagor, not being able to pay the balance of the mortgage debt within 10 days, is, under this statute, liable to imprisonment. Why is he imprisoned? I know of no other answer than that he did not pay the other $100, i. e., the debt. There certainly is no fraud here. Imprisonment for failure to pay a debt, in the absence of fraud, is declared, in the Hollman Case, to be unconstitutional and beyond legislative power. For these reasons, I am unable to concur in the opinion which sustains section 337.

Section 338, in my judgment, is even worse. This section gives a lien on the money received by contractors for the erection, alteration, or repair of buildings in favor of laborers, subcontractors, and materialmen who have taken part in the construction, etc., of buildings. Why not bridges, roads, factories, etc.? Is not the finished product just as much the result of their labor, attention, and material in the one case as the other? But it is said that there would be too many involved in one case and only a few in the other. I do not think the classification is based on fact. It seems to me that it depends on the size of the bridge and the size of the house. I have seen the statement in an industrial paper that a skyscraper is a bridge on end. It seems to me that there are many kinds of workmen required for the perpendicular bridge, that have no necessary place in the horizontal bridge—for instance, stone masons, brick masons, electricians, plumbers, decorators, painters, etc.—and yet, if the bridge be perpendicular, there is a lien; but, if the bridge be horizontal, there is none. I fail to see the reasonableness of the classification. But, even if the one is complex and the other simple, it is new doctrine to me that the law can deal only with simple questions.

Again, it is said that the true basis of criminality is that the law makes the contract price a trust fund, and when the contractor does not pay the lien debt he has committed a breach of trust. If that be granted, it still would not sustain the statute, because a breach of trust, to be criminal, must be with fraudulent intent. Neither fraud nor anything that imports fraud is contained in this statute. Indeed, the whole intent of the statute, as I see it, is to procure imprisonment for failure to pay the debts, without the necessity to prove fraud. While the statute opens wide the door for fraud, it has only bonds and imprisonment for an honest but unfortunate contractor.

Again, let me illustrate my view. A contractor to build a house. Those with whom he has contracted for his supplies have failed. The price of supplies has risen, and so has labor. The contract price is $10,000. It has cost A. $11,000 to build, and he has no other money with which to pay the debts. Under section 337, we have seen that debt means all that is due, every cent. A. has collected $5,000 on his contract and paid it, every cent, to the laborers, subcontractors, and materialmen. What is A. to do? If he collects the remaining $5,000 and prorates that among the three classes, he is to be fined or imprisoned for the failure to pay these debts in full. If A. still had the $10,000, of course, he could pay the $6,000. The excuse that he has paid the first $5,000 to these very people does not avail. The statute allows one, and only one, excuse. A. can borrow money on the contract and repay that; but there is no other excuse allowed. If A. is dishonest, his way is clear. He borrows on his contract, puts the money in his pocket, and goes unwhipped of the law. The honest man, who simply miscalculates or is unfortunate, is imprisoned for nonpayment of his debt; while the real criminal is unpunished.

With all of its harshness, section 337 does provide that its provisions shall not apply to those who have no knowledge or notice of the lien. Not so with section 338. No knowledge or notice is necessary. Where a contractor has several contracts in different cities or widely separated places, he must have a foreman on each contract, authorized to contract bills in emergencies. To a knowledge of each of these bills, the contractor is held by a criminal liability. More marvelous still, the contractor is charged with prophetic knowledge of the future determination of courts and juries. These, too, he must pay, or be imprisoned. Ex parte Hollman, 79 S. C. at page 15, 60 S. E. at page 22, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242, 14 Ann. Cas. 1105: "However completely he may show his good faith, and however fully the court and jury may be convinced of his good faith, conviction must follow, unless the jury think he had just cause to abandon the contract, or that the service required was not reasonable."

Under section 338, the contractor is denied the mercy or justice of the jury. His condemnation is sure, absolute, and unescapable. It makes no difference what the court and jury may think. They do not have to think at all. The questions for them are; Did the prisoner get money on the contract? Did he pay all the debts? If he did not pay all the debts, was he prevented solely because he paid it on a loan on the contract? (It makes no difference for what purpose the money was borrowed, or what he did with the proceeds of the loan.

It seems to me that the statute allows the contractor to divest the vested lien of the three classes. It violated the equal protection of the laws, and provides imprisonment for the nonpayment of debts.

For these reasons, I cannot concur in any opinion which sustains the conviction of the defendants.

DE VORE, Circuit Judge. I concur, for the reason that sections 337 and 338, Or. Code, are unconstitutional, in that they authorize imprisonment for debt, even if there be no fraud involved in the act or acts condemned by said two sections, and made misdemeanors.

COMMERCE (§ 33*) — TRANSPORTATION OF FREIGHT—"INTERSTATE COMMERCE"—DELAY.

Plaintiff purchased a car of guano which was delivered for transportation from Charleston, destination at Barksdale, both within the state, a part of the route over defendant's railway, however, being through the state of Georgia. Held, that such shipment constituted interstate commerce, since the transportation was and hence was not subject to Act Feb. 15, 1907 (25 St. at Large, p. 490), imposing a penalty on carriers for delay.

"To be officially reported."

On rehearing. Reversed.

For former opinion, see 71 S. E. 813.

F. Barron Grier, of Greenwood, and Simpson, Cooper & Babb, of Laurens, for appellant. W. R. Richey, of Laurens, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for the recovery of a statutory penalty and for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of an unreasonable delay on the part of the defendant in transporting certain articles of merchandise.

The allegations of the complaint, material to the consideration of the questions involved, are as follows: "That heretofore, to wit, on the 4th day of March, 1907, the Ashpoe Fertilizer Company delivered to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company at Charleston, S. C., ten tons of guano, consigned to Z. R. Traynham, at Barksdale, in Laurens county, and state aforesaid. That at Yemassee in the state aforesaid, on March 5, 1907, the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company delivered the car containing said guano to the defendant the Charleston and Western Carolina Railway Company for transportation to the plaintiff at Barksdale, S. C. That the distance between Yemassee and Barksdale, both of which are in the state of South Carolina, is not over 200 miles by the nearest railroad route. That although the said car of guano was received by the defendant on March 5, 1907, and the defendant was requested to make prompt shipment thereof, the said car of guano was not delivered to the plaintiff, until the 6th day of April, 1907. That, by and under the statute law of South Carolina, all common carriers doing business in this state are required to transport to its destination all freight received by them for transportation, not exceeding the following limit, * * * and for failure to comply with the said statute, such common carrier so failing shall be subject to a penalty of $5 per day for every day of delay in excess of the time herein above limited."

The defendant denied that the delivery of the guano at its destination was unreasonably delayed, and alleged that the delay was caused by an unusually heavy movement of freight at that time over the line of the defendant, which caused its yards and tracks to be blocked at the transfer points, and made it impossible to reach the car and move it at an earlier day. The defendant also alleged that the shipment was subject to the laws relating to interstate commerce, and not to state legislation, by reason of the fact that the defendant's line of railway, over which the guano was being transported, lies partly in the state of South Carolina and partly in the state of Georgia. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $60, and the defendant appealed.

The testimony shows that the shipment began and terminated at its destination in this state; that a part of defendant's line, over which it was necessary for it to transport the goods, lies within the state of Georgia.

The first question that will be considered is whether it was an interstate or an intrastate shipment. The cases of Sternberger v. Railway, 29 S. C. 510, 7 S. E. 886, 2 L. R. A. 105; State v. Holleyman, 55 S. C. 207, 31 S. E. 362, 33 S. E. 366, 45 L. R. A. 567; Frasler & Co. v. Railway, 81 S. C. 162, 62 S. E. 14; Hunter v. Railway, 81 S. C. 169, 62 S. E. 13; and Hanley v. Kansas City Ry., 187 U. S. 617, 23 Sup. Ct. 214, 47 L. Ed. 333, determine beyond question that it was an interstate shipment.

In the case of Hunter v. Railway, 81 S. C. 169, 62 S. E. 13, the same railroad company was involved, and the facts in every respect were similar to those now under consideration, except in that case the delay occurred in the state of Georgia. The title of the act then and now before us for interpretation is: "An act to prevent delays, in the transportation of freight, by railroads in this state." The first section provides: "That from and after May 1, 1904, all railroad companies, doing business in this state, shall transport to its destination all freight received by them for transportation within the state. * * *" 24 St. at Large, p. 671. In that case the court used this language: "Construing the words 'transportation within the state' according to their exact and natural meaning, they do not embrace interstate transportation. (Citing authorities.) The statute, therefore, cannot have operation beyond the territory of the state, and should not be so construed as to interfere substantially with transportation in its interstate feature. * * * Transportation is a part of commerce, and it must be held that the transportation in this instance was not wholly within the state, but was in part within the state of Georgia, and was therefore interstate transportation." If no other language had been used by the court in that case, it would be unnecessary to cite authorities to show that the statute of this state is inapplicable. But the court left open the question whether a case is embraced within the terms of the statute when the delay takes place wholly in this state.

In Hanley v. Kansas City Ry., 187 U. S. 617, 23 Sup. Ct. 214, 47 L. Ed. 333, the court quotes with approval the following language from Pacific Coast S. S. Co. v. Railroad Commissioners (C. C.) 18 Fed. 10, 9 Sawy. 253: "To bring the transportation within the control of the state as part of its domestic commerce, the subject transported must be within the entire voyage under the exclusive jurisdiction of the state."

An interstate transportation is continuous in its nature, and, if a state statute could have the effect of breaking the continuity of transportation, it would necessarily interfere with interstate commerce. State v. Holleyman, 55 S. C. 207, 31 S. E. 362, 33 S. E. 366, 45 L. R. A. 567. As an interstate transportation must be regarded as an entirety, it is difficult to conceive how a delay may take place within a state without being affected by causes operating at some other place on the line of railroad, even in another state. It would certainly be an onerous burden on interstate commerce to hold that a shipment, during its actual transportation, could be subjected to state legislation at any point on the line whatever, before it reached its destination.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

WATTS, J., and ERNEST GARY, COPEs, PRINCE, SPAIN, FRANK B. GARY, and SHIPP, Circuit Judges, concur.

GAGE, Circuit Judge (dissenting). Granting that the shipment was betwixt the states, the mixed issue made is this: Does the requirement of the statute that the car of fertilizers should not be halted in this state except for "good and sufficient cause" constitute a burden upon or hindrance of the carriage of the fertilizers? The testimony does not prove it as a fact, and no just inference shows it as the law.

In my judgment the statute is a valid exercise of the state's power now, and the result below was right and ought to be affirmed.

HYDRICK, J. (dissenting). Lest others may be unjustly criticized for my shortcoming, I want to say that I am solely responsible for the delay in the filing of the decision of the court in this case. The opinion of the Chief Justice was prepared before the case was heard by the court en banc. The opinion of Mr. Justice FRASER was prepared and sent to me within a few weeks thereafter. Since then the papers have been in my hands. Circumstances beyond my control have prevented the preparation of this opinion at an earlier date. I venture to think, however, that the importance of the question involved to the people of this state justifies the taking of all the time that was necessary for its thorough consideration.

The action was brought to recover the penalty of $5 a day which the statute of this state (25 Stat. p. 490) allows consignees, who are injured by the delay, to recover of carriers for every day of unreasonable delay in the transportation of freight within this state. The defendant received the shipment March 5th, but failed to carry it to destination till April 6, 1907, a delay of more than 30 days, notwithstanding the distance between the points of shipment and destination is not over 200 miles. Notwithstanding both points are within this state, defendant's road runs for a distance of some 20 miles outside the state and through the city of Augusta, Ga. This circumstance affords the defense chiefly relied upon, to wit, that the shipment was interstate, and therefore the state statute does not apply, and, if it does, that it is void, because it is an unlawful interference with and burden upon interstate commerce.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "If the jury find that the car was delayed in South Carolina by reason of conditions existing on the road of defendant in the state of Georgia, then you must find for the defendant. If the jury find that the delay in the shipment occurred wholly within this state, then I charge you that the plaintiff is entitled to recover $5 per day for every day the car was delayed in this state, less the time allowed by the statute, Sundays excluded, provided you find that the delay was not brought about by good and sufficient cause. If you find that the delay was brought about by good and sufficient cause, you must find for the defendant, or, if you find that the delay occurred in the state of Georgia, you must find for the defendant." Under these instructions, the verdict of the jury settles the questions of fact in plaintiff's favor that the shipment was unreasonably delayed while it was within this state, and that the delay was due to conditions existing wholly within this state. The questions raised by the expressions, other than the validity of the statute, as applied to the shipment in question, do not require discussion.

The title of the act is: "An act to prevent delays in the transportation of freight in this state." What kind of delays did the Legislature have in mind? The language of the title answers: "Delays in the transportation of freight." Occurring where? Answer: "Within this state." It is clear, therefore, that the Legislature realized and had in mind the limitations upon its power, and, knowing that it could not penalize delays occurring beyond the borders of the state, did not attempt to do so, but, by the language used, made it clear that its intention was to penalize only such delays as occurred within its jurisdiction. This intention is shown also by a consideration of the act as a whole, and especially by the language of the first part of the first section which reads: "That * * * every common carrier doing business in this state shall transport to its destination all freight received by them for transportation within this state within a reasonable time after receipt thereof, not exceeding the following times, after midnight of the day of the receipt thereof, to wit: Between points not over one hundred miles apart, seventy-two hours; between points over one hundred and not over two hundred miles apart, ninety-six hours; and between points over two hundred miles apart, one hundred and twenty hours." To limit the meaning of the words "within this state" here used solely to a modification of the word "transportation," so as to make the language mean that the physical act of transporting must be wholly within the state, is a construction so narrow and technical as to do violence, not only to the legislative intent, but also to the legislative intelligence. The court knows, and must assume that the Legislature knew, that some of the railroad companies doing business in this state, and especially the larger systems, transport great quantities of freight from point to point within the state by carrying it over lines which run in part beyond the borders of the state. The language used, construed in the light of this fact, plainly shows the intent that the act should apply to all shipments from one point in the state to another point in the state, without regard to whether the actual physical movement was wholly within the state at every stage thereof or not.

In the first place, it will be conceded that the shipment in question is interstate. This court has expressly decided that point. Hunter v. Railway, 81 S. C. 173, 62 S. E. 13. But it does not follow by any means that, because it is an interstate shipment, the carrier cannot be penalized under the state law for delay in the transportation of such a shipment, occurring wholly within the state. It seems to me that the fundamental error into which some of my learned Brethren have fallen is that, because the shipment is interstate, it necessarily follows that the carrier is not subject to the state laws with regard to the transportation of it. The power of the states to compel, by proper legislation, interstate carriers and others engaged in interstate commerce to discharge their duties to the public, either those imposed by the common law or by statutes reasonably exerting the police power of the state, has been affirmed so often by the Supreme Court of the United States, whose decisions upon that question are final and controlling, that it can no longer be questioned. That great court has never denied the power of the states, in the absence of any regulation by Congress, to enact such laws when they are only a reasonable exercise of the police power of the states and do not burden or interfere with interstate commerce, although they may incidentally affect it. I shall therefore rely chiefly upon the decisions of that court to sustain the application of the statute of this state to the shipment in question.

Celerity in the movement of freight is of the utmost importance in the promotion of commerce. The statute in question, so far from hindering or burdening commerce, is actually an aid to it by stimulating the carriers to the exercise of proper diligence in the transportation of freight. "A state statute imposing a penalty on railroad companies for the detention of freight more than a limited time after it is received for shipment, without the consent of the shipper, is not void as a regulation of interstate commerce even as applied to freight to be shipped to another state, since the enforcement of such statute would expedite and not obstruct interstate traffic." 17 A. & E. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 103.

In Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 23 L. Ed. 819, Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said: "It may be said, generally that the legislation of a state, not directed against commerce or any of its regulations, but relating to the rights, duties, and liabilities of citizens, and only indirectly and remotely affecting the operations of commerce, is of obligatory force upon citizens within its territorial jurisdiction, whether on land or water, or engaged in commerce, foreign or interstate, or in any other pursuit."

In Western Union Tel. Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650, 16 Sup. Ct. 934, 40 L. Ed. 1105, a statute of the state of Georgia, imposing a penalty on telegraph companies for failure to transmit and deliver telegrams "with impartiality and good faith and with due diligence," was sustained and enforced in its application to an interstate telegram. The statute was assailed upon the same ground as the statute here in question, to wit, that it infringed upon the power vested in Congress by the Constitution "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states." The court held that telegraphic messages from one state to another constitute a part of interstate commerce and come within the protection of the commerce clause of the Constitution; that, if the statute could be construed as regulating commerce between the states, it was void; that enactments which may incidentally affect interstate commerce and the persons engaged in it do not necessarily constitute regulations of that commerce within the meaning of the Constitution; that "legislation which is a mere aid to commerce may be enacted by a state, although at the same time it may incidentally affect commerce"; that a provision for the delivery of telegraphic messages at a station within the state need have no effect upon the conduct of the telegraph company with regard to the performance of its duties outside the state; that obedience to the statute would not unfavorably affect the company or embarrass it in the course of its business; and hence, in the absence of any regulation by Congress, the statute was valid. As observed by the court in that case, the statute undertook to do nothing more than compel the telegraph company to perform its duty. The court said: "The statute in question is of a nature that is in aid of the performance of a duty of the company that would exist in the absence of any such statute, and it is in no wise obstructive of its duty as a telegraph company. It imposes a penalty for the purpose of enforcing this general duty of the company. The direction that the delivery of the message shall be made with impartiality and in good faith and with due diligence is not an addition to the duty which it would owe in the absence of such a statute. Can it be said that the imposition of a penalty for the violation of a duty which the company owed by the general law of the land is a regulation of or an obstruction to interstate commerce within the meaning of that clause of the federal Constitution under discussion? We think not.

No tax is laid upon any interstate message, nor is there any regulation of a nature calculated to at all embarrass, obstruct, or impede the company in the full and fair performance of its duty as an interstate sender of messages. We see no reason to fear any weakening of the protection of the constitutional provision as to commerce among the several states by holding that, in regard to such a message as the one in question, although it comes from a place without the state, it is yet under the jurisdiction of the state where it is to be delivered (after its arrival therein at the place of delivery), at least so far as legislation of the state tends to enforce the performance of the duty owed by the company under the general law. So long as Congress is silent upon the subject, we think it is within the power of the state government to enact legislation of the nature of this Georgia statute. It is not a case where the silence of Congress is equivalent to an express enactment." Again the court said: "While it is vitally important that commerce between the states should be unembarrassed by vexatious state regulations regarding it, yet, on the other hand, there are many occasions where the police power of the state can be properly exercised to insure a faithful and prompt performance of duty within the limits of the state upon the part of those who are engaged in interstate commerce. We think the statute in question is one of that class, and, in the absence of any legislation by Congress, the statute is a valid exercise of the power of the state over the subject."

That case cannot be distinguished in principle from this, for unquestionably it is the duty of carriers, under the general law, to transport freight to its destination within a reasonable time after receipt of it. The statute we are now considering imposes no new duty. It only penalizes the failure to perform the duty imposed by the general law, and implied as an element of the contract of carriage. While it fixes the limits of time within which shipments shall be carried from place to place within given distances, it, in effect, if not in terms, declares the times so fixed to be reasonable, and it even goes further and allows the carrier to relieve itself from the liability incurred by failing to comply with its provisions by proving that such failure was due to good and sufficient cause. But it was expressly decided in Western Union Tel. Co. v. Commercial Milling Co., 218 U. S. 406, 31 Sup. Ct. 59, 54 L. Ed. 1088, 21 Ann. Cas. 815, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 220, that "a regulation of interstate commerce, which would be valid if rested upon the common law of the state, is no less valid because made by a state statute." Syllabus. In that case, a statute of Michigan, which made telegraph companies liable in damages for mistakes, errors, or delays caused by negligence in the transmission or delivery, or for the nondelivery of any repeated or unrepeatd message, was sustained notwithstanding it was applied in a case where the message was sent from the state of Michigan into the state of Missouri, and the negligence by which it was lost occurred in the state of Illinois.

In Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Solan, 169 U. S. 133, 18 Sup. Ct. 289, 42 L. Ed. 688, the validity of a statute of Iowa, prohibiting railroad companies from limiting their liability as common carriers, was affirmed and applied, though the plaintiff was injured while on an interstate train and making an interstate journey. The court said: "Railroad corporations, like all other persons and corporations doing business within the territorial jurisdiction of a state, are subject to its law. It is in the law of the state that provisions are to be found concerning the rights and duties of common carriers of persons or of goods, and the measures by which injuries resulting from their failure to perform their obligations may be prevented or redressed. Persons traveling on interstate trains are as much entitled, while within a state, to the protection of that state as those who travel on domestic trains. A carrier exercising his calling within a particular state, although engaged in the business of interstate commerce, is answerable, according to the law of the state, for acts of nonfeasance or of misfeasance committed within its limits. If he fails to deliver goods to the proper consignee at the right time and place, or if by negligence in transportation he inflicts injury upon the person of a passenger brought from another state, the right of action for the consequent damage is given by the local law. It is equally within the power of the state to prescribe the safeguards and precautions foreseen to be necessary and proper to prevent by anticipation those wrongs and injuries which, after they have been inflicted, the state has the power to redress and to punish. The rules prescribed for the construction of railroads, and for their management and operation, designed to protect persons and property otherwise endangered by their use, are strictly within the scope of the local law. They are not, in themselves, regulations of interstate commerce, although they control, in some degree, the conduct and the liability of those engaged in such commerce. So long as Congress has not legislated upon the particular subject, they are rather to be regarded as legislation in aid of such commerce and as a rightful exercise of the police power of the state to regulate the relative rights and duties of all persons and corporations within its limits."

The last decision by the Supreme Court of the United States upon this subject is Western Union Tel. Co. v. Crovo, 220 U. S. 364, 31 Sup. Ct. 399, 55 L. Ed. 498, and it is directly in point. A statute of the state of Virginia made it the duty of telegraph companies doing business in the state to receive and transmit dispatches faithfully, impartially and with substantial accuracy, as promptly as practicable, and in the order of delivery to the company, with the privilege of giving preference to certain classes of messages, and imposed a penalty of $100 for failure to comply with its provisions. Crovo delivered a message to be sent from Richmond, Va., to Brockton, N. Y. He sued for and recovered the penalty for the negligent failure to promptly transmit the message, alleging that the negligence occurred within the state, to wit, in the office at Richmond. The court, per Mr. Justice Lurton, states the question to be decided as follows: "The only question for decision is whether a statute of the state of Virginia, which imposes a penalty for the failure to transmit a dispatch received at an office of the company in the state for transmission to a person in another state, is a valid exercise of the power of the state; the delay occurring in the state." The answer to that question is given by the court in the following language: "The requirement of the Virginia statute as here applied is a valid exercise of the power of the state, in the absence of legislation by Congress. It is neither a regulation of, nor a hindrance to, interstate commerce, but is in aid of that commerce. The case is clearly governed by Western U. Tel. Co. v. James and Western U. Tel. Co. v. Commercial Milling Co., both above cited." Upon what principle can that case be distinguished from this?

In Bagg v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 109 N. C. 279, 14 S. E. 79, 14 L. R. A. 596, 28 Am. St. Rep. 569, the Supreme Court of North Carolina held that "a state statute compelling the shipment of freight within a certain time after receiving it, under a penalty for default, is not an unconstitutional regulation of interstate commerce, as to freight for shipment out of the state, as it tends, not to trammel or obstruct, but to expedite such commerce." Syllabus. That case is also directly in point. The statute imposed a penalty of $25 a day for every day over five that any railroad allowed freight received by it for shipment to remain unshipped. The court held the statute valid as a proper exercise of the power of the state, as applied in a case where the shipment was from a point in North Carolina to a point in South Carolina. A like principle was involved and decided by this court and sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in A. C. L. R. Co. v. Mazursky, 216 U. S. 122, 30 Sup. Ct. 378, 54 L. Ed. 411, where the validity of the statute of this state, imposing a penalty of $50 on common carriers for failure to adjust and pay, within the times therein specified, claims for loss of or damage to freight while in the possession of such carriers, was affirmed, though it was applied to interstate shipments. To the same effect is the case of Skipper v. Railway, 75 S. C.

276, 55 S. E. 454, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 388, 117 Am. St. Rep. 901, 9 Ann. Cas. 808, sustaining section 1710, vol. 1, Code 1902, as applied to interstate shipments, and the principle there decided has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. R. A. Patterson Tob. Co., 169 U. S. 311, 18 Sup. Ct. 335, 42 L. Ed. 759.

Under the reasoning and authority of the cases hereinbefore cited, I conclude that the statute under consideration is not an unlawful interference with or burden upon interstate commerce, when applied to delays occurring wholly within the state, and that it was intended to be applied only in cases of delay occurring within the state.

Therefore I think the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

RICE and SEASE, Circuit Judges, concur.

FRASER, J. I feel bound to file a dissent to the opinion of the majority of the court in banc in this case on account of the exceeding great importance of the questions involved.

Railroads are quasi public highways. It is the state's business to maintain highways, and, when the state allows its business to be conducted by private persons or corporations, it ought not to lose its power to control the management of them. If the federal Supreme Court shall limit the power of this state to control its own affairs, it will be time enough to concede the loss. If this court surrenders the state's rights, the state is helpless. If this court erroneously upholds the state's power to control the highways within its borders, there is a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the error can be corrected. The respondent here would have no standing with the federal authorities. He concedes they have no jurisdiction. The power of this state to control commerce between its own citizens ought not to be surrendered.

In the view I take of this case, it is necessary to consider appellant's last exception. The appellant refers us to Frasier & Co. v. Railway Co., 81 S. C. 162, 62 S. E. 14. In that case it appears that the strike had been on for more than a month when appellant undertook to transport this car load of guano. It is true that, in the absence of instructions, the transportation company has the right to fix the route, but in fixing the route it seems to me they are bound to fix a possible route, and, when they fix a route they know to be an impossible route, they are responsible for nondelivery in the specified time. The statute allows the transportation company to change the route designated by the shipper when the designated route will be interrupted or incapable of being used at the time, by strike or casualty, preventing the running of its trains.

As to the interstate commerce feature of this case, I would say: Commerce is the interchange of commodities between the contracting parties. When the contracting parties are citizens of different states, our scheme of government has placed the control in the federal government, which is common to both. Where the contracting parties are citizens of the same state, the control is assigned to the state of which both are citizens. The line of division between these two ought to be clearly defined. The federal government ought to be accorded cheerful obedience in its management of interstate commerce, but the state courts ought to be jealous to guard the rights of the state to control intrastate commerce. Now is this inter or intra state commerce? Both of the contracting parties are residents of this state. Both termini are situated in this state. It does not seem to me that the bare fact that in the course of transportation it passed for a short distance beyond the limits of the state can change the nature of the transaction. It is said that transportation is a part of commerce. Manifestly this is true. Otherwise there would be little intrastate commerce and no interstate commerce. It seems to me that the contract of the parties, and not the method of transportation, fixes the nature of the commerce and the jurisdiction of the federal and state governments. It seems to me that the case of State v. Holleyman, 55 S. C. 207, 31 S. E. 362, 33 S. E. 366, 45 L. R. A. 567, sustains this view where the method of transportation was the most primitive, but protected by the nature of the contract.

The fact that the state of South Carolina cannot punish an offense committed in Georgia does not deprive the state of the power to punish for an offense committed in South Carolina. Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192-205, 12 Sup. Ct. 806, 36 L. Ed. 672. "The tax under consideration here was determined in respects of receipts for the proportion of the transportation within the state, but the contention is that this could not be done because the transportation was an entire thing, and in its course passed through another state than that of the origin and destination of the particular freight and passengers. There was no breaking of bulk or transfer of passengers in New Jersey. The point of departure and the point of arrival were alike in Pennsylvania. The intercourse was between those points and not between any other points. Is such intercourse, consisting of continuous transportation between two points in the same state, made interstate because in its accomplishment some portion of another state may be traversed? Is the transmission of freight or messages between two places in the same state made interstate business by the deviation of the railroad or telegraph line onto the soil of another state? * * * It should be remembered that the question does not arise as to the power of any other state than the state of the terminal, nor as to taxation upon the property of the company situated elsewhere than in Pennsylvania, nor as to the regulation by Pennsylvania of the operations of this or any other company elsewhere, but it is simply whether, in the carriage of freight and passengers between two points in one state, the mere passage over the soil of another state renders that business foreign which is domestic. We do not think such a view can be reasonably entertained, and are of opinion that this taxation is not open to constitutional objection by reason of the particular way in which Philadelphia was reached from Mauch Chunk."

I do not see that the Lehigh Valley Case is overruled by any of the cases cited. In these cases there was an effort to fix charges for transportation and to punish for offenses committed outside of the states whose laws were invoked. Of course they failed. The state cannot control transportations outside of their territorial limits. The question in each case was the jurisdiction of the several arms of the state government, and the courts held that these arms could not reach so far. It is true in the case of Fraser & Co. v. Railway the court does call it interstate business, but, when the court said "there was no evidence that the delay occurred in this state," it was without jurisdiction to render any judgment except to dismiss the proceedings. The same is true of the Hunter Case.

In the Hanley Case and the Sternberger Case the question was the right of State Railroad Commissions to fix rates outside of the state, and it is conceded that they had none. The nature of the commerce was not involved, therefore the name by which it was called is not binding. In the case at bar the contracting parties were of this state, the termini in this state, and the delay for which judgment was given occurred in this state.

It is my opinion that the judgment of the court below ought to be sustained.

CONTRACTS (§ 127*)—ILLEGALITY—OUSTING JURISDICTION OF COURTS.

A provision, in an indemnity bond given to protect a company against loss on a bond of guaranty, that vouchers or other proper evidence of payment of loss by the company should be conclusive evidence (except for fraud) against the indemnitor, was invalid; it being not only an attempt to make the company the sole arbiter of the indemnitor's liability and deprive the court of jurisdiction to try any fact in relation thereto, but being also against public policy.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; Ernest Gary, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by the Guaranty Company of North America against John H. Charles, Sr. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The following are the exceptions referred to in the opinion:

"The defendant appeals to the Supreme Court from the judgment entered upon the verdict rendered in this case at November term, 1910, and will move the Supreme Court to reverse the same and grant a new trial upon the following exceptions:

"(1) The presiding judge erred in admitting in evidence the statements, Exhibits A, B, C, D, E, F, and G, upon the ground that the same are copies, and that the originals are the best evidence thereof.

"(2) The presiding judge erred in admitting in evidence the statements, Exhibits A, B, C, D, E, F, and G, upon the ground that they are ex parte statements furnished by the express company to the plaintiff, and that the defendant should not be bound thereby.

"(3) The presiding judge erred in holding that the voucher or receipt signed by Southern Express Company showing a payment by the Guaranty Company to the express company of $424.40 on account of claims held by the express company against J. H. Charles, Jr., for defaults in his duty as messenger, was, under the defendant's contract of guaranty, conclusive evidence (except for fraud) of the fact and amount of his liability thereunder, and in directing a verdict for the plaintiff upon this ground. Specifications: (1) Said stipulation is unreasonable. (2) Said stipulation is contrary to public policy and therefore void. (3) Said stipulation has the effect of ousting the courts of jurisdiction in determining the fact and amount of the alleged defaults of the messenger. (4) Such stipulation amounts to constituting the Guaranty Company the absolute arbitrator and Supreme Court in its own case, which is unreasonable, contrary to public policy, and void. (5) Such stipulation amounts to the absolute submission to an arbitrator, before any controversy has arisen, all matters of dispute that may arise under a contract, and depriving the courts of their supervisory control of such disputes, which is unreasonable, contrary, to public policy, and void. (6) Such stipulation amounts to the submission to one of the parties to a contract the final and absolute decision of questions arising under the contract, depriving the other party of his right to inquire into the reasonable care and honest judgment of such arbitrator; the object of the contract not being to gratify taste, serve personal convenience, or satisfy individual preference.

"(4) The presiding judge erred in holding that the contract of the defendant could not be impeached except for fraud, that there was no evidence of fraud, and in directing a verdict for the plaintiff upon this ground. Specifications: (1) The defendant should have been allowed to show that the statements furnished to the Guaranty Company by the express company showing alleged defaults of the messenger were incorrect and unfounded in fact. (2) There was sufficient evidence of fraud, gross negligence, and collusion to require the submission of this issue to the jury. (3) The defendant had the right to show that the statements and settlement between the Guaranty Company and the express company were not the result of reasonable care and honest judgment; that there was sufficient evidence of these facts to require the submission of this issue to the jury.

"(5) The presiding judge erred in not holding that the defendant was not liable for the suit brought upon his guaranty after J. H. Charles, Jr., attained his majority on November 29, 1908, for the reason that said contract of guaranty provides that 'when the above-named party reaches mature age this obligation becomes canceled.'"

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, of Greenville, for appellant. Haynsworth & Haynsworth, of Greenville, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The following statement appears in the record: "This action was instituted in the court of common pleas, for Greenville county, on the 8th day of October, 1909. The plaintiff prays judgment for the sum of $424.40 with interest from December 2, 1908, that being the amount paid by the plaintiff to Southern Express Company, under a bond in which the plaintiff was surety, for the faithful performance of duty on the part of John H. Charles, Jr., a messenger employed by Southern Express Company. Before the said bond was executed, the plaintiff secured an obligation from John H. Charles, Sr., in the nature of a guaranty, dated May 22, 1906. The plaintiff brings this action against the defendant, John H. Charles, Sr., for the said sum, upon the obligation of said guaranty. The case was tried before Judge Ernest Gary and a jury at Greenville, November term, 1910. At the close of the testimony, the plaintiff's attorneys made a motion that the court direct a verdict in its favor, for the full amount claimed, upon the ground that the receipt of the plaintiff, for the money paid by it to Southern Express Company, on account of the alleged defaults of the messenger, John H. Charles, Jr., was conclusive of the fact and amount of such defaults, and could not be impeached by the defendant, except for fraud, and that there was no evidence of fraud. Whereupon the presiding judge directed the jury to find a verdict, in favor of the plaintiff, in the sum of $481.40; that being the amount claimed with interest. Upon which verdict judgment has been duly entered, and from which the defendant appeals."

A copy of the bond which is set out in the complaint (omitting the formal parts thereof) is as follows: "May 25, 1906. Know all men by these presents, that I, J. H. Charles, of Greenville, S. C., in consideration of the issue of a bond of guarantee, by the Guaranty Company of North America for Southern Express Company, on behalf of my son, John H. Charles, Jr., not yet of age, hereby agree that I will protect and immediately indemnify said Guaranty Company of North America, against any and all loss, damage or expense it may sustain or become liable for, in consequence of such bond or renewal or extension thereof, hereby admitting that the vouchers or other proper evidence, showing payment by the said Guaranty Company of any such loss, damage or expense, shall be conclusive evidence (except for fraud), against me and my estate, of the fact and amount of my liability hereunder, to said Guaranty Company. It being understood, that when the above-named party reaches mature age, this obligation becomes canceled."

The defendant in his answer alleges: "That any payment made by the plaintiff to Southern Express Company, on account of any alleged loss, sustained by reason of the misconduct of the said John Henry Charles, Jr., has been paid without justification, without settlement with the said John Henry Charles, Jr., voluntarily, when there was no defalcation or other wrongdoing, on the part of the said John Henry Charles, Jr., and in fraud of the defendant's rights in the premises. That John Henry Charles, Jr., attained his majority on the 29th of November, 1908."

The defendant appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported.

The question in the case is whether there was error, on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in ruling that the vouchers or other evidence, showing payment of loss by the plaintiff, alleged to have been sustained by the Southern Express Company, as the result of misconduct, on the part of John Henry Charles, Jr., was conclusive evidence (except for fraud) of the defendant's liability under his said bond.

While the bond upon its face merely purports to prescribe a rule of evidence, to be applied upon the trial of the case by the court, nevertheless, it is, in effect, an agreement to submit to the plaintiff, as arbitrator, all issues (except fraud) that might arise between it and the defendant, leaving the court powerless to do more than pass a formal order, confirming the award made by the plaintiff, as was done in this case, thus absolutely depriving the defendant of his right to be heard upon the merits of the case.

There are two reasons why the direction of the verdict was erroneous. In the first place, the terms of the bond showed an attempt to oust the court of its jurisdiction, to try any fact upon which the plaintiff's cause of action depended; fraud in this case being a defense.

In the case of Herbemont v. Percival, 1 McMul. 59, the syllabus, which correctly states the question decided, is as follows: "The plaintiff and defendant entered into a special written agreement to submit the matters in dispute between them to counsel, but no particular counsel was named, or time when the matter was to be submitted; defendant agreeing to pay, according to the instructions of the counsel, and, in default of their getting a decision, then the plaintiff was to file a bill in the court of equity, and the decree of that court was to be conformed to, by the defendant. This was held to be an agreement to arbitrate. An agreement to arbitrate, or a bond to submit to arbitration, may be the subject of a suit, when the damages stipulated, or the penalty, will authorize a recovery; but such an agreement or bond would not deprive either party of his remedy in the courts, or oust them of their jurisdiction, in regard to the matter in dispute." This case is cited with approval in Smith v. Thomson, 1 Strob. 344. This is in accord with the general doctrine, which is thus stated in 2 Encyc. of Law, 571: "Where the parties to a contract enter into an absolute agreement, or covenant, that, in case a dispute should arise under such contract, all matters in difference between them relating thereto shall be submitted to arbitration, is void on grounds of public policy, because to give effect to it would be to oust the courts of their jurisdiction." This question has undergone judicial investigation in Jones v. Enoree Water Co., in which the opinion has just been filed.

In the second place, it would be against public policy, if the action of the plaintiff was not to be tested by the rules of common sense and reason. The principle is thus stated in Thompson v. Security Co., 63 S. C. 290, 41 S. E. 464: "When the object of a contract is to gratify taste, serve personal convenience, or satisfy individual preference, the benefit which the promise derives therefrom is of a personal nature, and his pleasure, which he has in view in entering into the contract, consists in its performance to his satisfaction. The personal character of such a contract is an element entering into it of which the promisor is bound to take notice. If the promisee was not allowed to be the sole arbiter of the due performance of the agreement in such cases, he might be compelled to accept what, in his estimation, was of no value or benefit to himself, and which would have deterred him from entering into the contract. In other cases the reasonableness of the promisee's action, in determining the question, is the element entering into the contract, and a disregard of this element is in the nature of a fraud on the rights of the promisor. It is bad faith and unfair dealing for a person to act unreasonably, in an ordinary business transaction, when there is nothing in the contract of a personal nature. The action of the insurance company in the case under consideration was not dependent upon taste or upon any fact of a personal nature, but solely upon the existence of a fact, in an ordinary business transaction, and it would be bad faith for it to refuse to be governed by reason and common sense in determining the existence of such fact."

There are special reasons why these principles are applicable to the case under consideration. Not only was the amount, but the fact whether anything was due by the defendant was to be determined by an interested party, and there was no provision in the contract that the defendant should have the right to be heard.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

WATTS and FRASER, JJ., did not hear this case.

WOODS, J. I concur in the result. The case stands entirely apart from the case of Jones v. Enoree Power Co., 75 S. E. 452, recently decided. There the contract was that the single issue of the amount of the damages arising from backwater, caused by the raising of a dam, should be decided by a board of impartial arbitrators as a condition precedent to the right of action; and by the consensus of judicial authority such a contract is valid. Here the contract is that the Guaranty Company, one of the parties to the contract, should be the judge, not of a particular fact, but of the liability of the other party, and that its determination as to his liability should be conclusive. Such a contract is against public policy and invalid, because it is an attempt to substitute for the tribunals established by law a contract tribunal to determine, not some particular, anticipated issue of fact, but the issue of ultimate liability dependent on all the facts and the law. The authorities holding such an attempt futile are cited in Jones v. Enoree Power Company.

Even if this contract so limited the matter to be decided by the plaintiff that it would not be invalid as an effort to oust the courts of jurisdiction, yet it is an attempt to make one of the parties the final judge in his own case of a matter of ordinary business accounting as distinguished from matters of personal fancy, taste, convenience, or preference. At the most, such a stipulation cannot be effective further than to make the conclusion of the party in whose favor it is made prima facie evidence of the fact of default. Thompson v. Fidelity, etc., Co., 63 S.

CHARLESTON CONSOL. RY. & LIGHTING CO. v. CITY COUNCIL OF CHARLESTON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 29, 1912.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 590*)—PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATION—FIXING CHARGES.

The state will not be presumed to have intended to delegate to municipal corporations the power to fix the charges of public service corporations, unless such intention is clearly and unmistakably expressed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1309; Dec. Dig. § 590.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 619*)—POWERS—CHARGES OF PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATION.

While the state's power to fix charges of a public service corporation is not conferred upon cities, and a city cannot fix such charges, unless the right to do so is expressly reserved in the franchise under which the public service corporation operates, yet, where this right is so reserved, the city may fix such charges.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 619*)—POWER—FIXING RATES FOR GAS AND ELECTRICITY.

Act Feb. 13, 1912 (27 St. at Large, p. 551), amending Act Feb. 23, 1910 (27 St. at Large, p. 564), creating a public service commission authorized to fix charges for gas and electricity, did not abrogate a right to fix charges, which was expressly reserved by the city of Charleston in the franchise granted to a public service corporation, where the commission had not undertaken to fix such rates.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1359; Dec. Dig. § 619.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—OFFICIAL ACTS—PRESUMPTION.

The members of a city council will be presumed to act justly and without prejudice in fixing the rates to be charged by a public service corporation for gas and electricity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

At chambers. Original petition for temporary injunction by the Charleston Consolidated Railway & Lighting Company against the City Council of Charleston. Denied, and relief ordered for consumers.

B. A. Hagood, W. C. Miller, and J. P. K. Bryan, all of Charleston, for petitioner.

WOODS, J. In this action for injunction to restrain the city council of Charleston from enforcing an ordinance fixing the rates to be charged by the Charleston Consolidated Railway & Lighting Company for light, heat, and power, the question now to be decided is whether a temporary injunction should be granted, restraining the city council from enforcing the ordinance pending the hearing of the cause by the Supreme Court.

By resolution, dated April 9, 1910, the city council of Charleston granted separate franchises to the Charleston Edison Light & Power Company, the Charleston Gas Light Company, and Charleston Consolidated Railway, Gas & Electric Company, allowing these corporations, their successors and assigns, the use of the streets of the city for the erection of poles and other appliances "necessary or proper for the efficient furnishing of light, heat, and power to the city and citizens of Charleston." The franchise was limited to the period of 37 years from March 23, 1910. These corporations afterwards leased all of their property, including the franchises, to the petitioner, the Charleston Consolidated Railway & Lighting Company. The resolution granting the franchise contained the following sections:

"Section 4. Provided always, and this franchise and permission is given upon the express understanding and provision that the several grants and franchises herein made are expressly subject to the Constitution and laws of the state of South Carolina, and are to be so understood and accepted by the said mentioned companies; that is to say, the foregoing grants and franchises are only and so far as the city council has the right and may lawfully grant the same, and that the said respective companies shall indemnify and save harmless the said city council from all suits, actions, claims or damages arising from the exercise by said companies of the rights herein given, or any part thereof.

"Section 5. All and above-mentioned grants and franchises, and every part and portion thereof, are subject to all the ordinances, rules and regulations of the city council of Charleston now existing, or which may be hereafter adopted, governing the construction, erection, conduct, management of, and rates charged for light, heat and power furnished to the city and citizens by all the above-mentioned companies, and also subject to the right of the city council to modify or change the rules and regulations herein provided or contained in the general ordinances of the city council."

On October 10, 1911, the city council, under this resolution, fixed the charges to be made for gas and electricity, and the petitioner complied with the prescribed schedule. The arc lights for the streets were supplied, however, under a special contract with the city running from July 1, 1908, to July 1, 1912. On June 11, 1912, the city council, by ordinance, provided for a material reduction of the charges for gas and electricity furnished the city and private consumers, the reduction to go into effect at the expiration of the special contract for arc lights, July 1, 1912.

In maintaining that the city council had no authority to fix the rates to be charged for gas and electricity by the ordinance of June 11, 1912, the petitioner's counsel lay down, in substance, these propositions: First. The power to fix compulsory rates to be charged by a public service corporation is a power belonging to the state as a sovereign; and the state has never delegated that power to the city council of Charleston. Second. Even if the charter conferred such power on the city council, it was withdrawn by the statute of 1912, providing for the regulation of rates by a commission. Third. If the power to fix the rates to be charged by the petitioner was acquired by the city council under the agreement to that effect contained in the franchise, that agreement was also abrogated by the statute of 1912. Before entering upon the discussion, it may be well to remark that, as the franchise in this case was not exclusive, the act of 1902 (23 St. 1039), providing for exclusive franchises for furnishing light and water to cities and towns, and the conditions on which they may be granted, has no application.

The first proposition is, no doubt, sound; but in accepting it an important distinction is to be observed between power to fix by compulsion the rates to be charged by a corporation acting under a franchise which confers on the city council no power to fix rates, and power to fix rates contracted for by the city council in a franchise granting the use of the city streets or other privileges.

The following rule, stated in 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 89, was adopted in Luther v. Wheeler, 73 S. C. 83, 52 S. E. 874, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 746, 6 Ann. Cas. 754, as that supported by unbroken authority: "It is a general and undisputed proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no others: First, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied."

[1] The state's power to regulate by compulsion the charges of public service corporations is one of such vast and increasing importance to the public that the courts will not attribute to the state the intention to part with it, or to delegate it, unless the intention is clearly and unmistakably expressed. Home Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Los Angeles, 211 U. S. 265, 29 Sup. Ct. 50, 53 L. Ed. 176; 3 Dillon on Mun. Corp. § 1325. The numerous authorities on the subject are cited in 29 Cyc. 724.

[2] The charter of the city of Charleston, after enumerating many subjects, including streets, concerning which the city council may legislate, empowers the council to make "in general every other by-law or regulation that shall appear to them requisite and necessary for the security, welfare, and convenience of said city or for preserving peace, order, and good government within the same." Section 1999 of the Civil Code confers like power on the councils of all the towns and cities of the state. These general provisions concerning the management of purely municipal affairs do not express an intention to confer on the municipality the state's power of fixing rates to be charged by public service corporations. Hence, if the petitioner were operating under a state or municipal franchise containing no agreement on the subject, the city council would have no power to fix the rates to be charged.

But, on the other hand, the general control of the streets conferred on the council does carry with it the power to grant a franchise for the use of the streets, for a purpose beneficial to the municipal public, on such conditions as the council may see fit to impose, including the condition that the council may fix the rates; and when the public service corporation accepted the franchise it submitted to and was bound by the conditions. The principle is recognized in South Bound Ry. Co. v. Burton, 67 S. C. 515, 46 S. E. 340. The cases on the subject are collected in 28 Cyc. 866, 876, 880.

[3] This rule seems too obvious for extended discussion. Indeed, the petitioner does not deny that the contract embodied in the franchise resolution was valid and binding in all its parts when it was entered into, and that it conferred on the city council the right to fix rates. But the position taken is that the agreement between petitioner and the city council that the latter should regulate the rates was made subject to the state's sovereign power to assert its control over the rate to be charged by public service corporations; and that the state has exercised that power by the statute of 1912, providing for a commission, on which was conferred the power, and has thus destroyed the right to fix rates, conferred on the council by the franchise contract.

It is true that the franchise was granted and accepted in view of the state's power to regulate the rates to be charged, and it may be that the state could, by statute, supplant any rate fixed by the council under the contract. Spring Valley Water Co. v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 347, 4 Sup. Ct. 48, 28 L. Ed. 173; Home Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Los Angeles, supra; Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 467, 31 Sup. Ct. 265, 55 L. Ed. 297. Taking the view most favorable to the petitioner, and assuming that the state has reserved that power, I think it clear that, until the commission has exercised its power to fix a different rate, that provided by the contract stands. The statute relied on by the petitioner is that passed in 1910 (28 St. 564), and amended in 1912 so as to include the county of Charleston (27 St. 551). Sections 1 and 2 are as follows:

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of South Carolina, that there shall be created a public service commission of three reputable and competent citizens of this state, to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate, who shall be authorized to fix and establish in all cities of this state, now or hereafter incorporated under any general or special law of this state, maximum rates and charges for the supply of water, gas or electricity furnished by any person, firm or corporation to such city and the inhabitants thereof, such rates to be reasonable and just.

"Sec. 2. That upon complaint in writing of twenty or more citizens to the mayor or council of such city, that any person, firm or corporation is charging an unjust or unreasonable rate for water, gas or electricity, furnished by the same, the said city, mayor or council may request the public service commission to summons such person, the members of such firm or the officers of such corporation to appear before them, with their books relating to such matters, when such examination shall be made as may be necessary to determine whether or not the said rates are unjust or unreasonable; and if upon such examination the said public service commission shall determine that the said rates are unreasonable or unjust, and it shall be their duty to fix such rates to be paid for water, gas or electricity as they may deem to be just and reasonable: Provided, that in case the said public service commission shall fix unjust and unreasonable rates the same may be reviewed and determined by the circuit court of the county in which such city is located."

[4] Giving the broadest meaning and full force to the statute, it empowers the commission to make a maximum rate lower or higher than that which it may find fixed by the public service corporation itself, or by some agency which has fixed the rate under the authority of the corporation. Until the commission acts, the power of the corporation to provide its rates is unhampered by the statute. If there had been no contract with the city council with respect to rates, and the Charleston Consolidated Railway & Lighting Company had given notice on June 11, 1912, that after July 1, 1912, it would charge certain rates for its service, those rates would have been legal until the commission had prescribed different rates. The rates fixed by the city council, under the express authorization of the Consolidated Railway & Lighting Company, stand on precisely the same footing as if the company itself had fixed them. Instead of retaining the right to prescribe its own charges for its service, the company, as the sole consideration for a very valuable franchise, appointed the city council to take its place in the exercise of the right. It is no ground for the repudiation of the appointment and authorization that the state has asserted its right to determine whether the rates fixed under the contract are just and reasonable. It is important to observe that there is no allegation in the complaint that the rates prescribed by the city council are unreasonable. Nor is there any claim that the contract was invalid, because unreasonable and oppressive, in that it gave the city council absolute power in a matter in which it was an interested party. The members of the city council have no personal interest, but act on their responsibility as public officials; and the presumption is that they will act justly and without prejudice. Spring Valley Water Co. v. Schottler, supra; Home Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Los Angeles, supra.

The argument in support of petitioner's claim was presented with great ability orally at the hearing and afterwards in writing. Large interests are involved; and, if petitioner's contention should be ultimately sustained, much loss would be entailed by a refusal to grant the injunction. Under these conditions, if I had a serious doubt, it would be resolved in favor of the petitioner, and the injunction granted. But, for the reasons stated, the matter seems plain to me beyond all doubt, and the injunction must be refused.

It is therefore ordered that the application for the temporary injunction be refused, and that the restraining order heretofore granted be revoked. It is further ordered that the petitioner credit each consumer who maintains a current account the excess charged or collected for light, heat, or power since July 1, 1912, over the rates fixed by the city council to go into effect on that day; and that in cases where the account has been closed that the petitioner pay such excess by check delivered in person or mailed to the consumer.

STATE ex rel. LYON, Atty. Gen., v. McCOWN et al.

1. STATES (§ 119*)—APPROPRIATIONS—STATE WAREHOUSE.

The appropriation of state money by the State Warehouse Act (Laws 1912, p. 707) is not a violation of Const. art. 10, § 11, prohibiting the appropriation of public revenues to private purposes; the operation of the warehouse for which the money is appropriated being a public purpose, and the statute being within the state's police powers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 118; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

2. STATES (§ 150*)—INCREASE OF INDEBTEDNESS — STATE WAREHOUSE — "ORDINARY STATE BUSINESS."

The State Warehouse Act (Laws 1912, p. 707), in so far as it provides for an issuance of bonds and an increase of the public debt, without first submitting the question to the qualified voters, violates Const. art. 10, § 11, prohibiting an increase in the state debt without the consent of the voters except for the "ordinary" and current business of the state; the building of warehouses not being "ordinary" state business, and the bonds not being intended to be for a debt of the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 144; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5027.]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 211*)—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAW—STATE WAREHOUSE.

The State Warehouse Act (Laws 1912, p. 707) is not violative of Const. art. 1, § 5, providing that no person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws, nor of the similar provision of the federal Constitution, though it makes no provision for the care or storage of any commodity other than lint cotton.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 678; Dec. Dig. § 211.*]

4. STATES (§ 136*)—STATE WAREHOUSE—RECEIPTS—"SCRIP," CERTIFICATES, OR OTHER EVIDENCE OF STATE INDEBTEDNESS."

The warehouse receipts authorized to be issued under the State Warehouse Act (Laws 1912, p. 707) are not "scrip, certificates, or other evidence of state indebtedness" within the meaning of Const. art. 10, § 7, restricting the issuance of such paper.

5. STATES (§ 131*)—APPROPRIATIONS—STATE WAREHOUSE.

The State Warehouse Act (Laws 1912, p. 707), in so far as it makes appropriation for both the years 1912 and 1913, violates Const. art. 10, § 2, providing for an annual tax sufficient only to defray the estimated state expenses for each year and for any existing deficiency.

6. STATES (§ 119*)—PLEDGING OF CREDIT—STATE WAREHOUSE.

Laws 1912, p. 986, § 40, authorizing money to be borrowed on the state's credit for the carrying out of the provisions of the act to establish a state warehouse commission (Laws 1912, p. 707), is not violative of Const. art. 10, § 6, providing that the credit of the state shall not be pledged for private purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 118; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

7. STATUTES (§ 64*)—PARTIAL INVALIDITY.

Since the State Warehouse Act (Laws 1912, p. 707) remains incomplete and ineffective to carry out the legislative intent after that part of it which is unconstitutional is stricken out, the entire act is void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 58-66, 195; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

"To be officially reported."

Petition by the State, on the relation of J. Fraser Lyon, as Attorney General, against J. W. McCown and others, as State Warehouse Commission. Judgment for petitioner.

The following is a copy of the statute (Laws 1912, p. 707) referred to in the opinion:

"An act to create and operate a state warehouse system for storing cotton and other commodities.

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina: That there shall be elected forthwith by the General Assembly three commissioners, who shall constitute a board, to be hereafter known as the State Warehouse Commission. The term of office shall be for two, four and six years, the members of the board deciding by lot the respective terms of each. In case of a vacancy by death or otherwise on the board of commissioners, the Governor shall appoint a person to fill such vacancy until the next regular session of the General Assembly, when an election shall be held as provided for in this section.

"Sec. 2. The chairman of the board thus created shall be designated by the General Assembly at the time of the election provided for in section 1 of this act, whose duty it shall be to preside at all meetings of the commission and have general supervision of the management of the business of the commission, subject, however, to the approval of the majority of the members of said commission; and it shall be his further duty to enforce and carry out all such rules and regulations as may be adopted by said commission for the control and management of the business provided for in this act.

"Sec. 3. It shall be the duty of the State Warehouse Commission to provide by purchase, lease or otherwise a system of warehouses at the most eligible sites in this state capable of storing not less than 250,000 bales of cotton, and the commission is hereby given power and authority to employ clerks, architects and such other agents and employes as in their judgment they deem necessary, and adopt rules and regulations not contrary to the provisions herein set forth, which, in their judgment, are necessary to carry out the intent and purposes of this act; and the said commission shall have the power to enter into contracts with relation to the matters contained herein, and may sue and be sued in any of the courts of this state: Provided, that only the property held by the said Warehouse Commission for the purposes herein mentioned shall be answerable in any suit or action against them.

"Sec. 4. The manager of the state warehouses shall be appointed and his duties prescribed by the board of commissioners, who shall fix the compensation of such manager, and the said manager shall be subject to removal by the board of commissioners whenever, in their judgment, the public interest demands it.

"Sec. 5. The board of commissioners shall appoint expert cotton graders whose compensation shall be fixed by the board, and the said cotton graders shall be subject to removal by the board of commissioners whenever, in their judgment, the public interest demands it.

"Sec. 6. The State Warehouse Commission is empowered to acquire such property as they may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, such property to be acquired by lease or purchase, and said commission is empowered to establish a compress in connection with said warehouse system at any point or points in this state where, in the judgment of said commission, it is necessary or practicable to carry out the purposes of this act.

"Sec. 7. All lint cotton properly baled and such other commodities as the commission deem proper shall be received for storage at said state warehouses, and the charges for same shall be fixed by the State Warehouse Commission. Each bale of cotton shall be weighed, graded and numbered so as to be identified at all times, the grades to be according to the standard grades adopted by the United States government. The person depositing the cotton or other commodities shall be given a receipt from the State Warehouse Commission, signed by the manager of the warehouses in which the cotton or other commodity is stored, which receipt shall give the weight, grade and number of each bale of cotton or description of other commodity. The said receipts to be transferable only by written assignment, and the cotton or other commodities which it represents deliverable only upon the production of the original receipt, which is to be marked 'cancelled' when the cotton or other commodity is taken from the warehouse. All cotton or other commodities on storage shall be fully insured.

"Sec. 8. The State Warehouse Commission is hereby and herein authorized and empowered to issue coupon bonds in an amount not to exceed $250,000.00 in denominations not less than $500.00 each, and running for a term of thirty (30) years from the date of issue, bearing interest at a rate not to exceed six (6%) per cent. per annum, the interest on said bonds to be payable semiannually, and to execute as security for said bonds a mortgage or deed of trust on any real estate said commission may then own, with the right to said commission to retire by purchase any or all of said bonds at the end of twenty (20) years from the date of issue, the proceeds of said bonds to be used only for carrying out the objects and purposes of this act. In the meantime and until said commission shall find itself able to issue and negotiate the sale of said bonds as herein provided, it shall have power and authority to borrow money upon the notes of said commission not exceeding the sum of $250,000.00, said notes to run for not exceeding five (5) years, and to bear interest at a rate not exceeding six (6%) per cent. per annum, said notes being subject to renewal from time to time in the discretion of said commission, and the proceeds of said notes to be used in carrying out the objects and purposes of this act, and that as security for the money so borrowed on said notes said commission shall have the right to pledge by way of mortgage or deed of trust any property, real, personal or mixed, which it may then own: Provided, that said notes shall be taken up and retired when the bonds herein provided for have been issued, negotiated and sold: Provided, further, that the bonds and the notes herein provided to be issued are not to be a debt or obligation of the state of South Carolina: Provided, further, that nothing contained in this section is intended to prohibit said commission from borrowing temporarily, from time to time, on its notes, such amounts of money, not exceeding $20,000.00, as it may find necessary for the proper conduct of the business of said commission.

"Sec. 9. In fixing the charge for handling and storing cotton, the commission shall, in addition to providing a sinking fund to retire the bonds provided in section 8, also provide a sinking fund for the retirement of the amount advanced by the state, in fifty years.

"Sec. 10. The charges on cotton shall, after the system herein provided for has been put into operation, cover all current operating expenses, it being the intention of this act to make this system self-sustaining and at the same time give storage at actual cost as nearly as practicable.

"Sec. 11. The Warehouse Commission shall have the power to acquire, by lease, any standard built cotton warehouse in the several towns of the state and operate them in all respects, under the provisions of this act, as applied to the state warehouse. That each commissioner, when elected or appointed under this act before entering upon the duties herein imposed, shall execute to the state his official bond in the sum of $25,000.00 each for the faithful performance of their duties.

"Sec. 12. And the managers, graders, or other officers at any warehouse operated by the state, shall execute such bonds for the faithful performance of their duties as may be required by the State Warehouse Commission. The premiums on all bonds required of officers and employees under the terms of this act shall be paid out of the funds of the commission.

"Sec. 13. Any person offering cotton for sale in the open market can have his cotton weighed and graded at any warehouse operated by the state, and shall receive his certificate setting forth the number, weight and grade of each bale. The fee for such services not to exceed the sum of twenty-five cents for each bale so weighed and graded.

"Sec. 14. The compensation of the chairman shall be $2,100.00 per annum, and the compensation of the other members of the board shall be $6.00 per day for each day's attendance and two and one-half (2½) cents per mile for each mile actually traveled, and other necessary expenses actually incurred in the discharge of their duties hereunder.

"Sec. 15. The state board shall make an annual report of the operations of the warehouse system to the General Assembly.

"Sec. 16. The sum of $5,000.00 is hereby appropriated for the contingent expenses of said board and $250,000.00 divided into two equal annual installments of $125,000.00 in 1912 and $125,000.00 in 1913 to carry out the purposes of this act is hereby appropriated: Provided, that the Attorney General of the state immediately after the approval of this act shall institute in the Supreme Court a proceeding against the said commission for the purpose of determining the constitutionality of this act, and that no part of the moneys herein and hereby appropriated shall become available until the termination of said proceedings.

"Sec. 17. This act shall go into effect immediately upon its approval by the Governor.

"In the Senate House the sixteenth day of February in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twelve."

Attorney General Lyon, for the State.
John L. McLaurin, of Bennettsville, and Duncan C. Ray, of Columbia, for respondents.

GARY, C. J. This is a petition to the court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, in which the petitioner prays that an act of the Legislature (Laws 1912, p. 707) entitled "An act to create and operate a state warehouse system, for storing cotton and other commodities," be declared unconstitutional, and that the respondents be enjoined from attempting to enforce its provisions. The return of the respondents to the rule to show cause why the prayer of the petitioner should not be granted was formal, and merely submitted the question involved to the consideration of the court. A copy of the act will be set out in the report of the case.

The circumstances under which the court should declare a statute unconstitutional, the police power, and the unlimited power of the Legislature, except when controlled by constitutional provisions, are discussed, at length, in the case of State v. Aiken, 42 S. C. 222, 20 S. E. 221, 26 L. R. A. 345, and that case renders unnecessary the further discussion, in a general way, of these questions, in this proceeding.

The grounds upon which the petitioner contends that the act is unconstitutional are designated by the letters "a," "b," "c," "d," "e," "f," "g," and "h," and will be considered in regular order.

[1] (a) "It appropriates public revenues to private purposes, and provides that the state, through her public officers, engage in an enterprise, in no way incident or relating to any governmental function or matter, the warehouse system provided for therein, being solely for the benefit of private individuals, and is violative of section 11, art. 10, of the Constitution." The ultimate solution of this proposition depends upon the question whether the said act can be construed as a police regulation. The title of the act shows that its object was to create and operate a state warehouse system for storing cotton and other commodities. It will be observed it was not the intention of the statute that the state should become the owner of the cotton or other commodities deposited in the warehouse, nor that the state should operate the warehouse for the purpose of profit. The object of the act may be stated in few words. The cotton growers in this state, and the merchants to whom a large portion of the staple is delivered, in payment of indebtedness for supplies consumed in its production, are, as a rule, unable to hold it but for a short time after the crop is gathered; and a "forced sale" means a sacrifice of profits to them. Knowing this fact, certain speculators, by combination of capital, and manipulation of the money market, are able, for a short time, by reducing the circulating volume of money, to depress the cotton market and fix an unreasonably low price for the cotton crop. They would not, however, be able to control the price but for a short time, and the object of the statute was to give protection to the public, during this period, from an enforced sale of the cotton crop. We deem it unnecessary to discuss at length the manner in which this unreasonable depression in price affects not only the cotton grower, but the people generally, as well as every department of the government, and every governmental agency in the state. In passing this statute, the state was clearly within the exercise of its police power, which in its last analysis simply means the state's right of self-defense. The case of Barfield v. Stevens Mercantile Co., 85 S. C. 186, 67 S. E. 158, and the cases therein cited, tend to show that the act in question, was for a public and not a private purpose.

(b) "It provides that the state shall engage in a private business, not incidental or necessary to the exercise of the police power." What has just been said disposes of this ground.

[2] (c) "It provides for an issue of bonds, and an increase of the public debt, without first submitting the question as to the creation of such new debt to the qualified electors of this state at a general election, in violation of section 11, art. 10, of the Constitution." Section 11, art. 10, of the Constitution, is as follows: "To the end that the public debt of South Carolina may not hereafter be increased, without the due consideration and free consent of the people of the state, the General Assembly is hereby forbidden to create any further debt or obligation, either by the loan of the credit of the state, by guaranty, indorsement or otherwise, except for the ordinary and current business of the state, without first submitting the question, as to the creation of such new debt, guaranty, indorsement or loan of its credit, to the qualified electors of this state, at a general state election; and unless two-thirds of the qualified electors of this state, voting on the question, shall be in favor of increasing the debt, guaranty, indorsement or loan of its credit, none shall be created or made." There are two reasons why this ground must be sustained: (1) The building of warehouses is not one of the ordinary functions of government. Therefore the issuing of bonds for such purposes cannot be properly regarded as embraced within the words "the ordinary and current business of the state." (2) It appears upon the face of the statute that the bonds were not intended to be a debt or obligation of the state. Bonds can only be issued, under section 11, art. 10, of the Constitution, when a debt or obligation of the state is thereby created.

[3] (d) "It is discriminatory and denies the equal protection of the law, in that no provision is made for expert grading, classifying, weighing, or otherwise putting in a marketable condition, any commodity other than lint cotton, and does not compel the acceptance for storage of any commodity other than lint cotton." The petitioner does not state whether the statute denies the equal protection of the laws, under the state or federal Constitution. The rule in such cases, arising under the federal Constitution, is thus clearly stated by Mr. Justice Van Devanter, in Lindsley v. N. C. Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 31 Sup. Ct. 337, 55 L. Ed. 369: "(1) The equal-protection clause of the fourteenth amendment does not take from the state the power to classify in the adoption of police laws, but admits of the exercise of a wide scope of discretion in that regard, and avoids what is done only, when it is without any reasonable basis, and therefore is purely arbitrary. (2) A classification having some reasonable basis does not offend against that clause, merely because it is not made with mathematical nicety, or because in practice it results in some inequality. (3) When the classification in such a law is called in question, if any state of facts reasonably can be conceived that would sustain it, the existence of that state of facts, at the time the law was enacted, must be assumed. (4) One who assails the classification in such a law must carry the burden of showing that it does not rest upon any reasonable basis, but is essentially arbitrary." This language also shows that the classification is not repugnant to section 5, art. 1, of the state Constitution, which provides that no person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws. The case of State v. Aiken, 42 S. C. 222, 20 S. E. 221, 26 L. R. A. 345, shows that when a statute is declared to be a police regulation, and the state takes charge of the business, the objection that it is a monopoly cannot properly arise.

[4] (e) "It provides for issuing receipts for commodities stored in warehouses, transferable by written assignment, which receipts are certificates of indebtedness, issued contrary to section 7, art. 10, of the Constitution." Section 7, art. 10, of the Constitution, is as follows: "No scrip, certificate, or other evidence of state indebtedness shall be issued, except for the redemption of stock bonds, or other evidence of indebtedness previously issued, or for such debts as are expressly authorized in this Constitution." Section 7 of the statute under consideration contains these provisions: "The person depositing the cotton or other commodities, shall be given a receipt from the State Warehouse Commission, signed by the manager of the warehouse, in which the cotton or other commodity is stored, which receipt shall give the weight, grade and number of each bale of cotton, or description of other commodity. The said receipts to be transferable only by written assignment, and the cotton or other commodities which it represents, deliverable only upon the production of the original receipt, which is to be marked 'cancelled,' when the cotton or other commodity is taken from the warehouse." It is only necessary to refer to the foregoing language of said section, to show that the receipt therein mentioned, in no respect whatever, partakes of the characteristics of "scrip, certificate or other evidence of state indebtedness."

[5] (f) "It makes appropriations for both the years 1912 and 1913, contrary to the provisions of section 2, art. 10, of the Constitution." Section 2, art. 10, of the Constitution, is as follows: "The General Assembly shall provide for an annual tax sufficient to defray the estimated expenses of the state for each year, and whenever it shall happen that the ordinary expenses of the state for any year shall exceed the income of the state for such year, the General Assembly shall provide, for levying a tax for the ensuing year sufficient, with other sources of income, to pay the deficiency of the preceding year, together with the estimated expenses of the ensuing year." Section 16 of said act provides that "the sum of $250,000.00, divided into two equal annual installments of $125,000.00 in 1912, and $125,000.00 in 1913, to carry out the purposes of this act, is hereby appropriated." If the Legislature contemplated the expenditure of the $250,000 during the year 1912, then it was necessary to include the whole amount, in the estimated expenses of the state for 1912, in providing for the annual tax for that year. If, however, it was not contemplated to expend $125,000 thereof until 1913, then that sum could only be properly included in the estimated expenses for the year 1913, in making provision for the annual tax for that year. Therefore the appropriation of $125,000 of said amount was in violation of the Constitution.

(g) "It attempts to apply a tax to an object not stated in the law, and thereby violates section 3, art. 10, of the Constitution." Section 3, art. 10, of the Constitution, is as follows: "No tax shall be levied except in pursuance of a law, which shall distinctly state the object of the same, to which object the tax shall be applied." Section 16 of the act appropriates $250,000 to carry out the purposes thereof. We have already shown that $125,000 of said amount was not appropriated in the manner provided by law. If it should hereinafter be determined that the entire act must be declared null and void, then it will present a mere abstract question, whether the remaining $125,000 was properly appropriated.

[8] (h) "The said act, together with section 40 of 'An act to make appropriation to meet the ordinary expenses of the state government for the fiscal year, commencing January 1st, 1912, and to provide for a tax sufficient to defray the same' [Laws 1912, p. 968], provides for pledging the credit of the state for the benefit of private individuals, owners of lint cotton in bales, in violation of section 6, art. 10, of the Constitution of South Carolina; that section 40 of said appropriation act is hereto attached and made a part of this petition, and marked 'Exhibit B.'" Section 40 of the act just mentioned is as follows: "That in anticipation of the taxes hereinbefore levied, the Governor and the State Treasurer and the Comptroller General be, and they are hereby, empowered to borrow, on credit of the state, so much money from time to time, as may be needed to meet promptly, at maturity, the interest which will mature on the first day of July and on the first day of January of each year on the valid debt of the state, and to pay the current expenses of the state government, for the present fiscal year, and for pensions, and for carrying out the provisions of an act to establish a State Warehouse Commission, if the same be declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the state: Provided, that the sum so borrowed shall not exceed six hundred thousand ($600,000) dollars." Section 6, art. 10, of the Constitution, provides that "the credit of the state shall not be pledged or loaned, for the benefit of any individual, company, association or corporation; and the state shall not become a joint owner of, or stockholder in any company, association, or corporation. * * *

This ground is disposed of by the conclusion that the act was intended as a police measure, and therefore necessarily related to a subject that was public in its nature.

[7] The last question to be determined is whether the portions of the act that have been declared unconstitutional render it null and void in its entirety. The rule is thus stated in Cooley's Con. Lim. (6th Ed.) pp. 211, 212, and quoted with approval in Utsey v. Hiott, 30 S. C. 360, 9 S. E. 338, 14 Am. St. Rep. 910, and Murph v. Landrum, 76 S. C. 21, 56 S. E. 850: "If, when the unconstitutional portion is stricken out, that which remains is complete in itself, and capable of being executed in accordance with the apparent legislative intent, wholly independent of that which was rejected, it must be sustained. The difficulty is in determining whether the good and bad parts of the statute are capable of being separated within the meaning of the rule. If a statute attempted to accomplish two or more objects, and is void as to one, it may still be, in every respect, complete and valid as to the other. But if its purpose is to accomplish a single object only, and some of its provisions are void, the whole must fall, unless sufficient remains to effect the objects, without the aid of the invalid portion, and if they are so mutually connected with and dependent upon each other, as conditions, considerations, or compensations for each other, as to warrant the belief that the Legislature intended them as a whole, and if all could not be carried into effect the Legislature would not pass the residue independently, then, if some parts are unconstitutional, all the provisions, which are thus dependent, conditionally or connected, must fall with them." Tested by these principles, the entire act must be declared unconstitutional. Of course, the conclusion that the statute under consideration is void in its entirety does not mean that in its general scope it is not a police regulation, but that it cannot be given effect in its present form, by reason of its failure, in certain respects, to comply with the requirements of the Constitution.

It is the judgment of this court that the act herein mentioned is null and void, and that the respondents be enjoined from attempting to carry its provisions into effect.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lee County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by Charley Lowry against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McLeod & Dennis, of Bishopville, and H. E. Davis, of Florence, for appellant. L. D. Jennings, of Sumter, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The following statement is taken from appellant's argument: "This is an action for damages for personal injury, caused by the plaintiff being struck by a locomotive of the defendant at a public crossing in the city of Sumter. The plaintiff alleged that he was injured as a result of the failure of the defendant to give the statutory signals at the crossing. The defendant alleged that the proper signals were given, and alleged, further, that the defendant was guilty of contributory negligence, in that the injury was the result of the plaintiff having fallen asleep upon the track of the defendant. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of nine hundred and ninety-nine ($999) dollars. The defendant appealed from the judgment on this verdict."

Argument.

The error alleged was the failure of the circuit judge to charge certain requests submitted by the defendant's attorney. The record shows that after the charge of the trial judge the attorneys for the defendant handed up several requests to charge. When this was done, the following remarks were made by the judge and the plaintiff's attorney: "This request No. 1 here I think is a charge on the facts. You make me tell the jury what state of facts is negligence, and the law says I cannot do that. Mr. Jennings: Are those requests handed up by the defendant? Court: Yes, sir. Mr. Jennings: I have heard nothing about them, and I do not know. I think they were not handed up in time, under the rule of the court. The Court: Yes, sir; I am looking over them now. Mr. Jennings: They ought to be handed up before argument. The Court: I think I have covered most of the requests in my general charge; and they were handed up so late I have not time to see whether or not they are in proper shape. Glancing over them casually, I think I have covered all of them."

Rule 11 says: "Before argument of the case commences, the counsel on either side shall read and submit to the court in writing such propositions of law as they propose to rely on, which shall constitute the request to charge."

Whatever may be said of the right of opposing counsel to know, before he makes his argument, the propositions of law upon which opposing counsel rely, in this case the presiding judge said "they were handed up so late I have not time to see whether or not they are in proper shape." There is no use to have a rule to protect the trial judge, unless an appellate court will enforce the rule.

As all the exceptions refer to the requests to charge, submitted not only after argument, but after the charge, they will not be considered.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

LANCASTER et al. v. SOUTHERN RY., CAROLINA DIVISION.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where under the evidence it seems that the jury could not have reached, with reason, any other conclusion than that due care required defendant carrier to furnish a light and stool for women alighting from the train, error in instructing that it is a carrier's duty to furnish the same is harmless, though due care does not always require the furnishing of them.

2. CARRIERS (§ 319*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER ALIGHTING—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

In view of a carrier's duty to exercise the highest degree of care for safety of passengers, its failure to provide either a stool or light for a woman passenger in getting off the train at a place away from the station, and where there was considerable distance between the car step and the ground, was some evidence of a wanton disregard of an obvious duty, as regards punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1340, 1342, 1344; Dec. Dig. § 319.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Grace Lancaster and another against the Southern Railway, Carolina Division. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sanders & De Pass, of Spartanburg, for appellant. R. A. Hannon and Jno. Gary Evans, both of Spartanburg, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for physical injuries under testimony from herself and her husband tending to prove that she was a passenger on defendant's train on the night of January 31, 1909, intending to leave the train at Spartanburg Junction; that when a stop was made just before reaching the station the agents of the defendant called, "All out for the Junction"; that in alighting from the train in response to the call she fell from the train and suffered a miscarriage, to her great pain and injury; and that the fall was due to the defendant's breach of duty in calling on her to leave the train before reaching the junction, at a place where the distance between the lowest step of the car and the ground was so great as to make alighting unsafe without a stool, and its negligence in not furnishing a stool or lights or assistance to enable her to alight in safety. The defendant introduced testimony from the attending physician and other physicians tending to prove that the plaintiff's miscarriage was inevitable, though it might have been hastened by the fall. Mrs. Case, the companion of the plaintiff who was a witness for the defendant, testified that she got off the train just ahead of the plaintiff and observed no fall, but she confirmed the testimony of the plaintiff that the place where they alighted was not the station, and that to reach the station they had to walk in a very narrow path along an embankment. Against this evidence that the stop was made away from the station and at a place where due care for the safety of passengers leaving the train manifestly required a light and a stool, the only evidence offered by the defendant was that of the flagman, Isaacs, who did not remember whether the station had been called before the train reached the junction, and testified that, while to the best of his recollection the train stopped at the usual place with the passenger coach opposite the station building where there was a gravel walk, yet he could not say positively where it stopped.

[1] The main question is whether, in view of this evidence, the following instruction was a charge on the facts, in that the presiding judge undertook to tell the jury what particular things due diligence required the carrier to supply: "The jury is charged that it is the duty of a railroad company to provide suitable and reasonably safe places for its passengers to alight from its trains, and to provide a stool or steps, or other appliances, properly and safely placed so as to reasonably avoid injury to its passengers alighting from its trains."

The general rule is well established that the province of the judge on issues of negligence is to instruct the jury what degree of care is required, leaving to the jury to decide what particular precautions due care required. We should have been better satisfied if the circuit judge had omitted the words we have italicized; but, looking at the matter in a practical way, it seems safe to say that the error of including them was not prejudicial. In view of the positive and undisputed evidence on the part of the plaintiff as to the call, "All out for the Junction," and the positive and direct evidence on the part of the defendant as well as the plaintiff that the train was stopped before it reached the station, that the step was very high, and that the landing was very narrow and on the verge of a steep incline, opposed only by the recollection of the flagman who could not swear positively, it seems to the court that the jury could not have reached, with reason, any other conclusion than that due care required that the defendant should furnish a light and stool for women alighting from the train. While it is not true that due care always requires the carrier to furnish stools or other appliances for passengers to alight, conditions shown here by the evidence, beyond reasonable doubt, did require such precautions.

[2] The other exceptions depend on the proposition that there was no evidence to support a verdict for punitive damages. Considering the duty so well known to carriers to exercise the highest degree of care in providing for the safety of its passengers; the failure attributed to it by the witnesses to provide either a stool or a light for the plaintiff in getting off the train at the place described was some evidence of a wanton disregard of an obvious duty.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

3. RAILROADS (§ 396*)—ACTION FOR INJURIES—NEGLIGENCE—INFERENCE.

From the fact that a railroad company without signal or lookout ran an engine backwards at great speed over a portion of its track which the public, including women and school children, had been in the habit of using as a thoroughfare with the acquiescence of the railroad company, the jury might infer a spirit of indifference to persons on the track, and a conscious failure to observe due care.

4. RAILROADS (§ 400*)—INJURIES TO PERSON ON TRACK—JURY QUESTION.

Where the evidence was conflicting as to whether a lookout was kept on an engine backing rapidly over a portion of track frequented by the public, and as to whether signals were given, and as to whether the trainmen saw or should have seen plaintiff whose foot was caught in the track or heard or should have heard her cries of distress, the questions were for the jury.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Georgia Dimery against the Bennettsville & Cheraw Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. K. Owens, of Bennettsville, for appellant. Stevenson, Stevenson & Prince, of Cheraw, Townsend & Rogers, and McColl & McColl, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action for damages for an injury sustained by plaintiff in the following manner: While walking along the defendant's railroad, she got her foot caught between a rail of the main line and a switch rail, and while so held upon the track an engine and train of cars came along, and ran over her leg just above her foot, and crushed it so that her foot had to be cut off.

[1] The exceptions are numerous, long and involved, being fifteen in number and covering nine pages of the "case," but we are at liberty to consider only one of them, because the others are based upon the alleged refusal to charge certain requests, and it appears only in the exceptions that such requests were presented to the court. It has been frequently held that an exception will not be considered, unless it appears in the "case" that the ruling or finding complained of was made. Sloan v. Courtenay, 54 S. C. 314, 32 S. E. 431, and cases cited where the reasons for this rule are given. It would have been sufficient, if it had been stated in the "case" that the plaintiff presented certain requests to charge, and that they are correctly set out in the exceptions.

The action was based upon the alleged negligence, recklessness, and wantonness of defendant in running its train of cars backward through a populous part of the town of Bennettsville, at a rapid rate of speed, without lookout or signal, at a point where its track was used by the public as a walkway with its knowledge and acquiescence. Besides a denial of the allegations of the complaint, the principal defense relied upon was contributory negligence. The court refused to submit to the jury the issue of recklessness and wantonness, holding that there was no evidence to support the allegations thereof.

[2] As the defense of contributory negligence is not available to defendant, if the injury was recklessly or wantonly inflicted, the alleged recklessness and wantonness of defendant was a vital issue; and therefore, if the evidence required the submission of that issue to the jury, the failure to do so was reversible error.

[3] There was evidence tending to prove that at the place where the injury occurred the defendant's track was used by the public—men and women and children—going to and from town and school and church, just like it was a public street, and that it was so used with the knowledge and acquiescence of defendant; that the train of cars was run backwards, the tender being in front of the engine, very fast over the track so used, without lookout, and without signaling its approach by ringing the bell or blowing the whistle. From this the jury might have inferred a spirit of indifference to the rights of those so using the track, or a conscious failure to observe due care for their safety. Sanders v. Railway, 90 S. C. 331, 73 S. E. 356.

[4] There was conflict in the testimony as to whether a proper lookout was kept and the approach of the train signaled by the ringing of the bell or blowing the whistle, and also as to whether, if a proper lookout had been kept, the signals of distress given by plaintiff's sister and others near her, when it was first discovered that she could not get off the track, could have been seen in time to stop the train before injuring her. But these questions should have been submitted to the jury.

Reversed.

HILL v. HILL et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 7, 1912.)

PARTITION (§ 9*)—MINOR HEIRS—RECOVERY.

Where, in an action to confirm a fair, though unauthorized, parol partition agreement, entered into with minor heirs in 1904, it appeared that their interest had increased in value, and was worth double the amount to be paid for it under the agreement, they were entitled to its present value.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Clarendon County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by J. R. Hill against Jack N. Hill and others. From judgment confirming report of referee, defendants appeal. Modified.

The following is the report of referee:

"On December 19, 1873, one C. W. Weeks conveyed in fee unto W. F. Hill, F. A. Geddings, H. M. Brown, A. P. Hill, J. R. Hill, and A. K. Hill, the latter subsequently marrying John G. Kolb, the tract of 50 acres of land described in the complaint.

"Many years ago N. H. Hill, the father of the above grantees, and with whom they live upon the said tract of land, verbally swapped some of this land that ran near the residence of a neighbor, by the name of Aaron Kolb, for a piece of land lying near the residence of the said N. H. Hill. It is true there is no satisfactory evidence of the exact quantity of land thus exchanged, nor is there any satisfactory evidence of where it lay by metes and bounds; but there is evidence that Aaron Kolb cultivated some 3 or 4 acres of this 50-acre tract near his home, and that N. H. Hill cultivated some 7 or 8 acres of what is claimed was the Kolb land near the farmer's house, and that Kolb had a small pasture upon some more of the land many years ago; but, as I view the agreement of the parties, hereinafter referred to, at time of parol partition, it does not make any difference where the exchanged lands lay, or the quantity thereof.

"On January 8, and 13, 1904, respectively, W. F. Hill and T. A. Geddings conveyed all their interest in said 50-acre tract of land to J. Nelson Brown, and on February 12, 1904, A. P. Hill conveyed all his interest in said tract to John R. Hill, as trustee for the latter's wife during her life, and at her death to be divided between her children, who are the defendant Hill children in this action, with power to trustee to sell and reinvest upon same limitations.

"A. K. Hill, afterwards Alice Kolb, died in 1903, leaving as her heirs her husband, John Kolb, and her children, Viola Lackey, Tabitha Harris, Marion Kolb, Frank Kolb, Ronald Kolb, Susan Kolb, Rosa McLeod, and her grandchildren, Eva Wise and Jessie Wise, children of a predeceased daughter, Henry Wise, and the said husband afterwards died, leaving the same children and grandchildren as his heirs. Thus it will be seen the owners of the 50-acre tract, after the aforesaid conveyances, were the plaintiff, John R. Hill, with one interest in his own right and one as trustee, J. Nelson Brown, with two interests, H. N. Brown, with one interest, and the Kolb children and grandchildren, with one interest; each interest amounting to $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres of land.

"In 1904 these in interest, or their representatives, met to partition the 50-acre tract, having with them a surveyor, and undertook to cut off the Kolb interest first, beginning with the survey near the old Kolb residence, when they were held up by the widow of old man Aaron Kolb, who objected to running around the original lines of the 50-acre tract, unless John P. Hill gave up the land alleged to have been swapped by Aaron Kolb to N. H. Hill. I find it was then and there agreed between old Mrs. Kolb, the grandmother of the Kolb children, Mrs. Viola Lackey, who was represented by her husband, Milton Lackey, Mrs. Tabitha Harris, who was present on the one side, and John R. Hill on the other, that they would cut off the Kolb interest adjoining their residence upon other property of theirs, and that John R. Hill would pay the Kolbs the value of one interest, or of $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres, for the tract of land back of the Hill residence, whatever it might be, of bay and upland. It might be said this agreement by those of age could not bind the minor Kolb heirs; but, as the defendants' attorney is asking that equity be done, I think the rights of all concerned, because of the many irregular acts in connection with this land, will be best subserved by ratifying what was done on this occasion. Certainly Mrs. Lackey and Mrs. Harris are estopped from contending to the contrary.

"The partition was had, and $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres were set aside to the Kolb heirs, 25 acres to the Browns, and what turns out to be 32 acres to the plaintiff, John R. Hill. The plaintiff, John R. Hill, contracted to sell this 32 acres, together with 3.6 acres conveyed to him by his mother in July 7, 1883, calling it all 20 acres, more or less, to the defendant C. H. Broadway for \$750.

"Upon investigation, it was found that the parol partition was ineffectual to divest the interest of the minor Kolb children in the 32 acres allotted, as aforesaid, to John R. Hill. The defendant Broadway declined to comply; hence the Browns and plaintiff convey all their interest in the $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres allotted to the Kolbs unto them, and Marion Kolb and Rosa McLeod, two of the Kolb children, convey all their interest in the portion allotted unto the plaintiff unto him, by deed dated January 15, 1910.

"Then this action was brought against the cestuis que trustent in the trust deed aforesaid, some of whom were minors, to cut them off, upon payment of the value of their interest in land sought to be sold Broadway, and against the rest of the Kolb children, Mrs. Harris and Mrs. Lackey being two of them, and whom I have already held are bound and estopped by the partition and agreement, alleging the premises of the parol partition that plaintiff had conveyed all his interest in Kolb share to them, and asking, upon the court ascertaining the fairness of the partition, that it be ratified and confirmed, and that all those who have not conveyed to plaintiff be adjudged to have no interest in the part allotted to him, as aforesaid.

"The plaintiff's attorney upon the trial earnestly contended that the portion of the defendants' answer setting up the alleged swap of land that did not belong to old man Hill for land of Kolb was foreign to plaintiff's cause of action to ratify verbal partition, and should be stricken out; and, while I may have been wrong in not sustaining the motion and the objection to testimony to establish such a defense, I have decided to stand by my ruling, and do what I conceive to be justice on day of partition.

"I find from the testimony the value of $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres of this 50-acre tract in 1904 was \$100, the highest price fixed by any of the witnesses, and that John R. Hill must account to the Kolb heirs for this sum, with legal interest from January 13, 1904, which was about the day of partition and agreement; this amounting on the day of this report to \$149. Upon the payment of this amount into court, or to those legally entitled to receive it, I find that the plaintiff is entitled to be adjudged to be the owner of whatever land Kolb swapped to Hill; the defendants alleging this to be 25 acres, and designated on the Brown diagram as 'A.'

"I find whatever land Kolb swapped to Hill was under mortgage at the time of exchange, and this, together with the small value placed upon the swamp land in those days, may account for the inequality in acreage of part shown to have been used by Hill.

"I find from the testimony the present value of the trust property $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres, to be \$200.

"I recommend that upon the payment to the clerk of this court of the sum of $750 by the defendant C. H. Broadway that the plaintiff and the said clerk be ordered to convey unto the said C. H. Broadway, in fee, the 35.6 acres of land, described in the complaint as 20 acres, more or less, but more particularly described upon the Brown diagram as follows: All that piece, parcel, or tract of land lying, being, and situate in the county of Clarendon, state of South Carolina, containing 35.6 acres, more or less, and bounded on the north by lands formerly of H. J. McLeod, now said to belong to Harriet Brown, and lands of Bruce Bradham, and east by lands of J. N. Brown and H. M. Brown, south by a tract of land said to have been exchanged by Aaron Kolb with N. H. Hill, and west by lands of the estate of M. Levi, and that all other parties to this action be adjudged to have no interest therein.

"I further recommend that out of this sum the clerk do pay to the Kolb children of age, and to the parents or guardians of those under age, according to their interest therein, the sum of \$149.11 found to be due them, as aforesaid; that \$200 thereof be paid to John R. Hill, trustee, to be invested in land for his children, upon the same limitations as the $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres is held for them; that provision be made in the decree for the payments to the defendants A. A. Strauss and J. A. Weinberg of so much of the remainder as may be necessary to satisfy their mortgages, if any they have, they not being proven before me, and the balance, if any, to the plaintiff, John R. Hill, or his attorney.

"I think this disposes of all questions before me in this difficult matter. All of which is respectfully submitted."

Charlton Du Rant, of Manning, for appellants. W. C. Davis, of Manning, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This action was brought to have a parol partition confirmed by the court, because some of the parties in interest were, and still are, minors. The Kolb heirs set up a special defense, which appears in the report of the referee, where the facts are clearly stated. The report was confirmed and made the judgment of the court. The referee finds that, in 1904, an agreement was made, whereby the one-sixth undivided interest of the Kolb heirs in the 50-acre tract was set off to them next to their residence, and adjoining a tract which they inherited from their father; and the plaintiff, John R. Hill, was to pay them the value of his share in the Hill tract for the Kolb tract which lay near the Hill residence, for which, it is said, his father had exchanged an equal quantity in value of the Hill tract near the Kolb residence. He also finds that the agreement was fair and beneficial to all concerned, and that this interest was worth $100 at the date of the agreement, and recommends that plaintiff be required to pay the Kolb heirs that amount, with interest from that date, and that their title to the tract near the Hill residence be confirmed in plaintiff. The referee also finds that the value of an interest in the Hill tract, at date of his report, was $200.

We think the testimony sustains the finding that the agreement was fair and beneficial to all concerned; but we think the court below erred in fixing the value of the interest at the date of the agreement as the amount which the plaintiff should pay. As no one had authority to make any such agreement in behalf of the minors, and as the plaintiff allowed such a long time to elapse before he called upon the court to ratify and confirm the agreement, and as it appears that, in the meantime, lands have greatly increased in value, and the interest is now worth $200, the court, in protecting the rights of the infants, who are its wards, will require plaintiff to pay the present value, $200, with interest from date of the referee's report. We see nothing in the record to estop the adult Kolb heirs from contending that plaintiff should pay the present value.

The judgment of the circuit court will be modified accordingly.

LONG v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 7, 1912.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 37*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGES—DELIVERY OUTSIDE FREE DELIVERY LIMITS.

Plaintiff's son-in-law, who lived at a mill, but outside the telegraph company's free delivery limits, sent a death message to plaintiff, which was transmitted, and the receiving operator, after finding that plaintiff lived outside of the free delivery limits, sent a service message to the sending office, stating that the plaintiff lived beyond the free delivery limits, that the message was undelivered, and that he was trying to deliver it by phone; and the sending office tried to phone the service message to the office of the mill, but because the office had closed, or on account of some wire trouble, was unable to do so. Held, in the absence of any express or implied agreement, that defendant was not liable for failure to deliver the service message, so that the sender might have a chance to pay or guarantee payment of the charges for delivering the message to plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 23, 24, 29, 30, 32; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 65*)—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—PLEADING—ISSUES AND PROOF.

Where plaintiff alleged defendant's negligence in failing to deliver a telegram to him, but did not allege negligence in failing to deliver a service message to the sender, so that, if necessary, he might pay or guarantee charges of delivery to plaintiff, the defendant, under its denial of the negligence alleged, was entitled to show the fact that the sender lived beyond the free delivery limits, and therefore could not be reached by the service message, since such evidence tended to disprove the negligence charged.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Ernest Moore, Special Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by W. J. Long against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Harry Foster, of Yorkville, for appellant. Williams & Williams, of Lancaster, Geo. H. Fearons, of New York City, and Nelson, Nelson & Gettys, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. [1] This is an action for damages for the alleged negligent delay in delivering a telegram. On April 23, 1909, the plaintiff's son-in-law, who lived at a cotton mill near Clinton, but outside the defendant's free delivery limits at Clinton, sent a message, addressed to plaintiff at Lancaster, announcing the death of plaintiff's daughter. The message was phoned to the Clinton office from the cotton mill office, and promptly transmitted to Lancaster. Upon receiving the message, defendant's agent at Lancaster, after inquiry, ascertained that plaintiff did not live at the cotton mill in whose care it was addressed, but that he lived at Elgin, about five miles beyond defendant's free delivery limits at Lancaster. Thereupon he sent a service message to the Clinton office, stating these facts, and that the message was undelivered, and that he was trying to deliver it by phone, but that it was too stormy. The Clinton office tried to phone the service message to the office of the cotton mill from which the original message came, but the office had either closed for the day, or there was some wire trouble which prevented the communication being made. The testimony is that defendant does not deliver telegrams at this cotton mill, except by phone. The Lancaster agent succeeded in getting the message to plaintiff by phone on the morning of the 24th; and he also sent a copy of it by a person whom he found going to Elgin.

The sole question presented by the appeal is whether defendant is liable because it failed to deliver the service message, sent to the Clinton office, beyond its free delivery limits, so that the sender might have had an opportunity to pay or guarantee payment, as the defendant might require, of the charges for delivering the message to plaintiff beyond the free delivery limits at Lancaster.

The plaintiff contends that defendant knew that the sender lived beyond the free delivery limits of the initial office, and that, when it accepted the message, with knowledge of that fact, and without requiring the sender to pay or guarantee payment of the expense of delivering any service message sent in connection with the original message beyond its free delivery limits, it was bound to deliver any such message. This contention cannot be sustained. The sender also knew, or should have known, that he lived beyond the defendant's free delivery limits; and, if he had wanted any service message delivered to him, it was his duty and business to make the necessary arrangements with defendant's agent to have it done. In the absence of any agreement, express or implied, to do so, the defendant was not bound to send the service message beyond its free delivery limits. The purpose of doing so would have been to give the sender the information contained in it, in order that he might pay or guarantee payment of the extra charge for delivering beyond the free delivery limits at the terminal office. The sender might have refused to do this, and he would have been under no obligation to pay defendant the expense of delivering the service message to him. In the absence of a contract, express or implied, defendant was not bound to take the risk that the sender would pay for delivering the service message to him.

[2] We notice next plaintiff's contention that defendant cannot avail itself of this defense, because it was not pleaded. The plaintiff charged negligence in the failure to deliver the original message to him, not in failing to deliver the service message to the sender. The defendant denied the negligence alleged, and, under that denial, was entitled to introduce any evidence tending to disprove the charge. The fact that the sender lived beyond the free delivery limits, and therefore, could not be reached by the service message, went to disprove the charge of negligence alleged.

There is no evidence of waiver of the defendant's rules as to delivery of messages beyond the free delivery limits at the sending office, and therefore no error in the charge that defendant was not bound to deliver the service message beyond those limits.

Affirmed.

MARTIN v. HOME BANK.

EVIDENCE (§ 442*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—WRITTEN CONTRACT—NOTE.

Where defendant bank accepted plaintiff's note to cover an overdraft on his parol agreement to turn over to the bank the proceeds of a claim against a railroad company as soon as collected, and when such proceeds were deposited the bank credited the same as a payment on the note, though it was not yet due, parol evidence of such agreement was not objectionable in an action against the bank for injury to plaintiff's credit due to its refusal to pay checks for lack of funds, of which there would have been sufficient had the proceeds of the collection been credited to plaintiff's general account.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lexington County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by T. L. Martin against the Home Bank. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. D. Martin, of Lexington, and De Pass & De Pass, for appellant. Graham & Sturkie, of Lexington, and W. H. Sharpe, of Edmund, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Before considering the merits of this appeal, we desire to call attention of counsel to the fact that, notwithstanding only one point is presented for decision, and that a question of law, which, as will be seen, could have been stated in less than 2 pages, the "case" contains 175 pages of printed matter. The pleadings, the stenographer's notes of evidence, the exhibits, and the judge's charge are set out in full. This is not only in violation of rule 5 of this court, but is a useless waste of appellant's money in printing unnecessary matter. But we are more concerned about the unnecessary tax upon the time and patience of the court, when there is so much useful work to do. If the bar will not heed the admonitions of the court and comply with the rules, in the preparation of their "cases" for appeal, the court will be compelled, in self-defense, to take some steps to enforce compliance with the rules.

For several years prior to 1906, plaintiff kept an account with defendant. He had frequently overdrawn his account. On May 14, 1906, he gave defendant a note, secured by chattel mortgage, to secure an overdraft of $1,300. The note was due on August 14th. At the time it was given, plaintiff had a claim against the Seaboard Air Line Railway for something over $500, which he was expecting to collect daily, and he agreed that if the bank would take his note for the overdraft he would apply the amount due him by the railway company to the note, as soon as it was collected. On June 28th, plaintiff received a check for the claim which he indorsed and sent to the bank to be deposited to his account, along with several other items on the same deposit slip. The bank applied the railway check as a credit on his note, notwithstanding it was not then due. Plaintiff gave several checks on the bank, payment of which was refused by the bank for lack of funds. If the $500 check had been deposited to his credit, there would have been enough to his credit to require payment of his checks. He brought this action against the bank to recover damages to his credit as a merchant for refusing payment of his checks. The sole question is whether the court erred in admitting evidence of plaintiff's agreement to apply the railroad claim to his note, as soon as it was collected, notwithstanding the note was not due.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It is contended that the evidence is obnoxious to the rule which forbids the admission of parol evidence which tends to vary or contradict the terms of a written instrument. We do not think so. There was no attempt to prove that the note was to become due at any other time than that expressed on its face. The evidence was of an independent and collateral agreement which in no way affected the terms of the note, so far as the time of payment therein specified was concerned. "The rule in this state is, where the writing does not contain all the terms of the transaction between the parties, parol evidence which does not contradict or vary the writing may be admissible to show a contemporaneous independent and collateral agreement." Paint Co. v. Bennett, 85 S. C. 493, 67 S. E. 738, and cases cited.

NEAL v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

1. CARRIERS (§§ 320, 347*)—PASSENGERS CATCHING COLD AT STATION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—WANTONNESS—EVIDENCE.

Evidence, in an action against a carrier by a passenger who caught cold, the waiting room for white people at a station where she was waiting for a train to connect with that from which she had alighted being washed out while she was there, held sufficient to warrant submission of the issues of negligence, contributory negligence, and wantonness.

2. CARRIERS (§ 337*)—PASSENGERS CATCHING COLD AT STATION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A passenger who had to change cars, once at S. and later at B., and who, from the washing of the waiting room at B. while she was there, caught cold, was not guilty of contributory negligence because not waiting longer at S. and taking a later train from there, which would have enabled her to connect with her train at B. without waiting there so long.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1387; Dec. Dig. § 337.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSIDERATION AS A WHOLE.

A charge distinguishing compensatory and punitive damages, though stating that punitive damages should not be awarded, unless the party acted in such a reckless and "careless" way that he ought to be punished for his recklessness and "carelessness," will be considered not to have misled the jury; the last word on the subject being: "If the party is just simply negligent, just ordinary damages should be allowed."

4. CARRIERS (§ 286*)—DUTY TO PASSENGERS—OPENING WAITING ROOMS.

The rule of the railroad commission that the waiting rooms at stations where tickets are sold must be opened at least 30 minutes before the schedule time for arrival of passenger trains, and kept open till their arrival, does not fix all the duty of carriers with respect to keeping open such rooms; but Civ. Code 1902, § 2168, requiring such rooms to be "kept open at such hours as to accommodate passengers traveling over such road on any of its passenger trains," establishes the rule of a reasonable time; and what, under the circumstances, is a reasonable time is for the jury.

5. TRIAL (§ 193*)—INSTRUCTION ON FACTS.

A charge explaining preponderance of evidence, which, after saying it does not necessarily mean the greater number of witnesses, but the weight which the jury give to the evidence, adds, "You go by the witnesses' appearance and the reasonableness of their statements, look into their faces, and try to judge them," is not a charge on the facts; it containing no intimation of what the judge thought was the truth with respect to any fact in issue.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Union County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Mrs. Ellen Neal against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff; defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sanders & De Pass, of Spartanburg, for appellant. Wallace & Barron, of Union, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant for $500 damages for sickness and suffering caused her by the negligent and wanton conduct of defendant's agent at Blacksburg in having the waiting room for white people scoured, while she was waiting there as a passenger over defendant's road for a train for Yorkville, thereby driving her out into the open on a cold, bleak, and rainy day, from which exposure she incurred a serious illness.

On January 13, 1910, plaintiff became a passenger on defendant's road from Union to Yorkville. It was necessary for her to change cars at Spartanburg and Blacksburg. She left Union on the morning train, which arrived at Spartanburg about 10:30 o'clock. There were two local trains going north on defendant's main line, passing Blacksburg. One left shortly after the arrival of the train on which plaintiff came from Union; the other about 3 o'clock p. m. On other occasions, when plaintiff had made the same trip, she had taken the 3 o'clock train; but on this occasion she took the morning train, preferring to wait at Blacksburg, because, she said, it was quieter than at Spartanburg. She arrived at Blacksburg about midday. Her train did not leave for Yorkville until about 7:40 that evening. About 1 o'clock, the station agent came to the waiting room and asked plaintiff, who was accompanied by her little son, and another woman, who had two children with her, what train they were waiting for, and, on being told, he asked them to go into the waiting room for colored people, stating that he was going to have the white waiting room scoured. At that time there were some colored boys or men in the other waiting room, laughing and talking and having fun. Plaintiff said, in the presence of the agent, that she would not go into the other waiting room where the negroes were. Asked by the other woman what they should do, plaintiff said she did not know, unless they should go out and sit on some benches on the south side of the station, where they would be protected from the damp and chilly wind which was blowing from the north. The agent allowed them to do this, without offering to make any other provision for their comfort, and proceeded, notwithstanding their objection to going into the waiting room for colored people, to scour out the waiting room for white people by flooding the floor with water by means of a hose. It was two hours or more before the room was dry enough for plaintiff to return to it. When she did, she was suffering with a severe headache; and when she reached her home that night she was seized with a chill, and was sick a week or more with pleurisy. Plaintiff said the reason she did not seek some other place of shelter was because she knew no one in Blacksburg upon whom she felt that she could intrude, and had no money to go to a hotel. There was a hotel conveniently near, where she could have waited without charge, though it does not appear that she knew it.

The defendant's station agent testified that the room was scoured at the particular time mentioned because there was no train from that time (1 o'clock p. m.) until 4 o'clock p. m., and that was the longest time during the day between trains. He denied telling plaintiff to go into the colored waiting room, and said that, in fact, he did not remember seeing her at all, and that when he went to scour the waiting room there was no one at all in it, and he had no knowledge of there being any passengers there waiting for a train; but he said he saw some ladies, accompanied by children, walking about outside, and near the station; that it was a nice, warm day—too warm to have fire in the waiting room. As to the weather, he was corroborated by several other witnesses.

[1] In view of the above statement of the testimony and the recent decision of this court in Brckett v. Railway, 88 S. C. 447, 70 S. E. 1026, no extended discussion is necessary to show that there was no error in submitting to the jury the issue of negligence and contributory negligence, and also that of wantonness.

[2] We fail to see any force in the point made by appellant that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in taking the morning train from Spartanburg to Blacksburg, instead of the afternoon train, which she had taken on former occasions. It does not appear that her ticket was limited to use on the later train. She had the right to take any train on defendant's road on which it was good; and defendant was bound to exercise toward her that degree of care which the law requires of carriers for the safety, comfort, and convenience of passengers from the time she became a passenger at Union until she ceased to be a passenger. The defendant knew that she would have to lie over, either at Spartanburg, or at Blacksburg, and for some time, more or less, at both places; and it was its duty, therefore, to provide for her safety, comfort, and convenience as a passenger. We do not see how the plaintiff can be said to have been negligent in taking the morning train from Spartanburg to Blacksburg, any more than she could be charged with negligence in not waiting until the next day to make her journey. If defendant had run half a dozen trains a day, and she had taken one of them, which was wrecked by the negligence of defendant, and she had been injured, could defendant contend that she was guilty of contributory negligence because she did not take one of the others? The fallacy of such an argument is apparent.

[3] On the subject of damages, the court charged as follows: "Now, damages are divided into two general heads, actual or compensatory, which means the same thing, and vindictive, or punitive or exemplary, which means the same thing. What are actual damages? Actual damages is that amount assessed by a jury which gives or compensates a person for an actual injury—a real injury that he or she has suffered. That is the rule now as to actual or compensatory damages. The other damages are something more. They are an amount given by way of punishment, not only giving the party the amount of actual damages sustained, but giving something more for the wrong done by the other party, for the injury done, as a way of punishment. These kind of damages are called punitive, exemplary, or vindictive damages. Now, in this case, the plaintiff sues for both actual and exemplary, punitive, or vindictive all meaning the same thing. Now, then, in any case, if the party should suffer actual damages, he or she ought not to receive punitive, vindictive, or exemplary damages, unless it is shown that the other side has consciously been guilty of some wrong, or acted in such a negligent and careless way, when the law says that, under the circumstances, they ought to have known to have done better. You see, vindictive or exemplary or punitive damages, all the same thing, meaning the same thing, are given by way of punishment, to punish the other side for a wrong; and the law says that ought not to be done, unless the party acted in such a reckless and careless way that, under the circumstances, he ought to be punished for his recklessness and carelessness. If the party is just simply negligent, just ordinary damages should be allowed."

The defendant complains that, under this charge, the jury were allowed to award punitive damages for mere negligence. While it does appear from the words italicized that there was some confusion in the expressions of the court, still, when the whole charge upon the subject is considered, we do not think the jury were misled. The last word on the subject was: "If the party is just simply negligent, just ordinary damages should be allowed."

[4] The rule of the railroad commission that the waiting rooms at stations where tickets are sold must be opened at least 30 minutes before the schedule time for the arrival of passenger trains, and kept open until such trains arrive, does not fix all the duty of railroad companies with respect to keeping their waiting rooms open. The commission only fixed the minimum time at all stations where tickets are sold. The statute (section 2168, vol. 1, Code 1902) requires that the waiting rooms at such stations shall be "kept open at such hours as to accommodate passengers traveling over such road on any of its passenger trains." Under this statute, such stations must be kept open long enough before the arrival and departure of trains—not less than 30 minutes—to meet the reasonable requirements of the traveling public. It establishes the rule of a reasonable time. There was therefore no error in modifying defendant's request, to the effect that compliance with the rule of the commission satisfied the law, by saying that the circumstances might require enlargement of the time prescribed by the rule, and that the jury were the judges of what was a reasonable time, according to the circumstances of each case. Nor was there error in modifying the request that defendant had the right to close its waiting room for a necessary purpose, to wit, to cleanse it, provided it opened it 30 minutes before the arrival or departure of any train, by adding, provided 30 minutes was a reasonable time, under all the circumstances.

[5] The court charged that the plaintiff must prove her case by the preponderance of the evidence, and, in explaining what was meant by the preponderance of the evidence, he said it does not necessarily mean the greater number of witnesses, but the weight which the jury give to the evidence, and added: "You go by the witnesses' appearance and the reasonableness of their statements, look into their faces, and try to judge them." The defendant complains of this as a charge upon the facts. We fail to perceive the force of the objection. No intimation can be gathered from the remark as to what the judge thought was the truth with respect to any fact in issue; and therefore the language is not obnoxious to the objection urged. The judge mentioned only a few of the many well-recognized rules for determining the truth of human testimony. He did not say that by those mentioned alone should the evidence of the witnesses be weighed.

The issue of plaintiff's alleged contributory negligence in refusing to go into the colored waiting room, in remaining out in the cold, when she could have found free shelter at a nearby hotel, or other place, and generally in failing to take reasonable measures to prevent injury to herself from the exposure was fairly submitted to the jury, and we do not see that their verdict is contrary to any instruction given by the court. Judgment affirmed.

MOON et al. v. TOOLEY et al.

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 160*)—APPEAL—JURISDICTION.

The notice of appeal from a magistrate not being served in time, the circuit court had jurisdiction only to dismiss, and not to affirm; so that its order of affirmance is a nullity.

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 189*)—APPEAL—AFFIRMANCE—SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT—AUTHORITY OF SUCCEEDING JUDGE.

A judgment, with the execution issued thereon, entered on a circuit court order of affirmance, itself made without jurisdiction, and not pretending to authorize the entry of judgment and the execution, may be set aside by a succeeding judge of that court.

Gary, C. J., and Watts, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; J. D. Sanford, Judge.

Action by J. W. Moon and another against John Tooley and others. From an order on an attempted appeal from a Magistrate to the Circuit Court, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Adam C. Welborn, of Greenville, for appellants. J. D. Lanford, of Greer, for respondents.

FRASER, J. The following is the case and exceptions: "This case was commenced before Magistrate O. M. Allen in county and state aforesaid and tried by him, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendants on February 25, 1911. In due time the defendants served notice and grounds of appeal to the circuit court on the magistrate and gave bond on appeal in the sum of $50. On March 17, 1911, a copy of said notice and grounds of appeal was mailed to and received by the plaintiff J. J. Henson, and no other notice and grounds of appeal were ever served on either of the plaintiffs. The magistrate in due time made return of all the papers in the case to the court of common pleas for the county and state aforesaid. The plaintiffs' attorney gave the defendants' attorney written notice of a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that no notice and grounds of appeal had been served on the plaintiffs according to law. The motion was heard by Hon. Geo. W. Gage, Presiding Judge, on April 7, 1911, who then passed an order dismissing the appeal and affirming the judgment below. On April 14, 1911, judgment was duly entered and enrolled on said order and the magistrate's papers in the office of the clerk of court of common pleas for the county and state aforesaid in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendants and execution issued thereon."

The defendants' attorney gave plaintiffs' attorney written notice of a motion to set aside Judge Gage's order so far as it affirms the judgment below and to set aside the judgment and execution entered and issued thereon. The said motion was heard by Hon. B. M. Shuman, Special Presiding Judge, on December 12, 1911, who passed the following order: "After argument of counsel it is ordered: That the judgment of Judge Gage, so far as it affirms the judgment below is hereby declared null and void and is set aside, and the judgment and execution entered thereon is set aside."

In due time the plaintiffs served notice of intention to appeal to the Supreme Court from said order and will ask the Supreme Court to reverse said order and affirm Judge Gage's order and the judgment entered thereon upon the following exceptions:

"(1) Because the court erred in setting aside Judge Gage's order so far as it affirms the judgment of the magistrate. In a case like this, one circuit judge has no power to set aside the order of another circuit judge. It can only be set aside or reversed by the Supreme Court on appeal. When notice and grounds of appeal were served on the magistrate in time, it was his duty to make return of all the papers in the case to the court of common pleas. When Judge Gage passed his order dismissing the appeal on the ground that no notice and grounds of appeal had been served on the plaintiffs according to law, the judgment of the magistrate was in legal effect affirmed.

"(2) Because the court erred in setting aside the judgment entered and enrolled in the clerk's office on Judge Gage's order and the magistrate's papers. Judge Gage's order being a record of the circuit court and in legal effect affirming the judgment below, and all the magistrate's papers in the case being records of the circuit court, it was perfectly proper and legal to enter and enroll judgment thereon and issue execution."

[1] It being admitted that the notice of appeal was not served within the time required by law, the circuit court had no jurisdiction in the case. This is too well settled to require the citation of authority. The appellate court, being without jurisdiction to hear, could neither reverse nor affirm the judgment and could only dismiss the appeal. That part of the order of April 7th which affirmed the judgment of the magistrate being made without jurisdiction was a nullity and could be so treated wherever it was found.

[2] The order of Judge Gage did not pretend to authorize the entry of judgment for the findings of the magistrate of the issuance of execution thereon. A succeeding judge had full authority in a motion in the cause to set aside the unauthorized judgment and execution.

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be affirmed.

HYDRICK and WOODS, JJ., concur. GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., dissent on the ground that the first exception should be sustained.

NELSON v. CHARLESTON & W. C.
RY. CO. *

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1912.)

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by J. D. Nelson against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following are the exceptions:

"The defendant excepts to the rulings and charge of his honor upon the following grounds:

"(1) Error in admitting the statement of Mrs. R. M. Dubose, as contained in her deposition, over the objection of counsel, as follows: 'A few minutes before the wreck, I noticed the train was running pretty fast, faster than I thought it ought to go.' Said evidence being incompetent; it being the expression of the opinion of the said witness as to how fast she thought the train ought to go, and there being no proper foundation laid for such opinion—the witness not being shown to be an expert.

“(2) Error in admitting, over objection of counsel, the testimony of Mrs. R. M. Dubose, as contained in her deposition, as follows: ‘This train very often run too fast for a mixed train.’ The said evidence being the mere expression of an opinion of a nonexpert witness, and referring not to the occasion of the wreck in question, but to other times and places, and the same being therefore incompetent. Error, further, in holding that the defendant could not take advantage of the incompetency of said statement, on account of the fact that it was made in connection with the cross-examination of said witness by Mr. Cooper, when he should have held that, under the agreement of counsel at the taking of said deposition, the right to object to any and all testimony was specifically reserved, and therefore the defendant had a perfect right to object to said testimony at the trial.

“(3) Error in refusing, upon motion of defendant's attorneys, to strike from the deposition of W. M. Hines the following: ‘It was behind time, and was trying to make up for lost time. I noticed some time before the wreck that it was running too fast. I had noticed it was running too fast for four or five miles before the wreck.’ The error being that said statements are the expression of the mere nonexpert opinion of the witness, without giving the facts upon which same were based, and were therefore incompetent.

“(4) Error in allowing the plaintiff to tell what Captain Little, the conductor, said to him on the day following the wreck; said testimony occurring as follows: ‘Q. Did you ever hear Capt. Little say where they went? Mr. Grier: We object to what Capt. Little said about where they went. It is not res gestæ, and does not throw any light upon this accident at all. Court: You know that it went to Gray Court? Witness: I believe Capt. Little would be truthful about it. Court: You know it went to Gray Court? Witness: Only what I was told. Court: Strike that out, Mr. Stenographer. Q. Now, who told you about the train, where the train went? A. Capt. Little. Mr. Nash: Here is the conductor of that train, your honor. Court: I think he can state, Mr. Grier. Mr. Grier: I want this put down that it is incompetent and irrelevant, not res gestæ, and does not throw any light on this matter. Q. Where did Capt. Little tell you they first went? A. He told me on the next day— Mr. Grier: We submit that the conversation the next day isn't competent. Court: Was he still in your employ? Mr. Grier: Yes, sir; he is now, as far as that is concerned. Court: Was he the conductor on the train that night? Witness: Yes, sir. Court: I think so. Mr. Grier: We object, on the ground that it is not res gestæ, and, of course, that is the only way they could say that it would come in. Q. Where did Capt. Little tell you the next day that the train went that night? A. He said it went to Gray Court from Owings, and the second trip it came from there to Laurens, carrying some live stock and negroes, leaving the white folks up in the woods. Now that is the way he did. Q. Did the train come back? Mr. Grier: He said that is what Capt. Little told him, that they carried some live stock and negroes, and left the white people up in the woods. Q. It that what Capt. Little told you? A. Why, certainly. Mr. Grier: We move to strike that out; that it in no wise bears on this case, wholly incompetent, and throws no light upon this question.’ The error being that the said testimony as to what the witness was told by Capt. Little was incompetent; it was not shown to be within the scope of the authority of the conductor, was not part of the res gestæ, and should have been excluded.

“(5) Error in allowing the plaintiff, over the objection of the defendant, to testify as follows: ‘Q. Did you see Capt. Little the next day after this wreck? A. Yes, sir. Q. Tell how it came about? Where did you see him? A. I went to the ticket office to get a ticket to Spartanburg. Q. Did he present a paper and ask you to sign it? A. He certainly did, and I refused. Q. Did Capt. Little have any conversation with you about this wreck the next day? A. Yes, sir; he handed me a paper to sign. Q. Did you read the paper? A. I refused to read the paper, and told him that I had written to the railroad authorities.’ The error being that the said testimony was incompetent, relating, as it did, to an occurrence the next day after the wreck, was not shown to be within the scope of the authority of the conductor, was not a part of the res gestæ, and should have been excluded.

“(6) Error in charging, in connection with plaintiff's third request, as follows: ‘I charge you that. Now that means this, gentlemen of the jury: That where a passenger is on a railroad train and gets hurt, and it is shown that he is hurt on the railroad train, then the presumption is that it was done through the negligence of the railroad company; but when the railroad company shows that it was not through its negligence, but something that it couldn't help, not held under the law as being negligent, then that presumption of negligence gives way, done away with.’ The error being that in so charging his honor placed too great a burden upon the railway company, and stated an erroneous proposition in telling the jury that, ‘where a passenger is on a railroad train and gets hurt, and it is shown that he is hurt on the railroad train, then the presumption is that it was done through the negligence of the railroad company,' when there is no presumption of negligence from the mere fact that a passenger is hurt on a railroad train. The error consisted, further, in charging the jury in that connection, in effect, that the mere fact of an injury to a passenger on a railroad train placed the burden upon the railroad company to show that it was not done through its negligence, but was done by something it could not help; the same being an erroneous statement of the law, and placing too great a burden upon the company. The error consists, further, in the fact that, in so charging in the face of the proposition laid down in the plaintiff's third request, his honor confused the jury, in that, in the first instance, he charged them that the presumption of negligence arises when a passenger has been injured by any agency or instrumentality of the railroad; whereas, in the second instance, he charged them that it was only necessary to show that the passenger was injured on the railroad train.

"(7) His honor erred in charging the jury as follows, the same being the plaintiff's fourth request: 'If an engineer willfully or intentionally fails or refuses to see a passenger at a flag station, the passenger may recover punitive damages. Also if a conductor promises to hold the train and does not.' The error being that said proposition, as applied to the facts in this case, was erroneous and misleading to the jury, in that, under plaintiff's complaint and proof, the defendant's agents were not under any obligation to stop and pick up the plaintiff, unless they took the box cars that were then in the wreck, or some of them, on to Laurens that night. If, therefore, they did not carry said box cars on to Laurens that night, as they claim they did not, the defendant would not be liable for punitive damages, even though the engineer did willfully or intentionally fail or refuse to see the plaintiff at the flag station. The error being, further, that in so charging his honor told the jury in effect that, regardless of what the facts might be as to whether said cars were carried on to Laurens that night, the defendant would be liable in punitive damages if the engineer willfully or intentionally failed or refused to see the plaintiff. The error consists, further, in the fact that it is not always, and under all circumstances, a ground for punitive damages for an engineer to willfully or intentionally fail to see a passenger at a flag station; and it was confusing and misleading to the jury for his honor to charge said proposition in connection with the facts of this case.

"(8) Error in refusing to charge the defendant's first request, as follows: 'The jury are instructed that they cannot consider the question of punitive or vindictive damages in this case. The evidence is insufficient to warrant the finding of vindictive or punitive damages.' The error being that there was no evidence, or no sufficient evidence, upon which to base a verdict for punitive damages; and his honor should have so charged.

"(9) Error in refusing to grant a new trial upon the defendant's third ground of motion for new trial, as follows: 'That his honor erred in admitting the testimony of plaintiff detailing conversations he claims to have had with the conductor of the defendant on the day after the accident and alleged declarations made by said conductor; such declarations and conversations being hearsay, and not part of the res gestae.' The error being that the admission of said testimony was incompetent upon the grounds stated in said grounds for new trial; and it was error of law not to grant the same.

"(10) Error in charging the jury the third request of the plaintiff, as follows: 'A wreck is not one of the inconveniences and risks which a passenger on a mixed train assumed; and, when it is shown that a passenger was injured by that cause, it is a natural and reasonable inference that the injury was the result of the negligence of the railroad company.' The error being that in so instructing the jury the presiding judge charged on the facts of the case, in violation of article 5, § 26, of the Constitution of 1895, thereby telling the jury what facts would constitute negligence and what facts would tend to prove negligence.

"(11) Error in charging the jury plaintiff's twelfth request, as follows: 'If a railroad runs a train of cars along a road at such a rate of speed as to be wanton and reckless, and a passenger is injured thereby, the jury may infer a reckless and wanton disregard of the passenger's rights and award punitive damages. The jury must say, under the evidence, whether the train, under the circumstances, was run at a reckless and wanton speed.' And in adding thereto the following: 'I charge you that. If you run a train at one time, under certain circumstances, at such a speed you might not be negligent, might not be reckless conduct, might not be wanton conduct; if you run a train at another time, at the same place, under different circumstances, might be, in the opinion of the jury, wanton and reckless conduct. They are to be the judges of the circumstances, what kind of a train, or like that, what were the circumstances under which the train was running, what kind of a road, what time of day, what kind of weather, all these things come into consideration, and it may come into consideration.' The error being that in so charging his honor charged the jury that it might infer recklessness from the fast running of the train; it being submitted: (1) That on a straight track, free from defects, fast running is not even evidence of negligence. (2) The request must be considered with reference to the evidence, in so far as fast running, and in so far as the condition of the track, is concerned, and, so considered, permits the jury to give punitive damages in a case, should they consider the rate of speed at which this particular train was running to be wanton or reckless. It, in effect, allows punitive damages to be awarded by the jury in this case on account of the rate of speed at which this particular train was running, and is therefore error. (3) It leaves to the jury the right to decide whether, under the evidence of this case and the circumstances, the train was running at a reckless and wanton speed; whereas it is submitted as a matter of fact that the rate of speed at which this particular train was running, in the circumstances as disclosed by the record, was free from any charge of wantonness or willfulness, and, as a matter of law, did not constitute wantonness or willfulness—in fact, did not constitute simple negligence—and it was error in the court to permit the jury to infer from this wantonness or willfulness. (4) It submitted to the jury as a matter of fact the question upon which there was absolutely no testimony whatever, to wit: There was no testimony tending to establish that the running of this train, in the circumstances as disclosed by the record, was wanton or willful. (5) It is submitted that the kind of train, the time of day, and the kind of weather cannot be considered by the jury in determining whether the defendant was guilty of wantonness or willfulness; and it was error to submit these considerations in determining this question.

"(12) Error in refusing to charge as submitted the defendant's tenth request, which was as follows: 'There is no statute law in this state regulating the speed at which a train shall be run, and the mere fast running of a train is not negligence per se, and cannot of itself be held to be willful.' And in adding thereto: 'That is for the jury to say in each case whether under the circumstances—whether the train running at a certain speed under certain circumstances was negligent running or not. You are to be judges of that particular case.' The error being: (a) That said request contained a sound proposition of law, applicable to this case, and should have been charged without modification. (b) It is submitted that the mere fast running of a train is not negligence per se, and can never be made the basis of willfulness, and his honor erred in so instructing the jury, and further erred in charging the jury that it was for them to say in each case whether, in the circumstances, a train running at a certain speed was negligent running, and in not specifically instructing the jury, as requested, that it could not be made the basis of a charge of willfulness.

"(13) Error in refusing to grant defendant's motion for a new trial upon defendant's second ground, which was as follows: 'Upon the ground that there was not sufficient evidence upon which to base a verdict for punitive damages.' The error being that the question of punitive damages was submitted to the jury, and that there was no evidence in the record to sustain the same; and it further appearing from the verdict of the jury that the jury did include punitive damages.

"(14) Error in refusing to charge the defendant's third request, which was as follows: 'I charge you that plaintiff is not entitled to recover for loss of commissions in his business.' The error being that there is no evidence in the record showing that the plaintiff is entitled to recover commissions or profits, and the verdict of the jury shows that it is partially made up, either of commissions or profits, or vindictive or punitive damages; and in either view the question of commissions should not have been left to the jury, and the verdict was therefore erroneous.

"(15) Error in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for a new trial upon the first ground, which was as follows: 'Upon the ground that the verdict is excessive.' The error being that the evidence shows that the plaintiff, if injured at all, was injured very slightly, and the verdict is far out of proportion to any injury or actual damages caused thereby; and it appears that the verdict includes both punitive and actual damages, and for loss of commissions and profits."

F. B. Grier, of Greenwood, Nicholls & Nicholls, and Bomar & Osborne, for appellant. Johnson, Nash & Daniel, of Spartanburg, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action for actual and punitive damages. The complaint alleges: That the plaintiff is a commercial traveler, selling goods by sample on commission, and in the discharge of his regular business was, on March 3, 1909, at Fountain Inn, which was a town situated along the route between Greenville and Laurens, over which the defendant operates its train. That, having paid his fare, plaintiff took passage at Fountain Inn on a mixed train to go to Laurens. That between Fountain Inn and Owing Station, a flag station, the train was wrecked because of a breakdown of a freight car which was a part of the train of cars. That, by reason of the wreck thus caused, the plaintiff was injured in his person painfully and permanently.

"(5) That because of the said acts of the defendant this plaintiff was bruised and injured about the body and made sick, so that he was unable for many days to prosecute his regular or other business, and was caused to spend money for medical and other attention, all to his serious damage.

"(6) That defendant was careless, wanton, willful, and negligent in its conduct towards this plaintiff in the particulars hereinafter mentioned:

"(a) That defendant knowingly permitted an overloaded and defective freight car to be hauled along in said train at a high and dangerous rate of speed, the breaking of which freight car caused the wreck.

"(b) That after the wreck had occurred, and plaintiff had been dragged in a rough and dangerous manner and injured, as above described, and had gotten out of the passenger car, at the suggestion of defendant, he walked towards Owings Station, which was less than a mile ahead of the wreck, with the understanding with defendant that if the engine and certain box cars which were not thrown from the track pulled loose and came on towards Laurens the said engine and box cars would be stopped, in order to take plaintiff up and carry him to his destination. That it was promised by defendant that if the engine should overtake plaintiff before reaching said station it would stop and take him up. That when within about 100 yards of said station said engine, with two or more box cars, did overtake plaintiff, who signaled same to stop; but defendant paid no attention, and failed and refused to take plaintiff on board, and left him.

"(c) That plaintiff is informed and believes that said engine and box cars at that time went only to Gray Court, a mile or two below; but they soon came back to the place of the wreck, and upon its return from said place going towards Laurens, plaintiff again signaled the train to stop at Owings Station, in order that he might get aboard; but defendant failed and refused so to stop, and the train again left him 12 or 14 miles from his destination, though plaintiff is informed and believes that said train did go through Laurens and carried other passengers than himself. That, it then being night, plaintiff was compelled to hire a conveyance and travel 12 or 14 miles through the country to his destination on a very cold night, which might easily have been prevented if the defendant had discharged its duty towards this plaintiff.

"(7) That said conduct of defendant towards this plaintiff was willful, high-handed, and in reckless disregard of plaintiff's rights as defendant's passenger, and much to his damage."

The defendant admits that plaintiff was a passenger, and that there was a wreck, but denies that plaintiff was injured by reason of the wreck, and alleges that, if plaintiff subsequently became sick, it was due to his own conduct, and was not due to any agency or instrumentality of the defendant.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $500.

There are 15 exceptions, which will be reported; but the appellant groups them under 9 heads:

(1) The first group complain of error in the admission of the statements of witness, Mrs. Dubose and W. H. Hinds, over objection of defendant's counsel, in which they were permitted to testify that, in their opinion, the train was running fast, and too fast, without any facts upon which they based such opinions. This testimony was more an estimate of speed than an opinion. The rate of speed was testified to by the plaintiff, the conductor, the engineer, and the fireman. To allow the witness to state whether the train was running fast, or too fast, is fully authorized by the rule laid down in Jones v. Fuller, 19 S. C. 70, 45 Am. Rep. 761, where the court says: "While it is necessary that the witness should first state the facts upon which he bases his opinion, where the facts are such as are capable of being reproduced in language, it is not necessary to do so, where the facts are not capable of reproduction in such a way as to bring before the minds of the jury the condition of things upon which the witness bases his opinion."

It is by no means clear from the record that the evidence objected to was not brought out by defendant's counsel. If it was, then defendant could not object to the testimony brought out by its own counsel. It is, however, stated in argument that the record must be erroneous, as an attorney of Mr. Cooper's ability would not have asked such a question. The presumption is very strong, as Mr. Cooper is a very able lawyer; but, however strong, it cannot be allowed to contradict the record. To allow it to do so would give to able and experienced counsel an advantage over their less able and experienced brethren that the law does not allow. In the courts, at least, "all men are equal." These exceptions are overruled.

(2) Exceptions 4, 5, and 9 are combined. These exceptions complain of error in allowing the testimony as to what the conductor said the next day. The testimony tended to show that the conductor, who certainly was the agent of the company, was still engaged in the business of the wreck, and went to the plaintiff for the purpose of getting a statement from him as a part of his official duties in connection with the wreck. An agent is rarely, if ever, commissioned expressly to make admissions of responsibility; but it would be monstrous to hold that an agent to get admissions could make none. These exceptions are overruled.

(3) The next exception, No. 6, complains that his honor, the presiding judge, erred in his modification of plaintiff's third request to charge, as follows: "Where a passenger is on a railroad train and gets hurt, and it is shown that he is hurt on the railroad train, then the presumption is that it was done through the negligence of the railroad company"—in that his honor omitted the important requirement that the evidence must show that the injury was caused by the agency or instrumentality of the company. The plaintiff's request contained the words "agency or instrumentality." This was a serious omission, and would have entitled the defendant to a new trial if the defendant had not made a request to charge that embodied the same omission. The sixth request to charge was as follows: "(6) The fact, if it be a fact, that the plaintiff is in a railroad wreck, does not at all entitle him to a verdict. (By the Court: That is just simply from that fact, nothing else appearing.) He must not only show that he was in a wrecked train, but must go further and prove to your satisfaction, by a preponderance of the evidence, that he was injured, and the extent of his injuries. There is no presumption of law that a party has been injured because he was in a wreck; that is a matter of proof—the burden being on the plaintiff in all cases to establish his injury, and the extent of it." In a wreck, as at other times, the injury must be through the agency or instrumentality of the defendant. When a party has asked the court to charge an erroneous proposition of law, he cannot be heard to complain that the court has followed him into error. This exception is overruled.

(4) The tenth exception complains of error upon the part of the trial court in charging the jury that a wreck is not one of the inconveniences which a passenger assumes; and, where it is shown that a passenger is injured by that cause, it is a natural and reasonable inference that the injury was the result of negligence, inferred from the mere fact that the wreck occurred, in that this was a charge on the facts, in violation of the Constitution. This exception is overruled. It is true in a case of a wreck, as in all other cases, that, where a passenger is injured by an agency or instrumentality of the company, the fact raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the company. There is no intimation here that any part of the wreck was not an instrumentality of the railroad company. This exception is overruled.

(5) The seventh exception complains of error, in that his honor charged as follows: "If an engineer willfully or intentionally falls or refuses to see a passenger at a flag station, the passenger may recover punitive damages. Also if the conductor promises to hold the train and does not." The appellant admits in argument that, while this, as a general proposition, may be correct, yet, under the extraordinary condition of affairs, it was error; the extraordinary condition being the wreck. Appellant says it was the first duty of the train crew to have the obstruction removed, and this they were bound to discharge, and did discharge. This position is wholly untenable. The first duty of the train crew was to the passengers, and this first duty they neglected absolutely, although one of the passengers was a lady, traveling alone in search of medical help, and it was known to the conductor by his own testimony. This exception is overruled.

(6) The eighth and thirteenth exceptions complain that there was no evidence upon which to base a verdict for punitive damages. These exceptions are overruled. There was evidence sufficient.

(7) Exception 14 complains of error in not charging that plaintiff could not recover for loss of commissions. This was practically charged under defendant's twelfth request to charge, where his honor charged the jury "that the plaintiff cannot recover any alleged pecuniary loss, except such as he proved to you in dollars and cents; he cannot leave you to speculate, and you cannot arrive at your verdict as to such items by speculation, if he claims any such loss and has failed to give you evidence as to the items and amounts thereof, or such facts as would enable the jury to ascertain same, you cannot include same in your verdict."

(8) The twelfth exception complains of error in not charging, without explanation, the following: "There is no statute law in this state regulating the speed at which a train shall be run, and the mere fast running of a train is not negligence per se, and cannot be held to be willful." The court said: "That is for the jury to say in each case whether under the circumstances—whether a train running at a certain speed under certain circumstances was negligent running or not. You are to be the judges of that particular case." That explanation submitted to the jury only the question of negligence and eliminated willfulness from any speed, however great. This exception is overruled.

(9) The fifteenth exception complains of error in the refusal of a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was excessive. This exception is overruled, because this court cannot consider the question of excessive verdicts.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

GARY, C. J., concurs. HYDRICK and WATTS, JJ., concur in the result.

WOODS, J. I agree that the judgment in this case should be affirmed; but I am unable to concur in all the reasoning of Mr. Justice FRASER.

The pleadings indicating the issues are set out in his opinion. The plaintiff testified that the day after the wreck the conductor of the train came to him with a paper, which he requested the plaintiff to sign, and that he refused to read or sign it. Over the objection of the defendant, this question and answer were admitted: "Q. Where did Capt. Little tell you the next day that the train went that night? A. He said it went to Gray Court from Owings, and the second trip it came from there to Laurens, carrying some live stock and negroes, leaving the white folks up in the woods. Now that is the way he did." There was no evidence that the conductor was authorized to settle plaintiff's claim, or even that he knew there was a claim. The alleged statement was made a day after the wreck, and therefore was not a part of the res gestæ. Under such circumstances, the testimony was clearly incompetent, unless all the authorities on the subject are to be overruled. Petrie v. Columbia & Greenville R. R. Co., 27 S. C. 63, 2 S. E. 837; Garrick v. Florida Central & Peninsular R. R. Co., 53 S. C. 448, 31 S. E. 334, 69 Am. St. Rep. 874; Mars v. Virginia Home Insurance Co., 17 S. C. 514; Vicksburg & Meridian R. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 99, 7 Sup. Ct. 118, 30 L. Ed. 299. Authority of an agent to ascertain merely the existence or nature of a claim implies no authority to adjust the claim, or to make admissions binding on the principal. I think, however, that the error in admitting this testimony should not work a reversal, because the conductor in his testimony, while denying that he made the statement attributed to him by the plaintiff, practically admitted and explained the acts embraced in the alleged statement. He testified that he did attach his engine and tender to a car at Gray Court, on which there were some negroes and live stock, and did take the car into Laurens, leaving the passengers in the woods, where the wreck occurred. This testimony was given by the conductor with the explanation that he was forbidden to carry passengers on an engine; and that he merely took up the box car on his way to Laurens to get a shanty car and return for his passengers. Under these circumstances, the testimony of Nelson as to the conductor's statements to him, though incompetent, was harmless.

The sixth exception complains of error in the following instruction, given in connection with plaintiff's third request: "I charge you that. Now that means this, gentlemen of the jury: That where a passenger is on a railroad train and gets hurt, and it is shown that he is hurt on the railroad train, then the presumption is that it was done through the negligence of the railroad company; but when the railroad company shows that it was not through its negligence, but something that it couldn't help, not held under the law as being negligence, then that presumption of negligence gives way, done away with." This language must be taken in connection with the request itself, which had explicitly limited the presumption of negligence from the fact of injury on a railroad train to injury received from an "agency or instrumentality of the railroad company." In view of this language of the request, it cannot be assumed that the jury were so inattentive as not to understand that when the circuit judge, in the same connection, spoke of a passenger getting hurt on a railroad train he meant hurt by the railroad's agency or instrumentality.

The following instruction, given at request of plaintiff, taken alone, stated the law against the defendant too broadly: "If an engineer willfully or intentionally fails or refuses to see a passenger at a flag station, the passenger may recover punitive damages. Also if a conductor promises to hold the train and does not." Many emergencies may be imagined which would make it the imperative duty of a conductor not to stop for a passenger's signals at a flag station, or to disregard his promise to hold a train for a passenger; and if the instruction stood alone it would require a reversal. But in other portions of the charge the circuit judge gave the instruction with clearness and elaboration that all the conditions and emergencies were to be considered in deciding whether it was the duty of the conductor to take plaintiff up, or to stop on his signals. Considering the entire charge on this subject, we do not think the jury could have been misled.

1. EVIDENCE (§ 178*)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—DEEDS.

Where plaintiff gave defendant W. notice to produce a deed from the alleged common source of title to B., and there was proof that W., on a former trial, had testified that the original deed was lost, plaintiff was entitled to introduce a copy thereof from the records to show a common source of title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 580-594; Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 177*)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS.

Where plaintiff claimed that defendant W. held title under a common source, having been sworn as a witness for plaintiff, and testified that he claimed under a particular deed, and that it was given in settlement of a partition suit, he could have been interrogated as a witness, or his declarations as to the source of his title would have been admissible without the deed or a copy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 557, 570-579; Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

3. QUIETING TITLE (§ 44*)—SOURCE OF TITLE—EVIDENCE.

That plaintiff sought to show title in her deviser by adverse possession did not prevent her from derailing her title through a common source; she being entitled to prove title in herself in as many ways as she could.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 89-92; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 271*) — LETTERS TO THIRD PERSONS—DECLARATIONS.

On an issue as to whether defendant W. and plaintiff claimed title from a common source, a letter written by W. to a magistrate in the neighborhood of the land, stating that he claimed under a deed from such common source, was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068-1079, 1081-1104; Dec. Dig. § 271.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 208*) — ADMISSION — COMPLAINT.

In a suit to quiet title, the summons and complaint, signed by defendant W. as attorney for plaintiffs against the alleged common source of title, was admissible to show a common source of title, and also that at that time W., as such attorney, claimed, and that the common source, under whom the other defendants in the action claimed, admitted, that all the land north of a certain branch belonged to plaintiff's ancestor, and this though the summons and complaint were not of record in the court, and there was no proof that it had ever been served; W. having testified that the deed under which he claimed was made in settlement of the suit.

6. TRIAL (§ 29*) — REMARKS OF JUDGE—EFFECT.

Where a stenographer, offered to prove the testimony of defendant W. at a prior trial, failed to identify his notes, a suggestion by the court that defendant be put on the stand as plaintiff's witness, and that plaintiff would not be bound by what he said, meant only that plaintiff might prove the facts to be otherwise than as testified by the defendant, and was therefore not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 80-84, 508; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

7. WITNESSES (§ 400*)—ADVERSE WITNESS—TESTIMONY—CONCLUSIVENESS.

While a party who calls his adversary as a witness may not impeach or contradict him, he is not concluded by his testimony, and may prove the facts to be otherwise than as testified by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1268, 1269; Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

8. QUIETING TITLE (§ 47*)—COMMON SOURCE.

When plaintiff in a suit to quiet title traced her title to the common source from which defendant W. claimed, plaintiff made a prima facie case which required submission to the jury of the issue, Who had the better title from the common source?

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 95-97; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

9. EVIDENCE (§ 121*)—RES GESTÆ—TRUSTEES—DECLARATIONS.

Where the rights of the parties to certain land had vested under a trustees' partition, the declarations of the trustees and their instructions to the surveyor at the time of that division were admissible as res gestæ to explain their acts; but neither the acts nor declarations of the trustees in making a second division over 20 years afterwards were competent to affect the rights which vested under the first division.

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—REVIEW—INSTRUCTIONS—PREJUDICE.

An instruction that, under a trust deed, the trustees, in dividing the estate, could give some parties in interest personal property and others real estate was not prejudicial to defendants, because there was no evidence that such a division was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Clarendon County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Joel Benbow and others against J. R. Harvin and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant H. L. B. Wells appeals. Affirmed.

Lee & Moise, of Sumter, for appellant. Charlton Du Pont, of Manning, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. In the year 1838 Amor-intha L. Anderson, widow of Thomas Anderson, being about to contract matrimony with J. R. Thames, executed a marriage settlement, wherein she conveyed to trustees her interest in the estate of her deceased husband, in trust for her sole use during her life, and at her death, Thames surviving, to divide the same into two parts, and distribute one part among her three daughters by Anderson, or the survivor or survivors of them, the issue, if any, of any deceased daughter taking the parent's share, and to permit Thames to use the other part during his life, and at his death to divide the same among her daughters, the same as the other half. Other provisions of the deed, depending on contingencies which did not happen, need not be recited.

Mrs. Thames died about 1872. Emeline, one of her daughters, had married Bochette, and died, leaving issue. The other two survived. Ellen T. had married Harvin, and had children. The other, Sarah, never married at all. About 1873, after the death of Mrs. Thames, the trustees divided a tract containing 271 acres between her daughters and Thames, but, so far as the evidence shows, left no record of that division, and from their failure to do so this litigation and its principal difficulties arose.

There is testimony tending to prove that the trustees went upon the land, and, beginning at a point on the southern boundary, and about midway thereof, ran a line through the tract approximately north, which divided it into two halves, and assigned the eastern half to Thames, and divided the western half among the two daughters and the Bochette heirs, giving each of the daughters a third and the Bochette heirs together a third of that half, and that the northernmost tract of that half, containing 45 acres, nearly all of which lies north of Duck branch, which extends entirely across the whole tract from east to west, was assigned to Sarah Anderson. This is the division which the defendants contend was made.

On the other hand, there is evidence tending to show that they began on the eastern boundary and ran a line westward across, or at least partly across, the tract, and along and near Duck branch, and that all the land north of that branch was assigned to Sarah Anderson; and this is the contention of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, who claims as devisee of Sarah Anderson, proved by a number of witnesses that her deviser had possession of the land north of Duck branch for from 15 to 17 years before her death. She devised her estate, without particularly describing it, to her sister, Mrs. Harvin, for life, and, at her death, to the plaintiff, who is a daughter of Mrs. Harvin.

Sarah Anderson died in 1892; Thames died in 1898; and Mrs. Harvin died in 1907. After the death of Thames, the original trustees being dead, their successors undertook to make a second division. The evidence is not clear whether they undertook at that time to make a new division of the entire tract, or whether they simply divided the part which had been assigned to Thames in the first division between the Bochette heirs and Mrs. Harvin; Miss Anderson being then dead. But there is in evidence a plat, dated March 2, 1899, of the whole tract, which is divided thereon into six parcels; and the surveyor certifies on the plat that it was made according to the instructions of J. P. Brock and R. R. Dingle, who were, according to the testimony, acting as trustees, being the heirs and successors of the original trustees. This plat shows a north and south line, which, the defendants contend, was the line made by the trustees at the first division, and which divided the tract into the two halves, one of which was divided among the two daughters and the Bochette heirs, and the other assigned to Thames. On a tract of 45 acres in the northwest corner of this plat is the notation, "set off to Miss Sarah Anderson," and the tract east of it, and lying mostly north of Duck branch, is marked, "set off to Mrs. E. T. Harvin."

The defendants concede the plaintiff's right to recover the 45 acres which was so "set off" to her deviser; but the plaintiff contends that this was not the first division made, and that, under the first division, Sarah Anderson took all the tract north of Duck branch.

Another complication arises from the fact that, after the death of Sarah Anderson in 1892, and while Mrs. Harvin was in possession of her share as life tenant under her will, the Bochette heirs, by the defendant Wells, as their attorney, brought suit against Mrs. Harvin for partition of the Sarah Anderson land, presumably on the supposition that she had only a life estate therein, and that upon her death it went to Mrs. Harvin and the Bochette heirs under the deed of trust. In that complaint, which is signed by the defendant Wells, as plaintiff's attorney, the share of Sarah Anderson is described as containing 100 acres, more or less, and, according to the evidence and the boundaries given in that complaint, it comprised all of the original tract north of Duck branch. That suit resulted in a compromise, by which Mrs. Harvin conveyed to the defendant Wells and J. F. Bochette, whose interest Wells acquired afterwards, 71 acres of the tract, which, according to the plat made for Wells and Bochette, and dated January 6, 1898, lies wholly north of Duck branch, and which includes not only the 45 acres, which, the defendants contend, was originally set off to Sarah Anderson, and which they concede the plaintiff's right to recover, but 26 acres more of the land north of Duck branch. Mr. Wells is in possession of this 71-acre tract, and the other defendants, the heirs of Mrs. Harvin, are in possession of the remainder of the tract north of Duck branch.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover all the land north of Duck branch. She bases her right to do so upon two grounds: (1) Because that was the land set off to Sarah Anderson in 1873 as her share of her mother's estate under the trust deed; but, if not, then (2) that her deviser had acquired title thereto by adverse possession for more than 10 years before her death. The jury found for plaintiff all the land north of Duck branch. The defendant Wells alone appeals.

[1, 2] For the purpose of proving a common source of title, plaintiff gave the defendant Wells notice to produce the deed to the 71 acres from Mrs. Harvin to him and Bochette. Upon his failure to produce it, and after further laying the foundation by proving that he had said, at a former trial of the case, that the original was lost, plaintiff was allowed to introduce a copy from the record. We see no possible ground for appellant's objection to the copy. The failure to produce, after notice, gave plaintiff the right to introduce secondary evidence. Besides, Mr. Wells is a party to the action, and his declaration that the deed was lost was sufficient to admit secondary evidence of its contents on that ground. Furthermore, he was afterwards sworn as a witness for plaintiff, and testified that he claimed the land under that deed, and that it was given in settlement of the partition suit above mentioned. He could have been interrogated as a witness, or his declarations as to the source of his title would have been admissible, even without the deed or the copy. Every man is presumed to know the source of his title.

[3, 4] The fact that plaintiff also sought to show title in her deviser by adverse possession cannot affect the question, because she had the right to prove title in herself in as many ways as she could. There was therefore no error in admitting in evidence a letter from defendant Wells to a magistrate in the neighborhood of the land, in which he stated that he held it under a deed from Mrs. Harvin.

[5] Nor was there error in admitting the summons and complaint, signed by Mr. Wells, as attorney for the Bochette heirs, as plaintiffs, against Mrs. Harvin. It was competent, because it tended to show common source of title; and the complaint also tended to show that at that time Mr. Wells, as attorney for the Bochette heirs, claimed, and that Mrs. Harvin, under whom the other defendants in this action claim, admitted, that all the land north of Duck branch had belonged to Sarah Anderson. As Mr. Wells was only the attorney for the plaintiffs in that suit in making that claim, it might not operate as an estoppel against him, and it was not claimed that it did; but it was nevertheless competent evidence, because it tended to show that his contention in this action, that Sarah Anderson never owned or had possession of more than the 45 acres in the northwest corner of the plat in evidence, is inconsistent with the contention he made for the Bochette heirs, and of which he was a beneficiary. It is immaterial that the summons and complaint admitted in evidence was not a record of the court, or that there was no evidence that it had ever been served, because Mr. Wells testified that the deed on which he relied was made in settlement of that suit. The objection that the complaint in that case does not describe the property in dispute in this action is without foundation in fact. There is abundant evidence that it does; and Mr. Wells himself testified that it was the same.

[6, 7] The plaintiff's attorney attempted to prove the stenographer's typewritten notes of the testimony given by Mr. Wells at a previous trial, for the purpose of introducing it in evidence; but the stenographer failed to identify his notes. Thereupon his honor suggested that he put Mr. Wells on the stand as his witness. Plaintiff's attorney remarked that he did not like to put up an adverse party. His honor replied that he would be his witness only to a certain extent, and he would not be bound by what he said. It is objected that this remark was prejudicial as detracting from the weight of Mr. Wells' testimony, and as intimating to the jury that it was not binding on plaintiff. There was no error in the remark. While a party who calls his adversary as a witness makes him his witness to the same extent that he makes any other person whom he calls as a witness, still he is no more concluded by the testimony of his adversary than he would be by the testimony of any other witness whom he might call. But just as in the case of any other witness, having called him, he may not impeach him or contradict him; but he may prove the facts to be otherwise than as he testifies them to be. State v. McKay, 89 S. C. 234, 71 S. E. 858. And that is all his honor meant, and there was no ground for the jury to draw any other inference from what he said.

[8] It would be a useless consumption of time to discuss the six grounds upon which appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to grant his motion for nonsuit. When plaintiff traced her title by competent evidence to the same source from which appellant claimed, she made a prima facie case which required the submission to the jury of the issue, Who has the better title from the common source?

fused to allow a witness to testify to declarations made by the trustees and the surveyor at the second division. His honor ruled that any declarations made by the trustees who made the first division, and their instructions to the surveyor, were admissible; but that, as the rights of the parties had vested under that division, the declarations of the trustees who made the second division, or their instructions to the surveyor, who made the plat in evidence, at the time of the second division, were not admissible. This ruling was correct. The declarations of the trustees and their instructions to the surveyor at the time of the first division were admissible as part of the res gestæ. They were explanatory of their acts. But neither the acts nor the declarations of the trustees who made the second division, over 20 years afterwards, were competent as evidence to affect rights which had vested under the first division. Therefore his honor rightly ruled that the plat made in March, 1899, at the time of the second division, was not admissible as evidence of the first division.

[10] It is not contended that the court erred in charging that under the trust deed the trustees could, in dividing the estate, give some of the parties in interest personal property and the others real estate, when there was no evidence that any such division was made. If there was error in this respect, which is not conceded, it was clearly not prejudicial.

The real, and practically the only, issue in the case was: What property was set off to Sarah Anderson at the first division? The court distinctly and repeatedly instructed the jury that plaintiff was entitled to recover that, and only that, so far as her claim under Sarah Anderson's will was concerned. And the appellant practically conceded at the trial that she was so entitled. The verdict establishes the facts according to plaintiff's contention.

2. PLEADING (§ 308*)—EXHIBITS—MUNIMENTS OF TITLE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Civil Code 1910, § 5541, which requires that copies of contracts, obligations to pay, or other writings which constitute the basis or cause of action, or the relief prayed for, should be incorporated in or attached to the petition, only applies where the instrument sued on constitutes the cause of action, or the basis of the relief prayed.

(a) The plaintiffs alleged themselves to be the owners of the property appurtenant to the parks dedicated and to have an easement in such parks, and the object of the suit is to protect such easement. The easement is claimed by virtue of a dedication of the parks to the public use. In such a case, copies of the plaintiffs' muniment of title are not required to be attached to the petition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 935-941; Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

3. PARTIES (§ 14*)—PLAINTIFFS—JOINDER.

Where a number of people have a common interest in the result of a suit, they can all join in an action to assert their rights, and the parties being so joined does not make the case open to the objection that there is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. §§ 13, 16, 17½; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

4. DEDICATION (§ 19*)—EASEMENTS (§§ 15, 61*)—RIGHTS ACQUIRED—PROTECTION—ESTOPPEL.

Where a petition clearly shows that certain lots within an incorporated city were sold by the original owners for residence purposes with reference to a plat showing, not only the residence lots, but certain parks described thereon, which were intended to be dedicated to the public use, this would constitute a dedication of the parks to the public use, if the parks were accepted by the public.

(a) Persons who originally bought residence lots adjacent thereto with reference to such plats, and their grantees, would have an easement in such parks so dedicated.

(b) Such persons could join in an equitable petition to restrain the original owners of the lots and parks, and their grantees, from selling or otherwise disposing of or incumbering such parks, and to have a final decree declaring the parks to be public parks, subject to public use, and the petitioners and their assigns to have an easement in the same, without interference on the part of the grantors or their assigns.

(c) If the residence lots of plaintiffs were sold by the original owner to the original purchasers with reference to the plats containing a description of the parks, such original owner and his grantees are estopped from setting up a claim adverse to the right of private individuals who originally so purchased and their grantees, or to the public, to the use of the parks.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 35, 37-47; Dec. Dig. § 19.* Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-58, 102, 130-144, 148; Dec. Dig. §§ 15, 61.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by W. K. Mower and others against the East Atlanta Land Company and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants East Atlanta Land Company and A. E. Hurt separately bring error. Affirmed.

Payne, Little & Jones, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. Hines & Jordan, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. [1] The plaintiffs in error in the two cases herein dealt with were joint defendants in the same suit in the court below. Each of them filed a separate general demurrer in the case, both of which demurrers were overruled by the court, and the defendants below filed separate bills of exception to the judgment overruling each separate demurrer. A motion was made in this court in each case to dismiss the bill of exceptions, on the grounds: (1) That it did not sufficiently appear in what case the bill of exceptions was sued out, and who were the parties to the suit; (2) that the other codefendant in the case below, who is separately excepting, was not made a party to the bill of exceptions; (3) that the case below could not be split up and two separate bills of exceptions filed. There is no merit in any of the grounds of the motion to dismiss, and the motion is accordingly overruled. Where an action is brought against two defendants, and each files a separate demurrer, both of which are overruled, each party has the right to test the ruling. If one of them files a bill of exceptions on the overruling of his demurrer, there is no method known to the law by which the other defendant can compel him to include in his bill of exceptions an assignment of error on the overruling of the demurrer of such second defendant. Therefore, where one defendant files such a bill of exceptions, and does not assign error on the overruling of the demurrer of the other defendant, either the judgment last mentioned would stand as final against such other defendant, because no exception was taken to it, or else such defendant must have the right to except and test the question. Whatever might be the ruling on the writ of error upon the overruling of the one demurrer, the judgment so rendered, even though one of reversal, would not in all cases set aside or affect the judgment rendered on the demurrer of the other defendant. See, in this connection, Tate v. Goode et al., 135 Ga. 738, 70 S. E. 571, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 310. In order that each defendant may exercise his right to except to the overruling of a separate demurrer filed by him, he must have the right to file a separate bill of exceptions, if he so desires.

[2] 2. One ground of the demurrer is that the plaintiffs have not attached to the petition "any exhibit of any alleged deed or plat mentioned in said petition," and that this is necessary in order properly to put defendants on notice. It is insisted that copies of the plats and deeds should be attached to the petition, so as to enable the court to determine whether or not the plat would show such a designation of the places as parks as would be equivalent to a dedication. Our Civil Code 1910, § 5541, declares: "Copies of contracts, obligations to pay, or other writing should be incorporated in or attached to the petition in all cases in which they constitute the cause of action, or the relief prayed for must be based thereon." This section, which is relied upon in support of the demurrer, has no application. It has application only where the original of the copy which is to be attached to the declaration constitutes the cause of action, or the basis of the relief prayed for. Here neither the deeds, nor the plats or maps, constitutes the cause of action, or the basis of the relief prayed for. The basis of the present cause of action is the dedication, and the relief sought under it, and not the plats or deeds. These are probably some of the evidences of the dedication, but not the dedication itself, and surely the evidence is not required to be attached. In 31 Cyc. 556, 557, it is said: "In many states it is required that, when a pleading is founded on a written instrument, the original or a copy thereof must be attached to or filed with the pleading. But no contract or other instrument need or should be filed or annexed which is not the foundation of the action or defense. Therefore instruments which are merely to be used as evidence do not generally fall within the statute. Instruments other than those contemplated by the statutes need not and cannot be set up as exhibits under the statute."

The petition alleges: "Said company represented to the original purchasers of said lots that said parts, known as the Mesa, Triangle, and the Delta, were parks, and would always be kept as such, and that no one could ever build in front of the owners of lots fronting on said parks. On this representation of said company, said original purchasers of said lots bought the same from said company, paying therefor high prices, by reason of said parks being in front of said lots; and said original purchasers and their vendees have constructed costly residences thereon, which they would not have done, but for the fact that said company had dedicated said parks to the public, and assured the original purchasers that the same would always be used for that purpose." And in an amendment it was alleged: "Said dedication consisted in said company's laying off said land into lots, streets, and parks, making maps showing said lots, streets, and parks, and thereafter, at public auction sale of said lots and at private sales, making sales of said lots with reference to said maps, and by representing to the purchasers of said lots at said sales that said plats of ground were parks for public use and enjoyment."

It will therefore be seen that the basis of the suit is the dedication. And the evidence of the dedication, as set out in paragraph 8 of the petition, was "announced in public and in private, and in newspapers in advertising said lots for sale, and by representation on plats of said property." Even if the maps and deeds were the basis of the action, and it was necessary to attach copies, a perfect description of the parks is made, and their location with reference to the lots of land of the plaintiffs is given, in the petition, in which the boundaries of each is stated, so that the defendant is put as substantially on notice as to the property alleged to be dedicated as if the plans and maps were attached. The plaintiffs allege themselves to be the owners of the property appurtenant to the parks dedicated, and to have an easement in such public parks, and the object of the suit is to protect such easement. The easement is claimed by virtue of a dedication of the parks to the public use. In such a case, copies of the plaintiffs' muniment of title are not required to be attached to the petition.

[3] 3. As the same questions are involved in both cases, they will be considered together. In view of the amendment to the plaintiffs' petition in the court below, it will be necessary to consider only two questions presented by the record: (a) Whether there was a misjoinder of parties plaintiff in the case, as insisted by the plaintiffs in error. (b) Whether the petition shows specifically such facts as would create a dedication by the East Atlanta Land Company of the park property described therein to the plaintiff and the public for park purposes. We are clearly of the opinion that there was no misjoinder of parties. The rule seems to be well settled that, where a number of people have a common interest in the result of a suit, they can join in an action to assert their rights.

In the case of Blaisdell v. Bohr, 68 Ga. 56, it was held that "a bill is not multifarious because all of the defendants are not interested in all of the matters contained in the suit. It is sufficient if each party has an interest in some matter in the suit which is common to all, and that they are connected with the others," and "all persons who are directly or consequentially interested in the event of the suit are properly made parties to a bill in equity, so as to prevent a multiplicity of suits by or against parties at once or successively affected by the original case." And in discussing that case, on page 61, Justice Crawford said: "There was in this whole transaction but a single subject-matter—the 23 shares of stock. How and where the liability will fall, and what shall be the final determination as to the rights of these parties, are not the questions. All the parties are connected with it in the conveyance from the alleged true owner. They may all be heard, and their rights and liabilities settled in this one suit, and the whole matter finally adjudicated. Burchard v. Boyce, 21 Ga. 6; Wynne v. Lumpkin, 35

Ga. 208; Mitford & Tyler, 271-273; Dan. Ch. Pl. and Pr. 334; Story's Equity Pl. 271, 271a. * * * All persons who are directly or consequentially interested in the event of the suit should be made parties. Persons are often necessary parties defendant to a suit, 'not because their rights may be directly affected by the decree, if obtained, but because, in the event of the plaintiff succeeding in his object against the principal defendant, that defendant will thereby acquire a right to call upon him, either to reimburse him the whole or part of plaintiff's demand, or to do some act towards reinstating the defendant in the situation he would have been in but for the success of the plaintiff's claim.' This is done to avoid a multiplicity of suits, and requires the parties who may thus be consequentially liable to be brought in the first instance before the courts, that all the liabilities may be adjudicated and settled in one proceeding. 1 Dan. Ch. Pl. and Pr. § 283."

In the case of Conley v. Buck, 100 Ga. 187, 28 S. E. 97, Justice Fish (now Chief Justice) goes very exhaustively into the subject and cites a great number of authorities to sustain the ruling there made. It was there stated and ruled on page 187 of 100 Ga., and page 97 of 28 S. E., that "an equitable petition by a judgment creditor against the defendant in execution and others alleged, in substance, that they had all entered into a conspiracy to defeat the collection of the debt upon which the judgment was founded, that the common object of all the conspirators was to 'hide' and 'cover up,' in the names of the co-conspirators other than the defendant in execution, property which really belonged to him, and that in pursuance of this object various deeds had been executed purporting to convey specified parcels of realty to these co-conspirators, which in fact belonged to the judgment debtor; the particulars in each instance being set forth. The petition prayed for the cancellation of the various conveyances which were, for the reasons stated, alleged to be fraudulent, and for a judgment subjecting all the property to the petitioner's execution. Held, that this petition was not demurrable as failing to set forth an equitable cause of action, nor as being multifarious, nor for want of sufficient fullness in stating wherein the alleged fraudulent acts of the several defendants consisted." Also see 100 Ga. 199, 28 S. E. 97, et seq., where numerous authorities are cited with approval.

In 16 Cyc. 248, citing a number of authorities, including Georgia cases, it is stated that: "In order to permit a joinder of plaintiffs, it is not essential that their demands should be joint. It is sufficient if they are all interested, although distinctly, in the subject-matter and in the object to be attained. Indeed, a common interest in the object to be attained may in itself be sufficient to sustain the joinder, as where several property owners unite to prevent the collection of an illegal tax, or the unlawful use of the street on which their property abuts. Plaintiffs having distinct interests, but whose titles are derived from a common source, may unite in a bill to protect against an attack reaching that common source. The fact that the injury to each is caused by the same act has been held to afford a sufficient connection to maintain a joint suit. It is also held that the plaintiffs may join, although their interests be separate, where the relief sought by each involves the same question, requires the same evidence, and leads to the same decree." See, also, 6 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 892; Dart v. Orme, 41 Ga. 377.

In People's National Bank v. Cleveland, 117 Ga. 908, 916, 44 S. E. 20, 24, it was said: "The rule is well established that where there is one connected interest, centering in the point in issue, or one common point of litigation, so that the joinder tends to prevent multiplicity of suits, unconnected parties may join in an action."

It is alleged in the petition of W. K. Mower and others (15 in number) that the East Atlanta Land Company was the owner of a certain tract of land in the city of Atlanta, known as "Inman Park"; that said company graded and beautified the tract of land, laid it off into streets, parks, and lots, and sold many of the lots to plaintiffs and others for residence lots; that said company dedicated certain parks in said Inman Park to the public use and enjoyment of the public, among which were Mesa Park, the Triangle, and the Delta; that said dedication consisted of said company's laying off said land into lots, streets, and parks, making maps showing said lots, streets, and parks, and thereafter sold said lots at public auction and at private sales, making said sales of lots with reference to said maps, and by representing to the purchasers of said lots at such sales that said plats of ground were parks for public use and enjoyment; that all of petitioners are residents of said Inman Park, and own and reside on lots there, and have enjoyed the use and benefit of said parks ever since they became residents of Inman Park; that the East Atlanta Land Company represented to the original purchasers of said lots that said parks were parks, and would always be kept as such, and that no one could ever build in front of the owners of lots fronting on the parks, and it was on this representation of the company that the original purchasers bought lots, paying high prices by reason of the parks being in front of said lots, and constructed costly residences thereon, which they would not have done, but for the dedication and assurance that the parks would always be used for that purpose; that on March 26, 1896, the defendant conveyed to Alfred A. Glazier by deed the park known as the "Mesa," who afterwards on April 26, 1896, conveyed said park by deed to Mrs. Annie E. Hurt (one of the defendants); that Mrs. Annie E. Hurt has never taken possession of or improved same by erecting structures thereon, or fencing the same, but it has remained a public park, covered with grass, trees, shrubbery, etc., and has been enjoyed as such by the plaintiffs and other residents of Inman Park; that Mrs. Annie E. Hurt is the wife of Joel Hurt, who was and is the president of the East Atlanta Land Company, and its chief promotor; that Mrs. Annie E. Hurt knew of the dedication of the parks to public use and enjoyment at the time she bought said portion of Mesa Park from Glazier, etc.; that the company is offering to sell the two parks known as the Delta and the Triangle for places for the erection of stores, houses, or any other purpose, etc.; that unless enjoined defendants will create a cloud upon the title of the plaintiffs and the public to said parks; that the sale of a portion of the Mesa to Annie E. Hurt constituted a cloud upon the title of the plaintiffs and the public to the park known as the "Mesa"; and that after a title is acquired by prescription, and the evidence to establish the dedication of the land as a public park has been destroyed, the purchasers will sell or improve same and destroy the park. Plaintiffs pray: (a) That defendants be restrained and enjoined from selling, or otherwise disposing of or incumbering, the parks known as "Mesa," "Delta," and "Triangle"; (b) that the parks may be declared by final decree to be public parks, and their character as such confirmed, and the evidence thereof spread upon the records of the court; (c) that the cloud upon the title of petitioners and the public to the park known as "Mesa" may be removed by the decree of the court, and that the park may be declared as a public park, etc.

From these allegations it appears that such a community of interest exists between the plaintiffs in the court below as that they could sue jointly in order to enforce the alleged rights they have, and, this being true, the petition is not open to the objection that there is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff. Every one who bought an interest in that property, if bought as alleged in the petition, has an easement in those parks; and where an infringement of the rights of the purchaser or purchasers is shown, it affects the rights of all who are so situated, and all such may join in a bill to assert their rights. And neither the plaintiffs, nor the public, could be deprived of the right to the enjoyment of the use of the parks, if the lots were sold under the circumstances alleged in the petition and amended petition of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs could not be deprived of the full enjoyment of the parks, if there has been a dedication and acceptance of the parks on their part, and on the part of the public.

[4] 4. Does the petition aver specifically such facts as would create a dedication by the East Atlanta Land Company of the three parks described in the petition to the plaintiffs and to the public use? Did the petition show that the lots were sold with reference to the plats, and that the parks as described in the petition were represented on the plat at the time of the sale? Properly construed, we think the petition shows clearly that the sale of the lots was according to the plat, the substance of which was fully set forth, and if the parks were described or outlined on the plat, and the land was sold with reference thereto, then this would constitute a dedication of the parks to public or to private use, as the case may be, or both, by the owner. It appears from the petition that the East Atlanta Land Company was the owner of a certain tract of land, now constituting that certain residence district in the city of Atlanta known as "Inman Park," with the lots, streets, and parks mapped upon it. These lots, abutting upon the streets and parks, were sold by the company to the plaintiffs and others, and a valuable consideration paid therefor—a higher consideration, it is alleged, by reason of the dedication of the parks. Civil Code 1910, § 4171, declares: "If the owner of lands, either expressly or by his acts, dedicates the same to public use, and the same is so used for such a length of time that the public accommodation or private rights might be materially affected by the interruption of the enjoyment, he cannot afterwards appropriate it to private purposes."

This case has been treated as one of dedication; but, correctly speaking, there can be no dedication to a private use. "Dedication is the setting apart of land for the public use." 1 Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 122, and cases cited; Ford v. Harris, 95 Ga. 100, 22 S. E. 144. But, whether it is a case of dedication to a public or to a private use, the plaintiffs are asserting their right to an easement in the parks in controversy, and the result is the same to the plaintiffs, so far as their right to an easement in the parks is concerned. In the view we take of the case, if the lots were sold with reference to the plats, which contained a delineation of the parks, and the original purchasers bought with reference thereto, the seller is estopped from setting up a claim adverse to the right of private individuals, or their assigns, who so bought, or to the right of the public to use the parks, if there has been a dedication and acceptance. 1 Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 146; Schreck v. Blun, 131 Ga. 489, 62 S. E. 705; Mayor, etc., of Macon v. Franklin, 12 Ga. 239. And see Bouvier's Law Dict. "Estoppel in Pais," and cases cited.

In 3 Dillon on Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 1107, it is said: "Consummated intent on the part of the owner to dedicate is all that is required, and such intent may be shown by parol evidence of declarations and of acts in pais which unequivocally establish it. It may, we think, truly be affirmed that the doctrines of our law on this subject, as fashioned and settled by judicial tribunals, though in many respects seemingly anomalous, are characterized by practical wisdom, and are beneficent in their operation. Rightfully applied, they work no injury to the supposed dedicator, since they draw the line with enlightened and considerate care between a just measure of his rights on the one hand and the rights of the public on the other." See, also, Savannah, etc., R. Co. v. Shiels, 33 Ga. 601 (4); Schreck v. Blun, 131 Ga. 489, 62 S. E. 705. In 1 Elliott on Roads and Streets (3d Ed.) § 128, it is said: "Dedication may be established against the owner of the soil by showing that he has platted the ground, representing streets and alleys on the plat, and has sold lots with reference to it, or by showing that he has adopted a map or plat made by public officers, or other persons, or by showing that he has sold lots describing them as bounded by a street or road. * * * Ordinarily, the sale of a single lot with reference to the plat will complete the dedication." As to express and implied dedications, see same volume of this work, section 133 et seq.

Private corporations, having the right to own and deal with land, usually have power to dedicate roads and streets, or the like, to the public use. This is usually true, so long as it does not interfere with the purposes for which the company was incorporated. 1 Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 101; 13 Cyc. 442; Macon v. Franklin, 12 Ga. 239. The doctrine of dedication of parks and public squares to the public use has been extended and applied so as to give the public an easement in parks and squares in cities and villages, and this dedication may be effected in the same way as in the case of streets and highways. 3 Dillon on Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) §§ 1095, 1096, and cases cited. "R. Graves platted a tract of land as building lots, selling some of them by reference to such plat. On this plat was a small section marked 'Annette Park, now belonging to R. Graves.' Held, that such section thereof became a public park by dedication." Bayonne v. Ford, 43 N. J. Law, 292. In the case of Abbott v. Mills, 3 Vt. 521, 526, 23 Am. Dec. 222, Williams, J., said: "It is customary in laying out towns, particularly when it is contemplated that they will be places of business, to lay out a square or common, and to locate building lots bordering thereon. And these lots acquire an increased value in consequence of their location. If a village is built up, and individuals buy these lots, erect buildings, and commence the establishing of a village, and make it a common center for the business of the town, the other lands in town rise in value, of which the proprietors have all the advantage. It would then be the height of injustice, and contrary to every principle of good faith, to permit these proprietors to derive this advantage, and then frustrate the expectations held out, by resuming the lands thus set apart, and at a value greatly enhanced in consequence of their having been thus set out."

In Weger v. Delran, 61 N. J. Law, 224, 226, 39 Atl. 730, it is said: "Bechtold had purchased a tract of land which included the locus in quo; that he had made a map of it, laying it off by streets into blocks; that he named it 'Plan of Bechtold's Fourth Addition to the Town of Progress'; that all the blocks except the locus in quo were divided into numbered lots; that it was distinguished from the other blocks by a different coloring, by the delineation of trees and paths, and by a rough representation of a fountain in the center; that he had lithographed copies of the map made. * * * Although the map did not designate this block in words as a 'square' or 'park,' yet it contained persuasive evidence that it was intended for a different use than that to which the other blocks were designed to be put, and from Bechtold's acts and declarations, which were admissible evidence, there was the plain inference capable of being drawn that he intended to dedicate the block to public use, as was found by the trial judge, in accordance with the cases in this state respecting the dedication of lands to public uses." See, to the same effect, Morrow v. Highland Grove Traction Co., 219 Pa. 619, 623, 624, 69 Atl. 41, 42 (123 Am. St. Rep. 677), where it was said, quoting from a previous decision: "Property may be dedicated for public use by plans indicating that purpose. Such dedication becomes irrevocable when the interest of third persons is acquired by sale of lots or acceptance for the public by public use or municipal action. Acceptance by the public need not be immediate, but may be made when public necessity or convenience arises. As a corollary to this proposition, it follows that it is not necessary that the public use the entire property dedicated. Any public use of a part of the property, indicating a purpose to accept the gift, fixes the public right to the whole. When the public right has been acquired, it cannot be lost by nonuser or by municipal action not expressly authorized by law. Any occupation of the property inconsistent with the public right is a nuisance, and no length of time will legalize a public nuisance."

In Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 43, 50, 28 Pac. 339, 841 (16 L. R. A. 145), Harrison, J., said: "The word 'park,' written upon a block of land designated upon a map, is as significant of a dedication, and of the use to which the land is dedicated, as is the word 'street,' written upon such map. The word carries with itself the idea of an open or inclosed tract of land for the comfort and enjoyment of the inhabitants of the city or town in which it is located, and is so defined by lexicographers. In England, the word, when applied to an inclosed tract of land in the country, has a different signification, and signifies that the lands inclosed are the private grounds of the proprietor. In this country, too, a man may inclose his own land and style it a park, or give that name to his place, without giving the public any right to its use, for in such a case there would be no semblance of dedication; but the meaning of a word is to be determined by the circumstances connected with its use. In London, as well as in any city in this country, the term 'park' signifies an open space intended for the recreation and enjoyment of the public, and this signification is the same, whether the word be used alone or with some qualifying term, as Hyde Park, or Regent's Park, or, as in the present case, 'Central Park.'"

In Price v. Plainfield, 40 N. J. Law, 608, it is held: "The word 'park,' written upon a block on a map of city property, indicates a public use, and conveyances made by the owners of the platted land, by reference to such map, operates conclusively as a dedication of the block."

Authorities might be multiplied to the same effect. It follows, from what has been said, and in view of the amendments filed by the plaintiffs, that the trial judge did not err in overruling the demurrers filed in each of the cases here considered.

Judgment affirmed in both cases. All the Justices concur, except LUMPKIN, J., disqualified.

MOOR v. FARLINGER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 10, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

JUDGMENT (§ 572*)—RES JUDICATA—NATURE OF JUDGMENT—DEMURRER TO PETITION.

A petition was filed in the superior court, which alleged: That on a date named the plaintiff had made a deed to defendants "as trustees to sell all that tract or parcel of land [describing it]; that said parcel or tract of land was deeded to said trustees for school and church purposes [a copy of the deed being attached]. Petitioner shows that the purposes for which said deed was made have failed, and that said property has been abandoned for more than two years. Petitioner asks that said deed be annulled, and the title to said property be restored to him, according to the law governing such trustees," and that process issue. A copy of the deed was attached to the petition. It was a quitclaim deed from the petitioner to the defendants, "trustees," for the recited consideration of $100. It set out no trust, and there was nothing to indicate the existence of a trust, except the addition of the word "trustees" after the names of the grantees. A demurrer was filed to this petition, on the ground that it failed to state a cause of action, and because it affirmatively appeared from the petition that the plaintiff had no sort of interest in the property described, and was not entitled to a right of action for the recovery thereof. The demurrer was sustained, and the case dismissed. Later the plaintiff filed another petition, alleging, in detail, that the deed had been executed for the purpose of having the property controlled by the grantees and used for school and church purposes, and it was understood that they were to have no beneficial interest as individuals, but should hold the property in trust as long as it could be used for the purposes mentioned, and the deed was executed to put an estate in them for that length of time and no longer; that there was no consideration paid; that the property was used for the purposes stated for a time, but had been abandoned and ceased to be so used, and a resulting trust to the petitioner had arisen; that the grantees in the deed had abandoned and sold the property, and one of them had the proceeds in his hands, which he refused to pay to the plaintiff on demand, and plaintiff was informed that the others made no claim upon it. He alone was sued. The defendants pleaded that the subject-matter of the suit was res adjudicata. The case was submitted to the presiding judge, without a jury, and he sustained the plea. Held, that this was not error. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 4335, 5943, 5820, 4336, 4338; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 733, 778, 780; Fain v. Hughes, 108 Ga. 537, 33 S. E. 1012; Greene v. Central of Georgia R. Co., 112 Ga. 859, 38 S. E. 360; Smith v. Smith, 125 Ga. 83, 54 S. E. 73; Gunn v. James, 120 Ga. 482, 48 S. E. 148; Dodson v. So. Ry. Co., 137 Ga. 583, 73 S. E. 834.

(a) The ruling in Steed v. Savage, 115 Ga. 97, 41 S. E. 272, does not conflict with that here made. There a petition was filed in the nature of a bill of interpleader. It was held that, in the absence of allegations essential to such petition, it would be dismissed on general demurrer. It was said that this would not conclude the parties thereto on any matter, except that the petition did not authorize the equitable relief prayed for, although there were some allegations which might have been appropriate to a suit to recover the property.

A. J. GOLDEN & SON v. C. D. SHAW & CO. (Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

FRAUD (§ 43*)—DECEIT—SALE OF LAND.

In an action for damages, instituted August 31, 1909, on account of alleged deceit practiced on plaintiffs, inducing them to enter into a written contract with defendants, the petition was not subject to general demurrer, on the ground that no cause of action was set out, where the petition alleged the following in substance: On September 5, 1905, by a written contract between the parties of that date, defendants sold to plaintiffs their entire turpentine outfit, located in a designated county and district, consisting of described personal property, and all their timber suitable for turpentine purposes. Of the timber included in the sale there designated numbers of "acres of timber" on several designated lots of different named persons. The contract recited the number of acres held under the different owners of land as ranging from 200 to 1,225 acres; the aggregate being 3,971 acres. As a matter of fact, there was a deficiency in the number of acres of timber in each of such tracts, on account of the land having been cleared and put in cultivation; the total deficiency amounting to 764 acres. The price paid per acre was $2.50, and the loss to plaintiffs by reason of the deficit in acreage was $1,910. During the negotiations which finally culminated in the sale, plaintiffs made inquiry of defendants, on different occasions, as to whether the number of acres set forth in the different leases exhibited to petitioners and afterwards incorporated in the contract "represented the number of acres of timber lands in each instance, exclusive of all clearings and cultivated fields, and petitioners were assured by the defendants that the acres so mentioned represented only timbered lands, exclusive of that cleared or in cultivation." Petitioners made an examination of the lands in the best possible manner, without an actual survey, before the transaction was actually consummated into a sale, but were unable, without an actual survey, to determine, with any accuracy, or even approximately, whether the acreage as set forth and claimed by the defendants was the true acreage of the timber lands, or otherwise; this knowledge being exclusively with the defendants, and in their own breast and keeping. At the time this sale was made, when petitioners made an inquiry as to these facts above set forth, defendants actually knew that the figures representing the acreage given and set forth did not represent the true acreage of timber lands, but represented the timber lands and the cleared lands as well. Relying upon the representations made by defendants as to the acreage of the timber lands, plaintiffs acted, and were thereby misled into making the purchase above described, believing that they had contracted only for timber lands, and not for cleared lands that contained no timber; and the failure on the part of the defendants to deliver them the total amount of timber purchased has resulted in loss and damage to them. See Emlen v. Roper, 133 Ga. 726, 68 S. E. 934.

(a) In regard to the case of Martin v. Harwell, 115 Ga. 156, 41 S. E. 696, it may be remarked that the subject-matter of the representations there involved was in part the quality or character of the timber on certain lands; and that the decision in that case was rendered by four Justices, and is not such a binding precedent as requires the decision to be reconsidered or modified formally. Therefore, without finding it necessary to formally overrule or declare a modification of that decision, it will not be extended to cases of the present character.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 18, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ESTOPPEL (§ 78*)—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—CONTRACTS.

A declaration in attachment alleged in substance as follows: An owner of timbered land sold and conveyed the cypress and hardwood timber located thereon, suitable for sawmill purposes, to another on a credit, but expressed no time which the grantee should have within which to cut and remove such timber. Two years would have been a reasonable time therefor. Some time thereafter the grantee desired to borrow money from a corporation, which was a dealer in lumber and hardwood, and which was desirous of making the loan on terms that would be advantageous to it, including the purchase of the product of the sawmill. The company was unwilling to advance the sum to the grantee, unless he could secure from the grantor and transfer to it as security the right to have ten years in which to cut and remove the timber. The grantee applied to the grantor for that purpose. The grantor agreed, provided a certain part of the purchase money should be paid, and two notes of equal amount should be given by the grantee for the balance, due at three and six months, respectively, and that the corporation would agree to assume and pay such notes. Through its officer it orally agreed to do so. The additional grant of time was made to the grantee, and he executed the notes, and transferred the grant to the corporation as security. The instrument so executed recited that, whereas, it was agreed that the purchaser should have ten years in which to exercise the rights conferred on him, and this was omitted from the "lease," "it is now agreed" that he shall have ten years within which to exercise such rights. Subsequently he became a bankrupt, and the grantor sued the corporation on its parol promise to pay the notes of the grantee. Held that, in a suit against the company, based on its promise, such recitals did not estop the grantor from alleging and proving that in fact there was no mistake in the original agreement, but the grant of ten years within which to exercise the privilege was a new agreement, and the consideration was the promise of the defendant to pay the notes of the grantee.

(a) The ground of demurrer to a suit on such parol promise, setting up the statute of frauds, should have been sustained.

Error from Superior Court, Early County; W. C. Worrell, Judge.

Action by J. S. Cowart against the W. E.

Coldwell Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. S. Cowart brought suit by attachment against the W. E. Coldwell Company. As amended, the declaration alleged in substance as follows: On July 18, 1906, the plaintiff sold to T. A. Bailey all the cypress and hardwood timber suitable for sawmill purposes, located upon certain land, for the sum of $2,000, for which credit was extended. No time was specified in which to cut and remove the timber from the land, and therefore only a reasonable time was allowed. Two years would have been a reasonable time. About six months after the contract was made, and before any of the timber was cut, the creditors of Bailey were pressing him. The Coldwell Company was a dealer in lumber and hardwood products, and was a large and wealthy company. It desired to advance to Bailey a sufficient sum to enable him to arrange with his creditors, provided he would mortgage to it certain property and enter into a contract to sell and deliver to it the entire output of his sawmill at a price which would be very profitable to the company. After negotiation, the company was unwilling to advance the sum, unless Bailey could secure from the plaintiff and transfer to it the right to have ten years in which to cut and remove the timber. In order to carry into effect this arrangement, Bailey approached the plaintiff with a request to sign an instrument giving to him ten years in which to cut and remove the timber. The plaintiff agreed to this, provided that he should be paid $580 of the $2,000 purchase money, and interest then due, and that for the remaining $1,500 of the purchase price two notes should be given by Bailey, each for $750, with interest, due three and six months after date, respectively, and that the Coldwell Company would agree to assume and pay these notes, whether Bailey's business or arrangement with the company proved successful or not. The company orally agreed to assume and pay the notes, if the plaintiff would execute and deliver to Bailey an instrument in writing giving ten years in which to cut and remove the timber; it being in contemplation of the parties that such instrument would be at once transferred by Bailey to the company. The plaintiff executed such an instrument, and delivered it to one James, for the company, as was agreed, but, in order to more perfectly secure the payment of the notes, inserted in the paper a proviso to the effect that, if the notes were not paid at maturity, the instrument should be void. Plaintiff was informed by James, acting for the company, that the instrument was not in accordance with the agreement, and was assured that, inasmuch as the company was perfectly responsible, no security was necessary. Believing this to be true, he re-executed the instrument, omitting the proviso. He was under no legal or moral duty to execute such an instrument prior to the making of the promise by the company, there having been no agreement on his part prior to that time to give Bailey any fixed time in which to cut and remove the timber; and the recital in the instrument to that effect, and that the time in which the timber could be cut was left out of the original contract by mistake, was not true. Such recital "was inserted merely to comply with what plaintiff and said Bailey then believed to be a necessary legal form, and for no other reason; and this was well known to the defendant at the time when it promised to pay said notes, and when said instruments were so executed and delivered by plaintiff." It was added that, if the court should deem it necessary, the instrument last executed should be reformed by striking from it the untrue recital; and it was alleged that Bailey recognized the truth of these allegations, and stood ready to be made a party defendant and to consent to the reformation. It was prayed that, if it should be necessary to the exercise of the plaintiff's rights, this should be done. The instrument thus executed was at once transferred by Bailey to the defendant company as a part of the security given by him to it, along with other security, and a contract in regard to cutting and furnishing lumber to it. Some months later Bailey became a bankrupt.

A copy of the instrument referred to in the plaintiff's declaration is as follows: "Georgia, Calhoun County. Whereas, it was agreed between J. S. Cowart and T. A. Bailey that the said Bailey would have ten years within which to exercise the powers and rights granted to him on a certain instrument of lease from J. S. Cowart to T. A. Bailey, dated July 16, 1906, to 200 acres, more or less, of timber in the swamp of Caney creek, in Baker county, Georgia; and whereas, the length of time, to wit, ten years, was by mistake omitted from lease: It is now agreed that said Bailey shall have ten years from July 16, 1906, within which to exercise the powers granted in said instrument."

The defendant demurred to the plaintiff's declaration, on a number of grounds. Some of the grounds of special demurrer were sustained, and others were overruled. The general grounds were overruled. The defendant excepted.

J. R. Pottle, of Atlanta, and C. L. Glessner, of Blakely, for plaintiff in error. L. M. Rambo, of Arlington, and Pope & Bennet, of Albany, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The defendant excepted to the overruling of certain grounds of demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration in attachment. A question in the case, and the one to which the argument was largely directed, was whether the recital in the instrument executed by the plaintiff to Bailey, and which was transferred to the defendant, in regard to the omission from the former contract with Bailey of a certain time in which the timber could be cut and removed, could be shown to be untrue. The plaintiff contended that this recital was merely in regard to the consideration for the executing of the paper, and could be disproved. The defendant contended that it was not a recital of that character, but was one which worked an estoppel upon the plaintiff, who executed it, and could not be disproved.

The recital in a deed of the receipt of the purchase money does not estop the maker from denying the fact and proving the contrary. Civil Code 1910, § 4188. "Recitals in deeds, except payment of purchase money, as against the grantor" and his privies, generally work an estoppel. Section 5738. The consideration of a deed may always be inquired into when the principles of justice require it. Section 4179. Ordinarily, where the statement in a deed as to a consideration is merely by way of recital, the actual consideration of the deed is subject to explanation; but if the consideration is referred to in the deed in such a way as to make it one of the terms or conditions of the contract, it cannot be varied by parol. This statement, in connection with the rule against permitting the terms of a written contract to be changed by parol, will serve to reconcile a number of rulings where evidence has been admitted to show what was the consideration of the deed or contract with others in which it has been rejected. As illustrations of cases of the first character mentioned, see Horn v. Ross & Leitch, 20 Ga. 210, 65 Am. Dec. 621; Burke v. Napier, 106 Ga. 328, 32 S. E. 134; and citations; Stone v. Minter, 111 Ga. 45 (2), 53, 36 S. E. 321, 50 L. R. A. 356; Martin v. White, 115 Ga. 866, 42 S. E. 279; Goette v. Sutton, 128 Ga. 179, 57 S. E. 308; Pavlovski v. Klasing, 134 Ga. 704, 68 S. E. 511. For cases of the latter character, see Wellmaker v. Wheatley, 123 Ga. 201, 51 S. E. 436, and citations; Atlas Tack Co. v. Exchange Bank, 111 Ga. 703, 36 S. E. 939; L. & N. R. Co. v. Holland, 132 Ga. 173, 63 S. E. 898; L. & N. R. Co. v. Willbanks, 133 Ga. 15, 65 S. E. 86, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 374, 17 Ann. Cas. 860; Southern Bell T. & T. Co. v. Smith, 129 Ga. 558, 59 S. E. 215.

Under the guise of inquiring into the consideration of a deed, it is not competent by parol evidence to change the terms of the deed, or add new terms thereto. The point which we are now considering must not be confused with that involved in cases where a party in pari delicto will not be allowed to set aside his executed conveyance by asserting his own fraud, such as Parrott v. Baker, 82 Ga. 364, 9 S. E. 1068. In 16 Cyc. 699, it is said: "All parties to a deed are bound by the recitals in it legitimately appertaining to the subject-matter. Recitals of matter of fact in a deed are ordinarily binding on the grantor. They are binding, also, on the grantee and his successors in estate, where he or they base their rights on the deed, but not otherwise." And on page 702 it is said: "A recital works an estoppel only in an action founded on a deed, or brought to enforce rights arising under it. While in a collateral action it may constitute evidence against the one party or the other, it is not conclusive." See, also, 2 Herman on Estoppel, § 628; Bigelow on Estoppel (5th Ed.) 352. The leading case on the subject is that of Carpenter v. Buller, 8 Mees. & Wels. 209, in which it is ruled: "Where a distinct statement of a particular fact is made in the recital of a bond or other instrument under seal, and a contract is made with reference to that recital, it is not, as between the parties to the instrument, and in an action upon it, competent to the party bound to deny the recital, and a recital in an instrument not under seal may be such as to be conclusive to the same extent. But a party to an instrument is not estopped, in an action by another party, not founded on the deed, and wholly collateral to it, to dispute the facts so admitted; but evidence of the circumstances under which such admission was made is receivable to show that the admission was inconsiderately made, and is not entitled to weight as a proof of the fact it is used to establish." Since this case was decided in 1841 it has been widely cited. In re Morgan, 2 L. R. Ch. Div. 72; Macaulay v. Marshall, 20 U. C. Q. B. 273; Goodspeed v. Fuller, 46 Me. 141, 71 Am. Dec. 572; Harrison v. Castner, 11 Ohio St. 339; Champlain & St. Lawrence R. Co. v. Valentine, 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 484; King v. Mead, 60 Kan. 539, 57 Pac. 113; Reed v. McCourt, 41 N. Y. 435.

In most, if not all, of the cases relied on by the plaintiff in error, an effort was made by a party to a deed or his privies in estate to assert title to the property conveyed, by virtue of the deed, or in conflict with its recitals or terms. Thus in McCleskey v. Leadbetter, 1 Ga. 551, the action was one of trover to recover certain slaves. A written instrument was introduced in evidence, which recited that the maker, under whom both parties claimed, had previously conveyed the negroes, that the conveyance was lost or mislaid, and that the maker executed the second instrument so as to relinquish all title which might remain in him. It was said that the recital of the execution of a previous deed was evidence of the fact, and binding upon the party making it and his privies. In Thrower v. Wood, 53 Ga. 458, an act of the Legislature was passed legitimating a child. Afterward the alleged father made a deed of gift to his three children, naming the above-mentioned child as one of them.

In a subsequent proceeding to partition the land, it was held that, "in a suit for and concerning the very land conveyed by the deed," the recital of the relationship was conclusive as against any one claiming the land under or by virtue of the deed. In Long v. Bullard, 59 Ga. 355, the action was commenced by suit on a promissory note. The plaintiff was allowed to amend by alleging that the money was loaned to pay a debt which was secured by a mortgage on land, that prior to the foreclosure of the mortgage the landowner and his wife had obtained a homestead, and, to secure the money advanced by the plaintiff, executed a deed to him, which described the property as having been set apart as a homestead. A sale of the property and payment of the debt from the proceeds was prayed. The court charged that the homestead was void for lack of jurisdiction in the ordinary, who granted it, to do so. It was held that the grantee, who accepted the deed with the recital that the property had been set apart as a homestead and was conveyed with the approval of the ordinary, was estopped from denying the validity of the homestead.

Applying the principles above discussed to the case in hand, it will be seen that the present suit is not an effort to recover the property conveyed; nor is the written instrument relied on to defend against such an effort. It is not a proceeding to enforce the written instrument, considered as a grant or conveyance, or to attack the conveyance or grant of a right therein specified. The suit is one to recover a consideration alleged to have been promised for the making of the instrument. It is more nearly analogous to a suit to recover the purchase price recited in a deed to have been paid. The recital in the instrument is that, "whereas," Cowart agreed with the other party, Bailey, that the latter would have ten years within which to exercise the powers and rights granted to him in what is called a "timber lease," in regard to the timber on certain land, and the time mentioned was by mistake omitted from the lease, "it is now agreed that said Bailey shall have ten years from July 16, 1906 [the date of the former instrument], within which to exercise the powers granted in said instrument." The grant of such time is a present grant. The second instrument does not in terms agree to the correction of the former lease by the insertion of another provision in it. If it had done so, such an expression in the contractual part of the instrument might not have been open to disproof by parol, unless the instrument were reformed, under proper allegations and proof. One of the meanings of the word "whereas," given by the lexicographers, is "considering that." Webster's Dictionary. See, also, Dean v. Clark, 80 Hun (N. Y.) 80, 83, 30 N. Y. Supp. 45. We recognize the distinction between mere motive and consideration.

But the terms of the instrument now before us would seem to indicate rather a recital of a consideration than of facts simply indicating motive, or forming an integral part of the terms of the contract. Moreover, the plaintiff alleged that he and Bailey put such recital into the written instrument to comply with what they thought was a necessary legal form, and for no other reason; that there had in fact been no previous agreement to allow ten years within which to cut and remove the timber, and such statement was untrue; and that this was well known to the defendant company, to which the contract was transferred by Bailey, when it made the promise to pay Bailey's notes.

Of course, upon the trial of such an issue, a written admission upon the part of the plaintiff as to the facts would be admissible in evidence, although it might not amount to an estoppel by deed. Whether the jury would believe such written admissions, or the parol testimony offered by the plaintiff, would be for their determination. While such recitals may not in themselves operate as estoppels by deed, statements or representations in a written instrument may sometimes furnish a basis for an estoppel in pais, or an equitable estoppel, if they induce action on the part of another detrimental to him, so that it would be a fraud to permit the person making such statements to deny them. There was no error in overruling the general demurrer based on the ground that the recital in the instrument last executed worked an estoppel.

[2] 2. Another point raised by the demurrer was that the declaration showed on its face that the alleged promise declared on was within the statute of frauds, and there was nothing to take it without the operation of that statute. Counsel for defendant in error in their brief discussed this point, and cited authorities in regard to it. In the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error there was only a passing statement as to insisting on other grounds of demurrer than that above considered. But we think that the question of the applicability of the statute of frauds is sufficiently presented to necessitate a consideration of it. Few enactments have given rise to more confusion and conflict in decision than the statute of frauds. In Fullam v. Adams, 37 Vt. 391, 393, infra, referring to the section of the statute now under consideration, Poland, C. J., said: "The question, whether the defendant's promise was valid without writing, opens the door to an examination to an almost endless extent of judicial discussions and determination, both in England and in this country, and we can hardly hope to do more than to add another decision to the long line, which may serve to perplex future explorers into the true extent and meaning of this section of this ancient statute."

On the subject of what is an original promise, which is not within the statute, and what is a collateral promise, which falls within its purview, two general lines of authority have arisen, besides many rulings touching modifications of the general rules and special exceptions. In 1811 the leading case of Leonard v. Vredenburg, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 29, 5 Am. Dec. 817, was decided. The actual questions before the court were whether a guaranty by a third person to pay the price of a bill of goods, made in writing at the time of the sale, had to express the consideration for the undertaking of the promisor, and whether certain parol evidence was admissible to show that the principal debtor had applied to purchase the goods for which the writing was given, and the credit had been refused to him without security for the payment, whereupon a third party (who was a defendant) signed the instrument as a guarantor, and the goods were delivered; also that such third person later promised to pay for the goods, and that he had been secured against loss, and the purchaser was insolvent when the goods were delivered and afterward. In discussing the case, the learned Chief Justice Kent made the following statement: "There are, then, three distinct classes of cases on this subject, which require to be discriminated: (1) Cases in which the guaranty or promise is collateral to the principal contract, but is made at the same time, and becomes an essential ground of the credit given to the principal or direct debtor. Here, as we have already seen, is not, nor need be, any other consideration than that moving between the creditor and original debtor. (2) Cases in which the collateral undertaking is subsequent to the debt, and was not the inducement of it, though the subsisting liability is the ground of the promise, without any distinct and unconnected inducement. Here must be some further consideration shown, having an immediate respect to such liability, for the consideration for the original debt will not attach to this subsequent promise. * * * (3) A third class of cases, and to which I have already alluded, is when the promise to pay the debt of another arises out of some new and original consideration of benefit or harm moving between the newly contracting parties. The two first classes of cases are within the statute of frauds, but the last is not."

In Mallory v. Gillett, 21 N. Y. 412, decided in 1860, a plaintiff, having repaired A.'s boat, refused to deliver it until he was paid for his work. A third person, in consideration of the relinquishment of plaintiff's lien, and of forbearance to sue the original debtor, orally promised the plaintiff to pay the debt at a certain future time. The plaintiff delivered the boat to A., and the third person so promising paid part of the debt. In an action to recover the balance, it was held by a majority of the judges that the defendant's promise, not being in writing, was within the statute of frauds. A minority of the judges dissented, holding that the case fell within the ruling in Leonard v. Vredburgh, supra. Comstock, C. J., filed an exhaustive opinion on behalf of the majority of the court. By way of explanation or modification of Judge Kent's statement as to the third class of cases, it was said that the consideration must move to the person making the promise. A distinction was thus drawn between a consideration arising from the promisee's being induced to act to his injury by releasing a lien against the property delivered to the original debtor, and a consideration moving to the person making the parol promise—a distinction which has been questioned. These cases have been followed more or less closely by a number of others, and in some of them modifications of the original statements have been made. Some cases have declared that the question was not so much to be determined by what was the consideration for the new promise, or between whom it moved, as by whether the leading purpose of the promisor was, for a consideration, to assume a primary obligation to pay the debt, rather than a secondary or collateral one; and from this has arisen what is sometimes called "the leading purpose" test.

Another line of cases rejects the classification made by Chief Justice Kent, especially as to the third class. In Fullam v. Adams, 37 Vt. 391, supra, the defendant retained the plaintiff as his attorney in any litigation that might grow out of a conveyance to him by his brother, who had failed, and in consideration of such retainer promised the plaintiff verbally to pay him one-half of a debt due to the plaintiff by the defendant's brother, and also promised to pay the plaintiff for his services, if he performed any. It was held that the defendant's promise to pay the debt of his brother to the plaintiff was a promise within the statute of frauds, and that, not being in writing, it could not be enforced. It was said that "a verbal promise to pay the debt of another, where the original debt still subsists, is never legally binding, except where the promisor has received the funds or property of the debtor for the purpose of being so applied, so that an obligation or duty rests upon him, as between himself and the debtor, to make such payment, whereby his promise, though in form to pay the debt of another, is in fact a promise to perform an obligation of duty of his own." This ruling was not dependent upon any lack of consideration for the promise, for it was held that a retainer of an attorney was a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay such attorney a debt due him by another, if the promise were in writing. In Maule v. Bucknell, 50 Pa. 39, where a majority of the directors of a corporation transferred part of their stock and resigned as directors, in order that their transferees might be elected in their stead and have control of the affairs of the company, in consideration of their parol promise to pay all the debts, and where, after such transfer and election, but a small portion of the debts was paid, in consequence of which the corporate property was sold by the sheriff and a large part of the indebtedness was left unpaid and lost, including a debt due by the company to one of the original directors, who was a promisee, in an action by him to recover against the promisors, it was held that the promise was within the statute of frauds, and the plaintiff could not recover. The court rejected the theory that, as a general rule, a promise to pay the debt of another was not within the statute of frauds, if it rested upon a new consideration passing from the promisee to the promisor. It was said: "A new consideration for a new promise is indispensable without the statute, and if a new consideration is all that is needed to give validity to the promise to pay the debt of another, the statute amounts to nothing." On the general subject, see Sherman v. Alberta, 153 Mich. 361, 116 N. W. 1090, 128 Am. St. Rep. 496, and note.

These cases suffice to illustrate the wide diversity of views in regard to the theory that a new promise, based on a new consideration moving to the promisor, will take the case without the statute. It would too greatly protract this opinion to discuss the various exceptional cases and modifications of these two general views. Only a few will be mentioned. One of the most common is that mentioned in the Vermont case above cited, and sometimes called "the funds rule." Another is where the promise is not made to, or sought to be enforced by, the holder of the original debt, but where, for a proper consideration, a third person agrees with the debtor to pay the debt of the latter. As an instance of this sort may be mentioned a case in which one takes an assignment of a bond for title from the holder thereof, under a contract to pay the purchase money due to the original vendor. This has been treated as another form of promise to pay the purchase money due to the assignor, the payment being agreed to be made to his creditor, instead of to him, and such a promise has been held not to be within the statute of frauds. Ford v. Finney, 35 Ga. 258; Martin v. Copeland, 77 Ga. 374, 8 S. E. 258. So, where, one purchases property on which rests a lien to secure a debt, and in order to relieve the property, or prevent a foreclosure and sale, and to secure further supplies, promises to pay the debt, this has been held to be an original promise, and not within the statute of frauds. Wooten v. Wilcox, Stilson & Co., 87 Ga. 474, 13 S. E. 595. See, also, Bohannon v. Jones, 80 Ga. 488; Davis v. Banks, 45 Ga. 138. Cases in which, by agreement, a creditor releases one debtor and substitutes another in his place, do not fall within the statute. It is plain that, if a person making a new promise becomes the sole debtor for a legal consideration, such a promise cannot be collateral; for the original promise has been extinguished, and there is nothing to which the new promise can be collateral.

There are a number of cases of this character in the Georgia Reports. As an example, see Harris & Price v. Young, 40 Ga. 65; Anderson & Tucker v. Whitehead, Eggleston & Co., 55 Ga. 277; Ferst's Sons & Co. v. Bank of Waycross, 111 Ga. 229, 36 S. E. 773. In the case last mentioned Leonard v. Vredenburg and other similar cases are cited in the opinion, but finally the decision rested upon the substitution of one debtor for another; and this court has not gone to the length of the rulings made by the New York courts. The case of Burruss v. Smith & Turner, 75 Ga. 710, grew out of the peculiar relation of landlord and "cropper." The cropper had given a mortgage on cotton to a third party. The landlord was about to sell it. The mortgagee resisted the sale and threatened to stop it. In order to free the cotton, the landlord promised to pay the debt of the cropper for advances made by the mortgagee in raising the crop. Under the relation mentioned, he himself had a title to the cotton, and thus was freeing it from the lien asserted upon it. His promise was held to be original, and not collateral. In the opinion Chief Justice Jackson referred to the question of whether there was a consideration; but it will be seen to take its place with other cases which have been cited. In Sext v. Gelse & Co., 80 Ga. 698, 6 S. E. 174, it was held that if, whilst a house is being built, the supply of lumber is about to stop because the contractor is not considered safe, and the owner of the building procures its continuance by promising to pay the bill, his indebtedness is not collateral, but original. No distinction seems to have been considered between lumber thereafter furnished to the owner upon his own credit and any amount which the contractor might have owed for what had already been furnished. The verdict was for less than the amount sued for. After stating the rule as above announced, Chief Justice Bleckley merely said: "We rather think the evidence makes this case, and we should be satisfied with the verdict, were it not that, according to the evidence, the time for payment was not on delivery of the lumber, but when the job was finished, and it was not shown either that the job was finished or that a reasonable time for that purpose had elapsed before the suit was brought." This was all that was said on the subject.

Omitting further discussion of the consideration theory, and of special instances where the promise is in reality to pay the promisor's own debt, though in form or name to pay the debt of another, we come to consider another general rule. In 20 Cyc. 196, it is said that "it is a general rule that an oral promise to pay the pre-existing debt of another, in consideration that the original debtor shall be discharged from liability thereon, is not within the statute. * * * But if the debtor is not discharged, and the original debt still subsists concurrently with the oral agreement to assume it, the latter is within the statute of frauds, and is void as a collateral agreement to answer for the debt of another." In Davis v. Tift, 70 Ga. 52, 55, Hall, J., treated the discharge of the original debtor as a test which might be used to determine whether the promise to pay a pre-existing debt of another was original or collateral, and quoted approvingly the following from Sergeant Williams: "The question is, What is the promise? Is it a promise to answer for the debt or miscarriage of another, for which that other remains liable? Not what the consideration for that promise is, for it is plain that the nature of the consideration cannot affect the terms of the promise itself, unless, as in the case of Goodman v. Chase, 1 B. & A. 297, it be an extinguishment of the liability of the original party." In Strauss v. Garrett & Sons, 101 Ga. 307, 28 S. E. 850, Strauss brought suit against Kaufman and Garrett & Sons, alleging that Kaufman was indebted to him, and that Garrett & Sons undertook and agreed to assume the payment of the debt, in consideration of the transfer by Kaufman to them of certain merchandise and the agreement by plaintiff to refrain from interfering with or preventing such transfer; that the transfer was made, plaintiff not interfering in any way to prevent it, and thereby Kaufman was rendered insolvent; that plaintiff had no lien upon the property to secure his debt, but that he could have obtained security for and final payment of his debt if the transfer had not taken place; and that he had frequently demanded payment of the defendants, but all of them had refused to pay. It was held that, the promise of Garrett & Sons to pay the plaintiff the amount due to him by Kaufman being in parol, and Kaufman being bound on the debt to plaintiff, "it was a clear case of a promise to answer for the debt of another person, and the obligation thus undertaken was not binding." Birkmyr v. Darnell, 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 522, was cited. A judgment sustaining a demurrer as to Garrett & Sons was affirmed. See, also, Palmetto Mfg. Co. v. Parker & Anderson, 123 Ga. 798, 800, 51 S. E. 714. In Bluthenthal & Bickart v. Moore, 111 Ga. 297, 36 S. E. 689, H. was indebted to B., and the debt was secured by a mortgage which had been foreclosed. W. purchased the mortgaged goods from H., assumed the debt of H., and gave his promissory notes therefor to B. M. orally agreed to see that W.'s notes were paid, and thereupon B. released H. and canceled the mortgage. It was held that the promise of M. was within the statute of frauds, and void, because not in writing, and that this was true, although the creditor had released the mortgagor and canceled the mortgage, thus losing his security.

In one or two cases mention has been made of whether there has been performance or part performance of such a character as to take the case out of the statute of frauds. But it will be found that in such cases there was a substitution of one creditor for another, and not merely the furnishing of a consideration for the promise. Otherwise every promise to answer for an antecedent debt of another would either be void for want of consideration, as would be any contract, or would be taken out of the statute of frauds if there was a consideration, as pointed out in the Pennsylvania Case above cited.

How, then, stands the present case with reference to these rules? The plaintiff, Cowart, had already granted to Bailey the right to cut the timber, and Bailey was already indebted to him therefor. Cowart had no lien or other security. The plaintiff did not release Bailey, but, on the contrary, required him to give new notes. He took no written promise from the Coldwell Company. He conveyed nothing directly to the latter company. He made a conveyance to Bailey, which would prove beneficial to the Coldwell Company through contracts contemplated to be made between that company and Bailey. This would have furnished a sufficient consideration for a written promise by that company; but, under the decisions of this court above cited, the parol promise alleged to have been made by the Coldwell Company to the plaintiff was within the statute of frauds. The allegations in regard to inserting a proviso into the instrument so executed, and then striking it out on the objection of one James, were not sufficient to change this ruling. It was alleged that the instrument was to be delivered to him for the defendant company; that, "acting for the Coldwell Company," he informed the plaintiff that the instrument was not in accordance with the agreement, and it was stricken therefrom, and James assured the plaintiff that, as the Coldwell Company was perfectly responsible, no security was necessary. This was not sufficient to show a binding oral promise on the part of defendant company.

Because of the statute of frauds the demurrer should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

JAMES v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DEATH (§§ 46, 103*)—CHILDREN—LOSS OF SERVICE.

It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that a child 2 years, 10 months, and 20 days old, who was alleged to be "a precocious child, capable of and did run errands for petitioner, was strong and robust, with unusual physical powers for a child of his age, and did render, and was capable of rendering, services to petitioner that were at the time worth five dollars per month," etc., was so incapable of performing such valuable services that a defendant corporation would not be liable in damages for the homicide of such child, if it be shown on the trial of the case that the killing was tortious and not justified.

(a) In such case the trial judge should not take judicial cognizance of the fact that such child is incapable of performing valuable services.

(b) In cases of doubt as to whether a child of tender years is capable of performing valuable services, the court should submit the question of the ability of such child to perform valuable services to the jury for their determination under all the evidence submitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 60, 141; Dec. Dig. §§ 46, 103.*]

2. DEATH (§ 52*)—ACTION—PETITION—PARTICULARS.

The court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the petition, which seeks to recover for the funeral expenses, unless the plaintiff would file an amendment within 30 days from the date of the judgment, setting forth in detail the expenses incurred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 69; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

Fish, C. J., and Beck, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Meriwether County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Action by B. F. James against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. From an order sustaining a general demurrer in striking out portions of the petition, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Lawton Nalley, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. C. E. Battle and Howell Hollis, both of Columbus, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. B. F. James, hereinafter called the plaintiff, brought suit against the Central of Georgia Railway Company, hereinafter called the defendant, for the homicide of his minor child, alleged to be 2 years, 10 months, and 20 days old, which, he alleges, was negligently killed by one of the defendant's railway trains. It was alleged that the "son was a precocious child, capable of and did run errands for petitioner, was strong and robust, with unusual physical powers for a child of his age, and did render, and was capable of rendering, services to petitioner that were at the time worth five dollars per month, and said son's services would have become more valuable to petitioner as the said child lived out the remnant of his minority." It was further alleged that, by reason of the child being killed under the circumstances alleged in the petition, the "petitioner was put to the expense of one hundred and four dollars as funeral expenses." There were allegations of negligence, and of the circumstances of the homicide that need not here be set forth.

The defendant demurred generally and specially to so much of the petition as sought to recover for the loss of the child's services, on the ground that the child, by reason of its age, was incapable of rendering valuable services. A special demurrer attacked the general allegation that the funeral expenses were $104, and asked that the expenses be itemized. The court rendered the following judgment on the general and special demurrers: "It is considered, ordered, and adjudged that the general and special demurrers be and the same are hereby sustained to that portion of plaintiff's petition which seeks to recover for the loss of services of the plaintiff's child, and said portions of petition are hereby ordered stricken. But the general demurrer, directed to that portion of plaintiff's petition which seeks to recover for funeral expenses, is overruled, provided that the plaintiff shall, within 30 days, file an amendment, setting forth in detail the expenses incurred, in which event the demurrer to the seventh paragraph will also be overruled, in so far as said paragraph relates to funeral expenses. Otherwise said special demurrer will be sustained. The effect of this judgment is intended to deny to the plaintiff the right to proceed for the value of the loss of services of the child, but to proceed for the funeral expenses, upon proper amendment." The plaintiff failed to amend his petition in conformity to the judgment of the court, and brings the judgment of the trial court here for review.

[1] 1. The question to be determined here is: Shall we hold, as a matter of law, that a child lacking 41 days of being 3 years old, and who was alleged to be very precocious, and capable of rendering services worth $5 per month, was incapable of performing valuable services? or whether the question is so doubtful as that it should be remanded to the realm of facts for the jury to determine.

The determination of the question is not without difficulty. In the case of Southern Ry. Co. v. Covenia, 100 Ga. 46, 29 S. E. 219, 40 L. R. A. 253, 62 Am. St. Rep. 312, it was held, where a child one year, eight months, and ten days old was alleged to have been tortiously killed by the defendant company, that "the courts will take judicial cognizance of the fact that an infant of this age is incapable of rendering valuable services." It was also held in the same case that "the father of the child killed is entitled to recover the expenses necessarily and reasonably incurred in the burial of the child, including compensation for the loss of such time on the father's part as was needed for this purpose."

In the case of Atlanta, etc., Ry. Co. v. Arnold, 100 Ga. 566, 568, 28 S. E. 224, 225, this court, in an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice (now Chief Justice) Fish, said: "The reasons given by Chief Justice Simmons, in the opinion in the Covenia Case, for taking judicial cognizance of the fact that a child, less than two years old, is incapable of rendering 'such services as would authorize the parent to recover' for the loss of them are equally applicable in a case where the child, for whose death a recovery is sought, is alleged to have been between 2½ and 3 years of age." In the case last cited, the allegation was that "the child was between 2½ and 3 years of age." No definite age was given. The familiar rule, therefore, that the pleadings will be construed most strongly against the pleader was applicable; and it must be presumed that in that case the child was nearer 2½ years of age than otherwise. The decision from which the quotation is just made does not go to the extent of holding that a child of 3 years of age and under is incapable of rendering valuable services.

In the case of Crawford v. Southern Ry. Co., 106 Ga. 870, 33 S. E. 826, where suit was brought for the alleged negligent homicide of plaintiff's daughter 4½ years old, this court held: "The question whether a particular child of such age was capable of rendering any valuable service to its father should be left to a jury to determine in the light of the evidence submitted upon this point." And see Sugarman v. Atlanta, etc., Ry. Co., 94 Ga. 604, 21 S. E. 581. So it will be seen that this court has held that courts will take judicial cognizance of the fact that children 1½, and children about 2½ years old, are incapable of performing valuable services, and that their parents, on their being tortiously killed by a railroad company, cannot recover for loss of such services.

This court has also held (in the Crawford Case, supra), where a child 4½ years of age was killed by a railroad company, that the question whether a child of that age was capable of rendering any valuable services to its father should be left to a jury to determine in the light of the evidence submitted on this point.

Where, then, is the line of demarcation between the various ages of children at which a court can say, as a matter of law, that they cannot render valuable services? No fixed, arbitrary age ought to be established, except as a child's age remains near its birth. But as it gets farther and farther away, what should be the rule? No arbitrary or absolute rule ought to be laid down, and no definite age fixed. Children vary so in point of physical development, strength, energy, intelligence, and precociousness that no unvarying age limit should be fixed at which it can be said, as a matter of law, that a child cannot perform for its parent such valuable services as would entitle him to recover damages, in case of the tortious killing of the child.

We think the safer rule to be that, where the question of the ability of the child to perform valuable services is involved, and the court is doubtful, the jury should pass upon it. It is only in cases where it is beyond question that the child is so young that it cannot perform valuable services that the trial judge should so hold. But we cannot say in the present case, where the child is alleged to have been practically three years old, precocious, and able to perform services which, if rendered, were valuable, that they were not such as a matter of law. It was alleged in the petition that "said son was a precocious child, capable of and did run errands for petitioner, was strong and robust, with unusual physical powers for a child of his age, and did render, and was capable of rendering, services to petitioner that were at the time worth five dollars per month, and said services would have become more valuable to petitioner as the said child lived out the remnant of his minority." On demurrer, for the purposes of the argument, this must be taken to be true. It is true "that which is judicially known need not be proven," and that "judicial notice takes the place of proof, and is of equal force." See 31 Cyc. 387; Griffin v. Augusta & Knoxville Railroad, 72 Ga. 428 (2). But, while it is true that there is a point where the court can say a child cannot render valuable services, there must also be some line of demarcation where the court must stop short of saying the child cannot perform valuable services, and permit the jury to say, under all the evidence, whether the child is capable of rendering valuable services or not. And especially is this true where it is alleged that the child was precocious, and was capable of rendering, and did render, valuable services to its parent.

It is within the common knowledge that some children are more precocious than others, and can walk, talk, and develop their mental and physical powers at a much earlier age than others. The biographies of the great musicians and musical prodigies, as well as those of artists and scientists, and others, are well known to many readers. It is said of Beethoven that he could play upon the piano at 3 years of age, and at 12 presided at the chapel organ, and at 18 was a member of the orchestra at the court theater. Mozart, another of the world's greatest musicians, was being instructed in music at the age of 3, "and shared the harpsichord lessons of his sister, Maria, 5 years his senior," and at the age of 5 had composed some simple pieces of music. Encyclopædia Britannica (Mozart).

Robert Alexander Schumann was a composer at 7; and Louis Spohr could sing duets with his mother at 4 years of age, and play the violin at 5. Numerous instances will call themselves to mind where precocious children of tender years, in all walks of life, have shown very early capacity for performing, not only manual services, but rare mental efforts. Where the line should be drawn, no arbitrary rule can determine rightly. In this view, we think in doubtful cases, as already said, that the jury should be left to say, under all the evidence submitted, at what age a child of tender years is capable of performing such valuable services for the parent as would entitle the latter to recover for the loss of the same, in case the killing of the child is shown to be wrong and tortious.

[2] 2. The court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to that portion of the petition which sought to recover for the funeral expenses of the child, unless the plaintiff would file an amendment within 30 days from the date of the judgment, setting forth in detail the expenses incurred.

SAVANNAH GUANO CO. v. STUBBS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ARREST (§ 48*)—BAIL TROVER—"IMPRISONMENT."

A defendant in a bail trover proceeding, who is in the actual custody of the sheriff, though not confined in jail, is "held in imprisonment," and may apply, under the Civil Code, § 5154, for a discharge upon his own recognizance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arrest, Cent. Dig. §§ 112-114; Dec. Dig. § 48.*

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. WORDS AND PHRASES—"IMPRISONMENT."

Imprisonment is not confined to the act of putting a man in prison; nor is it necessary to constitute imprisonment that the confinement should be in a place usually appropriated to that purpose. It may be in a locality used only for the specific occasion; or it may take place without actual application of any physical agencies of restraint, such as locks or bars, as by verbal compulsion and the display of available force. Any restraint of a man's personal liberty constitutes "imprisonment."

Guano Company against M. J. Stubbs. Application by defendant for discharge on his own recognizance. From an order granting such relief, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Anderson, Cann & Cann, of Savannah, H. C. Beasley, of Reidsville, and Thos. F. Walsh, Jr., of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. P. M. Anderson, of Hagan, and H. H. Elders, of Reidsville, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The Savannah Guano Company brought an action of bail trover against M. J. Stubbs to recover certain described fertilizers and promissory notes. The sheriff made an entry that he had served personally the defendant, and demanded bond of him, which he failed to give because of his poverty, and that he had him in custody. The defendant applied to the court to be discharged on his own recognizance. The plaintiff pleaded in abatement that the defendant was not entitled to be discharged, for the reason that, neither at the time of his application, nor at any other time, had he been committed to jail, and there kept in safe and close custody, as required by law. The plaintiff also had the sheriff made a party, and traversed his entry of service that the defendant was in his custody. Upon the hearing of the issue joined on the plea and traverse, the applicant for discharge submitted evidence tending to show that he was arrested by the sheriff. He was not confined in jail, but put in the custody of a deputy sheriff, by whom he was kept under guard and surveillance from the time of his arrest until the trial of his application for a discharge from custody. The sheriff testified that the common jail of the county had two cells for male prisoners, which were occupied by seven negro prisoners, and two cells for female prisoners, one of which was occupied; and that he did not put the defendant in jail because of its condition. The jail was not ventilated; the waterworks were out of repair; and it was in no fit condition to confine a white man. The court overruled the traverse and plea in abatement, and, upon the defendant making it appear that it was not within his power to produce the property or give the statutory bond, he was discharged by the court.

[1] Upon a plaintiff in a trover suit filing an affidavit that the property is in the possession, custody, or control of the defendant, and that he has reason to apprehend that it will be eloiigned or moved away, or will not be forthcoming to answer the final judgment, it is the duty of the sheriff to seize the property; and, if the property is not to be found, "the defendant shall be committed to jail, to be kept in safe and close custody until the said personal property shall be produced, or until he shall enter into bond with good security for the eventual condemnation money." Civil Code, § 5152. When a defendant "shall, by reason of his inability to give security, be held in imprisonment, it shall be lawful for him to make his petition" to the judge of the court where the suit is pending, stating that he is neither able to produce the property nor to give the security required by law, traversing the facts stated in the plaintiff's affidavit, and giving satisfactory reasons why he cannot produce the property, and praying for his discharge. On a hearing, after five days' notice, if the judge "shall find that the petitioner can neither give the security nor produce the property, and that the reasons for its nonproduction are satisfactory, he shall discharge the petitioner upon his own recognizance, conditioned for his appearance to answer the suit; but otherwise he shall commit him to custody." Civil Code, § 5154. The point made by the record is whether a defendant against whom bail process has issued, and who is in the custody of the sheriff, but who is not detained in jail, comes within the provisions of the statute of which mention is just made.

The statute authorizing bail in trover cases, being in derogation of common right, should be strictly construed. Sugar v. Sackett, 13 Ga. 462. The object of the bail process is simply to secure the forthcoming of the property to answer, in the manner authorized by law, for such recovery as may be had, or to get bond and personal security instead. Hudson v. Goff, 77 Ga. 281, 3 S. E. 152. Its purpose is not to punish a defendant for illegal acts in obtaining the property. Ragan v. Chicago Packing Co., 93 Ga. 712, 21 S. E. 143. Indeed, the theory of punishment does not enter into the statute; for the law is not to be construed as imposing a punishment upon a defendant in a civil case upon an ex parte affidavit, without giving him a hearing. Prior to the statute (Civil Code, § 5154), the production of the property, or entering into bond with good security for the eventual condemnation money, was the only condition upon which the defendant could be discharged from custody. It was to ameliorate the harshness of the law in this respect that an imprisoned defendant, unable to produce the property or give the bond, was permitted to apply for a discharge. The remedy was given to a defendant "held in imprisonment."

[2] Imprisonment is not confined to the act of putting a man in prison; it is a restraint of a man's personal liberty. Says Mr. Black, in his Law Dictionary, at page 597: "It is not a necessary part of the definition that the confinement should be in a place usually appropriated to that purpose; it may be in a locality used only for the specific occasion; or it may take place without actual application of any physical agencies of restraint (such as locks or bars), but by verbal compulsion and the display of available force." It is true that when the statute was enacted the law provided for a commitment of the defendant to jail; but the remedial statute broadly extends its provision to a defendant "held in imprisonment." A defendant in the actual custody of the sheriff comes within the provision of the statute, whether the sheriff's custody be exercised by keeping him in jail, or under special guard out of jail. The question is, not whether the sheriff ought to have imprisoned the defendant in jail, instead of keeping him under surveillance and guard, but whether the defendant is restrained of his personal liberty. If he is so restrained, then he is imprisoned, in the purview of the statute. Everett v. Holcomb, 1 Ga. App. 794, 58 S. E. 287.

Of course, the restraint must be something more than a feigned custody—not a collusive arrangement between the officer and the defendant. The court was authorized to find, under the facts submitted, that the defendant was actually restrained of his liberty by the sheriff by virtue of the bail trover proceeding. The defendant testified that he was unable to produce the property or to give the bond; and this was not controverted on the trial. The judgment of the court, discharging him on his own recognizance, will therefore stand.

Affirmed. All the Justices concur.

MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF CITY OF MACON v. BIBB COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 10, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOSPITALS (§ 2*)—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY.

By virtue of the Civil Code 1910, §§ 1633, 1646, 1670, municipalities and counties are empowered to establish hospitals and pesthouses for persons afflicted with smallpox; the house established by the municipality being for the care and detention of those within the city limits, and the county pesthouse being for the care of those who reside in the county, but outside of the municipality. Where a municipality, instead of maintaining its own pesthouse, combines with the county for the treatment of its patients at the county's pesthouse, on the basis that the expense is to be apportioned between the municipality and the county according to the number of patients from the city and the county, the city will not be absolved from its obligation to pay its share of the expense, on the ground that the county's pesthouse is maintained by revenue derived from taxes laid upon residents of the entire county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Hospitals, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 2; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 232*)—INDEBTEDNESS—POWER TO CREATE.

Where a county, by written proposal, offers to receive, care for, and treat, at the county pesthouse, persons afflicted with smallpox, who are residents of the city, upon the basis that all expenses connected with the operation of the county pesthouse shall be apportioned between the city and county according to the number of inmates coming from the city and county, and the city shall pay its share monthly, and that the arrangement is to be terminable on 80 days' notice by either party, which proposition is accepted by the city, and where the city in subsequent years, during the pendency of the arrangement, sends smallpox patients to the county pesthouse, which patients are cared for according to the terms named in the county's proposal, the city will not be relieved from the payment of its proportionate expense, on the ground that the arrangement of the city and county to combine the pesthouses is void, because, as it is contended, its effect is to create a debt extending beyond the current year, and to bind the successors in office of the city.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Action by Bibb County against the Mayor and Council of City of Macon. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Lane & Park, of Macon, for plaintiffs in error. W. G. Smith and Harris & Harris, all of Macon, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The action is by Bibb county against the mayor and council of the city of Macon to recover of the city its pro rata expense of the county smallpox hospital, while jointly used by the city while under a contract with the county. The exception is to the overruling of the city's demurrer.

It appeared from the petition that on December 21, 1903, the mayor of the city of Macon addressed a communication to the board of county commissioners, suggesting a plan for a common pesthouse for the treatment of smallpox. A committee was also appointed by the mayor and council of the city of Macon, for the purpose of effecting some arrangement with the county authorities for the admission of white persons afflicted with smallpox from the city to the county pesthouse. A conference followed, and as a result the following proposition was submitted by the county authorities to the city: "Whereas the mayor and a committee of the city council of the city of Macon, in company with a committee of the board of health of the city of Macon, this day came before the board and suggested, in the interest of economy, that some arrangement be entered into between the city of Macon and the county of Bibb, whereby the city could secure the use and benefit of the county smallpox hospital for the white patients and suspects of the city, and thereby avoid subjecting the city to the expense of establishing a separate smallpox hospital for the exclusive use of the white patients of the city: Ordered, that such suggestion be approved; and this board agrees and hereby offers to admit to the county smallpox hospital all white patients and suspects of the city sent there by proper city authorities, upon the understanding and contract that all the expenses connected with the operation of the county smallpox hospital, including expenses for enlargement or addition thereto, as long as the same used thus jointly by the city and county authorities, shall be prorated between the city and county in proportion to the relative number of inmates sent there by the city and county authorities respectively, the city to pay the county each month, or on demand, its proportion of said expenses thus prorated; provided, that this arrangement shall not go into effect until this offer is formally accepted by the city authorities, and it may at any time be terminated by either party on thirty days' written notice to the other party; provided further, that the acceptance of this offer shall not in any manner affect any other obligations and liabilities now existing between said parties; provided further, that so long as Dr. Gibson, the county physician, is paid, as at present, by the city for looking after smallpox cases, his salary shall not be included in the expense to be prorated between the city and the county as above specified."

The mayor and council of the city of Macon accepted the proposition on February 3, 1904. The county's proposition and the city's acceptance were duly entered upon the minutes of the city and of the county board. Pursuant to this arrangement, the city proceeded to send all of its smallpox cases to the county hospital, and the county received, treated, and provided for them. The city destroyed its own smallpox hospital, and sent all of its smallpox patients to the county hospital. Upon the faith of and pursuant to the contract or agreement between the city and county authorities, the county admitted to the smallpox hospital 169 smallpox patients in the year 1909, and 252 smallpox patients in the year 1910, sent there by the city, and treated and provided for them according to the agreement, whereby the city became indebted to the county in the sum of $1,050.36 for the year 1909 and $2,088.84 for the year 1910, as set out in detail in the attached exhibits to the petition. The city paid for patients previously sent to the county hospital; and the county, until the city's refusal to pay the amount sued for, had no notice that the city desired to terminate the agreement, or that the city did not recognize the agreement as a subsisting contract, or that the city would refuse to pay the bill which is the basis of the suit.

[1] 1. It is urged by demurrer that, inasmuch as the county revenue is derived from taxation of property within the county of Bibb, which includes the city of Macon, it is as much a part of the duty of the board of county commissioners to treat and care for patients afflicted with smallpox, and who live within the corporate limits of the city of Macon, as it was and is their duty to care for similar cases within the county, but outside the limits of the city of Macon. It is well settled that the state, in the exercise of the police power for the preservation of the public health, has the right to select such agency or agencies as it may deem best for that purpose. 1 Abbott on Municipal Corporations, § 119. The duty of supervision may be delegated to boards of health or other agencies. It can hardly be disputed that the state may give plenary jurisdiction in matters of health and quarantine to a city within its jurisdictional limits, and to the county within its limits, exclusive of the municipal territory. A sanitary district may territorially coincide with a taxing district, or a taxing district may include more than one sanitary district. It is a well-known fact that because of the denseness of urban population the susceptibility to, as well as the fatality of, contagious disease is greater in a city than in sparsely settled rural communities. The city is to be protected from contagion, both from within and without its own limits. The benefits accruing from this protection largely preponderate with the city. The Legislature, in appreciation of this fact, for the common good of all, may empower the county to maintain a hospital for smallpox patients out of the general revenues of the county, and that the city maintain a hospital for the treatment of its own afflicted inhabitants, and at its own expense. As residents of a city receive benefits from, and exercise privileges under, both municipal and county governments, they can be required to contribute by taxation to the support of both. Upon this principle it has been held that, though the residents of a city are taxed to keep the streets of the city in repair, they may also be made liable for a tax to keep in repair the county roads outside of the city. Wolfe v. McHargue, 88 Ky. 251, 10 S. W. 809; Byram v. Board of Commissioners, 145 Ind. 240, 44 N. E. 357, 33 L. R. A. 476.

It is clear that the Legislature contemplated that outside of any municipality the county authorities were to be in control of the smallpox situation, and that the city should look after its own problem. The city authorities thought it would be less expensive to co-operate with the county than to maintain its own separate hospital, and entered into an agreement to that effect. Having the power to erect and maintain its own hospital, the city possessed the power to contract with the county for the joint use of its hospital. Under similar statutory conditions, the Court of Appeals of Kentucky held that, where a city and county combined for the treatment of persons within the county afflicted with smallpox, they were both responsible for the expense, the city for that incurred in treating those so afflicted within the city limits, and the county for that incurred in treating those so afflicted without the city. Pulaski County v. City of Somerset (Ky.) 98 S. W. 1022.

[2] 2. It is further urged that the arrangement between the city and county authorities was invalid as a contract, because it amounted to the creation of a debt. While the resolution of the board of county commissioners and the acceptance of the proposal therein contained by the municipal authorities is called a contract in the petition, it is not strictly such, because the city does not undertake to send any or all of its patients to the county hospital.

It is more of an arrangement in the nature of a working basis between the authorities of the two sanitary districts—a sort of modus vivendi until the authorities decide to establish separate pesthouses. It does not undertake to bind the city from establishing its own pesthouse; nor does it require the city to send its patients to the county pesthouse. It amounts to a continuing offer by the county, until terminated by notice, that it will accept, treat, and provide for the city's smallpox patients on a co-operative plan, with a division of the expenses, proportioned according to the number of patients received from the city and from the county. When the city sent its patients to the county hospital, pending this continuing offer, the county, in the absence of notice to the contrary, might well assume that the patients were sent by virtue of this arrangement; and it should receive compensation for their treatment, as provided in the resolution.

PARKER v. STATE. (No. 4,131.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 5, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SEDUCTION (§ 43*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

On the trial of one accused of the offense of seduction, it is competent for the state to show (as a circumstance evidencing the existence of an engagement to marry) that the female alleged to have been seduced made preparations for her marriage, and sent out invitations to the wedding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Seduction, Cent. Dig. § 77; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

2. SEDUCTION (§ 40*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The fact that the female alleged to have been seduced has a living child, as well as the fact that the accused endeavored to induce her to take medicine for the purpose of causing an abortion, while in themselves not sufficient to prove seduction, are both circumstances competent for the purpose of proving that the accused had carnal intercourse with her, which is an essential ingredient of the offense of seduction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Seduction, Cent. Dig. §§ 72, 79; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 846*)—CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1153*)—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS—WRIT OF ERROR—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

As illustrating the interest and credibility of a witness, and for the purpose of impeachment, it is competent to show that the witness made an effort to improperly influence and suborn another witness in the case. It is not error for a trial judge to permit a witness to be interrogated as to any matter pertinent to the issue, although the question sought to be asked, or the answer thereto, either or both, may be prejudicial, when counsel who seeks to ask the question states in his place that he expects to prove the fact which his question seeks to elicit. The issue as to whether a question is asked without a bona fide expectation of receiving the answer apparently expected, and merely for the purpose of prejudicing the opposite party before the jury, or whether the question is asked in good faith, must in every case be left to the discretion of the trial judge, and this discretion will not be controlled, unless it is manifestly abused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1133; Dec. Dig. § 846.* Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3061-3066; Dec. Dig. § 1153.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 757*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSIDERATION OF EVIDENCE.

Where the presence of a witness in a criminal case is waived, and it is agreed, with the approval of the court, that the contents of an affidavit, previously given by the witness, be used, instead of his oral testimony, the statements in the affidavit must be considered by the jury just as if they had been delivered by the witness from the stand, and cannot be capriciously rejected, either in whole or in part. Where the presence of a witness is waived, and it is agreed that his testimony shall be taken by affidavit, the jury should consider the testimony just as if the witness had orally testified in their presence, and believe him, unless he was impeached or discredited by other testimony. Consequently it was error for the court to charge, as to the contents of such an affidavit: "You may believe as much of it as you please, or as little of it as you please."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1772-1785; Dec. Dig. § 757.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 723*)—TRIAL—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

In a trial for seduction, the maintenance and education of a child which may have been the result of the illicit connection is not involved, nor is its legitimacy affected by the verdict in the case. The prosecution for seduction is for the punishment of a public wrong, and not for redress of a private injury. It was error, therefore, for the court to allow the Solicitor General, over the objections of the accused, to urge that the defendant should be convicted of seduction, in order that the child might have a legitimate father, and because the female alleged to have been seduced, and who would have to raise and maintain the child, should be protected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1676; Dec. Dig. § 723.*]

Error from Superior Court, Dekalb County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

C. B. Parker was convicted of seduction, and brings error. Reversed.

John W. Moore and J. E. & L. F. McOlelland, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. C. S. Reid, Sol. Gen., of Palmetto, Wm. Schley Howard, of Atlanta, and L. J. Steele, of Decatur, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of seduction, and excepts to the judgment overruling his motion for new trial. As the case turns upon some of the special assignments of error, we shall express no opinion upon the testimony. It suffices to say that the evidence warranted the conviction of the accused and the sentence imposed upon him. But, though the defendant be accused of a most horrible crime (and than one guilty of seduction we can imagine no fouler criminal), he is entitled to a fair and impartial trial, according to the rules of the law, and the just resentment and passion which is necessarily aroused by the very character of the charge should not be permitted to be inflamed so as to prejudice the rights of the accused, or place upon him a burden which the law does not impose.

We are clear that as to most of the exceptions there was no error. There was none in the admission of the testimony of which complaint was made, nor in the ruling upon the question which the Solicitor General was permitted to ask. But we think that in charging the jury the learned trial judge, inadvertently perhaps, deprecated the most vitally important testimony which was at the defendant's command, and that he perhaps underestimated the effect of the language used in the concluding argument of the state's counsel, which submitted to the jury issues foreign to the charge at bar, but the suggestion of which was manifestly calculated to weigh heavily against the accused.

[1, 2] 1, 2. The first and second headnotes are self-explanatory.

[3] 3. It is alleged in the fourth ground of the motion for a new trial that the Solicitor General asked G. E. Lanier: "Didn't you go to Mr. Lee Cheek's with your brother on Sunday before this case was tried the last time, and didn't you or your brother pull out money in the presence of Mr. Cheek and offer it to him, and say to him that you would pay him money if he would go to Decatur on Tuesday and swear that Miss Tedder's character was bad? Didn't Mr. Cheek tell you that he was not the man that could be bought to swear a lie? Did you not try to get Mr. Hand to go to Decatur and swear against this young lady?" The movant objected to all of these questions at the time, and assigns same as error. He contended then as follows:

"By Mr. McClelland, Counsel for the Defendant: My objection is this. He proposes to ask this witness, in the presence of the jury, if he did not go to Mr. Lee Cheek's house before the last trial and offer him some money. He is not going to try and make any proof of that, but he is merely going to ask that question so as to discredit the witness before the jury. I object to his asking that question unless he is going to prove that.

"By the Court: Do you expect to prove that by Mr. Cheek?

"By Mr. Howard: Yes; I expect to show that they came up there on Sunday evening and made this offer."

The court then allowed the solicitor, in the presence of the jury, to ask the questions above set out, to all of which the witness answered "No."

Of course, if the Solicitor General was asking these questions merely for the purpose of discrediting the witness, without any bona fide intention of proving the facts to which he referred, simply hoping to leave a trail of indefinable prejudice in the minds of the jury after they had retired to their room, his conduct would have been most reprehensible. But neither the trial court nor this court can lightly assume that a member of the bar of undoubted standing in his profession would be guilty of such practice. The trial judge relied upon the statement that the facts which were the subject-matter of the discussion would be established during the course of the trial, or at least that the counsel expected to prove the facts to which he referred by his question, and his ruling, permitting the question to be asked, was based upon this assumption. We have no doubt that the fact that witnesses were not introduced to testify upon the point was due to oversight. But, in any event, when the issue of good faith is raised under such circumstances as those presented by this record, it must be determined by the trial judge in the exercise of his discretion, and that discretion will not be interfered with, unless it is perfectly plain that there was an abuse of discretion.

[4] 4. In the fifth ground of the amended motion for new trial error is assigned upon the instruction of the judge as to the affidavit of one Tuggle, who was not present at the trial, but whose testimony was submitted, by agreement, in the form of an affidavit which he had previously made. In view of the legal requirement that witnesses in criminal cases shall testify orally and in the presence of the defendant, and the fact that exceptions to the enforcement of this rule are extremely rare, it can readily be seen that the reference of the judge to the affiant Tuggle by name would naturally arrest and fix the attention of the jury upon him, and made it even more than usually important that any instruction with reference to his testimony should be free from error. We have often wondered if too much importance were not sometimes attached to the precise verbiage employed by the trial judges in instructions to juries, and if expressions were not considered harmful which perhaps the jury did not even remember after they had retired to consider their verdict. There can be no doubt that, when the judge puts his instructions in abstract terms, the effect of nice verbal criticism is greatly minimized. But when the judge calls a witness by name, and especially when, as in this case, he is the only one whose testimony was submitted in his absence and by affidavit, it can, we think, be safely assumed that the jury not only heard, but remembered, what was said about this particular witness, and therefore, if the instructions were erroneous, the result would be necessarily and unquestionably harmful to the accused. In the present case the judge charged as follows: "In criminal cases, each and every witness has to testify before the jury in person. They cannot be examined by interrogatories as in civil cases, unless it is by agreement, but in criminal cases every witness must testify in the presence of the jury, so that the jury may look at them when they testify, unless it is agreed to the contrary, and see their manner of testifying, their manner when being examined or cross-examined, their deportment upon the stand, and all about it. You have seen all of the witnesses and looked at each witness, let it be man or woman, male or female, as the case may be. They have all been before you except one witness, whose affidavit has been read to you, and it was agreed between the counsel for the state and defendant that this witness, Tuggle, would have testified that way if he had been here and had been sworn and put on the stand, and you would consider it just as if he had testified it on the stand, because that is agreed upon. You may believe as much of it as you please, or as little of it as you please, and deal with it as if he had come here in person and testified. It is for you, gentlemen, to say how much of each witness' testimony you will believe. You are to weigh all the testimony, examine it, and from it glean what you believe to be the truth." A portion of this instruction, if considered apart from its context, is unobjectionable, but, when the instruction is considered as a whole, the jury were told in terms they could not misunderstand that they might believe as much of Tuggle's testimony as they pleased, or as little of it as they pleased. Of course, the jury could not thus captiously dispose of the testimony of any witness. And as the judge had referred in the same connection to the fact that witnesses usually appeared upon the stand, and that the jury could test their credibility by their manner of testimony, their manner upon examination and cross-examination, and their deportment upon the stand, and then to the fact that Tuggle was absent and his testimony by affidavit had only been admitted by agreement, the jury may have thought that this depreciation of Tuggle's testimony was due to the fact that he was not present, and they had not had the opportunity of seeing and judging him by his appearance and manner. It cannot be denied that the effect of the charge greatly depreciated the testimony of the witness, and in any case this error requires the grant of a new trial. In the present case the error was particularly harmful, for, if the testimony of Tuggle was to be believed, the defendant did not commit the offense of seduction, because the prosecutrix had fallen from virtue before Parker had sexual intercourse with her. We have no doubt that the error of the learned judge was due to mere inadvertence, but it was not corrected in any portion of his instructions, and the effect of the words used is so unmistakable that it could not fail to influence the jury, and demands the grant of a new trial.

[5] 5. The sixth ground of the motion for new trial assigns error upon the argument of the Solicitor General, which was permitted by the court over objection of defendant's counsel. The defendant moved for a mistrial, but this motion was overruled by the court, without even any instruction to the jury that they should not consider the objectionable argument. The Solicitor General argued as follows: "Miss Tedder is the mother of a three year old child. Parker is its daddy. By turning him loose he goes 'Scot free,' and she will have the care of raising and maintaining this outcast. It is your duty to protect this woman, and as well see that this child has a legitimate father." We do not think that the court was required to order a mistrial, but the argument was improper, and the court should have so told the jury, and have withdrawn it from their consideration. In a trial for seduction the maintenance and education of a child, which may have been the result of illicit connection, is not involved, nor is its legitimacy affected by the verdict in the case. The prosecution for seduction is for the punishment of a public wrong, and not for redress of a private injury. It was error, therefore, for the court to allow the Solicitor General, over the objection of the accused, to urge that the defendant should be convicted of seduction, in order that the child might have a legitimate father, and because the female alleged to have been seduced, and who would have to raise and maintain the child, should be protected.

Judgment reversed.

SALES (§ 360*)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT—RE-SALE.

Where one who has entered into a binding agreement to take and pay for goods to be delivered in the future notifies the seller, before the time fixed for delivery, that he will not receive and pay for the goods, if tendered at that time, the seller may treat the contract as rescinded and sue for whatever damages he has sustained at the time the purchaser repudiated the contract. But this is not the exclusive remedy of the seller. He may refuse to agree to a rescission of the contract, and may treat it as continuing until the time arrives for performance; and if, at that time, the purchaser refuses to take and pay for the goods, after they are tendered to him in accordance with the terms of the contract, the seller may, under the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 4131, after notice to the purchaser, resell the goods at the place of delivery, acting for this purpose as the agent of the vendee, and recover the difference between the contract price and the price on resale.

Action by the St. Louis Grain Company against the Southern Flour & Grain Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Walter McElreath, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey & Shelton, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. This was an action brought by a seller of goods to recover from the purchaser damages for refusing to take and pay for the goods. The seller claimed that the measure of damages was the difference between the contract price and the price realized from the resale of the goods at the place of delivery, under the provisions of the Civil Code of 1910, § 4131. The seller recovered a verdict and the purchaser is complaining in this court of a judgment overruling his motion for new trial.

It appears that, before the time arrived for the delivery of the goods, the purchaser countermanded the order, thus making an anticipatory breach of the contract. It is contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that the exclusive remedy of the seller was to bring an action for the damages which he had sustained up to the date notice was given to the seller that the purchaser would refuse to take and pay for the goods. In other words, his position is that, where one party breaks a contract, it is the duty of the other party to lessen the damages; and that under this principle the seller, upon receiving the notice, was bound to treat the contract as ended and sue for whatever damages he had sustained. Counsel for plaintiff in error insists that the special remedy provided by section 4131, supra, where the seller is given the right to resell the property and recover the difference between the contract price and the price on resale, if the latter be less than the contract price, is not applicable where there has been an anticipatory breach of the contract of sale.

The rule is well settled that in such a case the exclusive remedy of the seller is an action for damages and that he cannot sue for the full amount of the purchase price. Linder v. Cole Bros. Co., 10 Ga. App. 102, 72 S. E. 719, and cases cited. In this case the seller did not sue for the purchase price, but his action was for damages for breach of the contract. The general rule is that the seller is entitled to recover the difference between the contract price and the market value at the time and place of delivery; and, under the terms of the Code section, he may conclude the purchaser on the question of market value by reselling the property after notice to the purchaser. Where there has been an anticipatory breach of an executory contract of sale, the seller has a right to treat the contract as ended, and immediately sue for damages; but he is not bound to do this. The purchaser alone cannot rescind. Rescission can only be brought about by mutual agreement of the parties. If notice is given to the seller that the purchaser will not take and pay for the goods at the time and place of delivery, and the seller assents to this breach, then the contract is rescinded, and the seller will be remitted to whatever rights and remedies he had as of the date on which the breach by the purchaser is made. But if the seller refuses to assent to the attempted rescission of the contract by the purchaser, he has the right to wait until the time for performance, and then tender the goods to the purchaser. A mere statement by a purchaser that when time for performance arrives he will not perform is not binding even upon him, unless the statement is immediately acted upon by the seller. The purchaser may reconsider. Such a notice is nothing more than an invitation to the seller to agree to a rescission. If the seller refuses to agree, the purchaser may still take the goods and comply with his part of the contract. The seller is not bound to assume that when the time for performance arrives the purchaser will refuse to comply, notwithstanding the latter may have notified the seller that he would refuse. The locus poenitentiae, so to speak, remains with the purchaser until after the time has arrived for performance on his part.

These considerations clearly result from decisions of the Supreme Court in the following cases: Smith v. Georgia Loan Co., 113 Ga. 975, 39 S. E. 416; Ford v. Lawson, 133 Ga. 237 (5), 65 S. E. 444; Byrd Printing Co. v. Whitaker Co., 135 Ga. 865, 70 S. E. 798, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 182. There is nothing to the contrary in Oklahoma Vinegar Co. v. Carter, 116 Ga. 140, 42 S. E. 378, 59 L. R. A. 122, 94 Am. St. Rep. 112. Indeed, the reasoning of Mr. Justice Little, in the opinion in that case, clearly supports the view above announced. An anticipatory breach was committed in that case. The plaintiff sought to pursue the special remedy provided by the Civil Code of 1910, § 4131, whereby the seller is given the right to store and retain the goods for the benefit of the buyer and recover the full amount of the purchase price. The court held that that remedy was not available in that case, simply because it appeared that the plaintiff had not stored and retained the goods. As was said in the opinion: "Had it done so, it might have brought an action against the buyers for the entire price of the goods." Here the seller adopted the other remedy provided by this section of the Code, and resold the goods after notice to the purchaser. This fixed the measure of the plaintiff's damages, and was conclusive upon the purchaser that the price realized at the resale was the market value of the goods at the time and place of delivery. See, also, Rounsaville v. Leonard Mfg. Co., 127 Ga. 735, 56 S. E. 1030; Black Co. v. Kaplan, 9 Ga. App. 811, 72 S. E. 803; Georgia Agricultural Works v. Price, 11 Ga. App. 80, 74 S. E. 718.

JUDGMENTS OPERATING AS BAR.

The subject-matter of the cause of action upon which this suit was brought in the city court was involved in and concluded by the judgment rendered in the suit previously brought in the superior court.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; W. H. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Glausier, Watson & Co. against E. R. Whaley and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

J. H. Merrill, of Thomasville, and R. J. Bacon, of Albany, for plaintiffs in error. Snodgrass & MacIntyre, of Thomasville, for defendants in error.

POTTLE, J. Suit was brought against Whaley and Myrick, as surviving partners of a partnership known as the Boston Naval Stores Company, alleged to have been composed of Whaley, Myrick, and Mallette, the last of whom was not in life at the time the suit was brought, and his legal representatives were made parties to the action. The petition alleges that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiffs upon a check which had been executed by the Boston Naval Stores Company and delivered to the plaintiffs upon a valuable consideration. The defendants pleaded that in a former suit in the superior court between the same parties, and involving the same subject-matter, a judgment had been rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, and that such judgment was a full and final adjudication of the claim and cause of action now sued on. The suit referred to as having been brought in the superior court was in behalf of these plaintiffs and against the Boston Naval Stores Company and L. F. Driver. The petition alleged that the plaintiffs had sold to the Boston Naval Stores Company a turpentine plantation for the sum of $17,000, and that $100 of the purchase price had been paid in cash, and that a "check for one hundred ($100) dollars was given as a part payment, then and there, on said business, which was signed by Boston Naval Stores Company, per E. R. Whaley, was accepted as one hundred ($100) dollars cash, and was received in part payment." It is further alleged that the Boston Naval Stores Company operated the business for five days, shipped the products in the name of the company, and never paid the remainder of the purchase price, to wit, $16,900; that it refused to pay the check, and that the same came back with "payment stopped" written thereon, this being the reason for nonpayment; that the said company abandoned said business and said assets, broke said contract of sale, and left the assets in a demoralized condition as to value, in that they were not worth more than $11,000.

The petition further alleged that L. F. Driver was not a partner in the Naval Stores Company at the time of the bringing of the suit, but was to have an interest in the firm, in consideration of his services in looking up the location; that he had his name placed in the contract of sale to protect him; and that the contract was closed and the sale made with the Boston Naval Stores Company and Driver. The petition alleged that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the sum of $6,000 for breach of contract, by reason of the acts of the Boston Naval Stores Company and the members composing that firm and L. F. Driver. It was further alleged that the name of L. F. Driver in the contract was a mistake of the scrivener and a mutual mistake of the parties; the intent being that the contract should be with the Boston Naval Stores Company alone. The petition prayed for reformation of the contract. By an amendment to the petition, the plaintiffs alleged that Driver was a party to the case, and that defendants contend now in open court that he was a party to the contract of sale, and is equally bound with the Boston Naval Stores Company, and ask for a nonsuit on that ground; that the contract shows that Driver is so bound, and plaintiffs show that under the evidence adduced on the trial he is bound, and this amendment is offered that the petition may correspond with the proof and show liability on the part of Driver. The plaintiffs prayed for a judgment against Driver and the Boston Naval Stores Company. The suit resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for $1,250 against the Boston Naval Stores Company, E. M. Myrick, E. R. Whaley, and L. F. Driver, the amount of which was subsequently paid by the defendants. At the conclusion of this evidence, the trial judge rendered judgment against the plaintiffs and in favor of the defendants, and to this judgment exception has been duly taken by the plaintiffs.

If the former suit brought in the superior court involved the $100 now being sued for, and if, under a proper construction of the petition in that case, a recovery was or might have been had in favor of the plaintiffs for the $100 being sued for, the judgment in the superior court is conclusive, and operates as a bar to any further suit on the check. The suit was against the Boston Naval Stores Company and L. F. Driver. The check was given by the Boston Naval Stores Company alone; but by the amendment in the suit for breach of contract it was alleged that Driver was a party to the contract of sale and "equally bound with the Boston Naval Stores Company." If this was true, Driver was liable to that company for his pro rata of $100. The check was received as cash, and is therefore to be treated for all purposes as so much cash paid. While paid by the Naval Stores Company alone, it was paid for the benefit of that company and Driver. This being so, the cash payment of $100 either was or could have been taken account of in the verdict in that suit. It cannot be ascertained with certainty whether the verdict of $1,250 included the $100 which had been paid on the purchase price; but it probably did, because the plaintiffs prayed to recover the full difference between the agreed price and the market value, making no deduction for the $100. Taking the allegations and the prayer altogether, it was the evident purpose of the parties in the first suit to fix their liability on account of the alleged breach of the contract of sale, and the plaintiffs were manifestly seeking to recover a verdict which should represent the full measure of the defendants' liability by reason of the breach. This was the difference between the agreed price and the market value, and the presumption is that the jury made due allowance for the $100 which had been paid. But whether they did or not, under the pleadings and the evidence, they might have done so. This being so, the verdict and judgment in the first suit fixed the measure of the plaintiffs' right of recovery, and they were not entitled to recover upon the check.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAMS et al. v. STATE. (No. 4,264.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence in this case was sufficient to rebut the presumption that the fire was accidental, and to raise a reasonable inference that it was due to criminal agency.

2. ARSON (§ 37*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence was sufficient to show that the accused burned the house described in the indictment. It showed motive or ill will towards the owner of the house, flight from the house in the middle of the night, taking goods contained in the house, incriminatory statements made during their flight, indicating guilty knowledge and expectation of the appearance of a fire, which had been kindled just before leaving the house, and other circumstances, sufficient to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than that of guilt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arson, Cent. Dig. §§ 71-73; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

3. ARSON (§ 37*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The allegation in the indictment, descriptive of the house that was maliciously set fire to and burned, that it was "an occupied dwelling house," is sufficiently proved by evidence that the accused (four persons) lived in the house prior to and up to the night in which it was burned; and that immediately upon setting fire to the house they fled therefrom.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 23, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. LARCENY (§ 77)—INSTRUCTIONS—RECENT POSSESSION OF PROPERTY.

In a prosecution for simple larceny, the evidence tended to show that recently after the offense was committed the stolen property was found in the house where the accused lived with others. It was not shown that the accused had exclusive possession, either of the stolen property or of the house where the property was found. It was error, therefore, for the trial judge to charge as follows: "If you find the offense alleged in the indictment was committed by some one, and that after the commission of the offense, or at the time of the commission of the offense, the goods, or some portion of them, were found in the recent possession of any one, such possession, unless explained to the satisfaction of the jury, is a circumstance which the jury may consider in determining the guilt or innocence of the accused." The fact that the eggs (the property stolen) were found in the possession of some one, and that this possession was not explained to the satisfaction of the jury, does not raise any inference that the accused was the thief. This inference arises only when the evidence shows recent possession in the accused, not explained to the satisfaction of the jury.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 785*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

It is erroneous to charge the jury, in effect, that, if they cannot reconcile the testimony of the witnesses so as not to impute perjury to any one, they would have the right to believe the witness who had the best opportunity to know the facts testified to by him, without adding the qualification that the witnesses should be of equal credibility. *Lawrence v. Error from City Court of Carrollton; James Beall, Judge.

Esmer Cumby was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors, and brings error. Affirmed.

Buford Boykin, W. Smith, and S. C. Boykin, all of Carrollton, for plaintiff in error. C. E. Roop, Sol., of Carrollton, for the State.

POTTLE, J. [1] Cumby was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors. During the trial, while a witness for the defendant was on the stand, he was asked by the solicitor whether a mule which had been referred to in the testimony was in a stable. The witness answered, "In the lot." The solicitor then repeated the question, and received the same answer. The solicitor again twice repeated the same question, and each time received the same answer. Counsel for the defendant objected to further questions of the same nature, upon the ground that the witness had already intelligently answered the question. The court overruled the objection, and permitted the same question to be again put, and the same answer was again given by the witness. Thereupon the court "became a little angry with the witness and said: 'Look here, you have got to answer that question. You can understand. You have sense.'" The witness again answered that the mule was in the lot, whereupon the court said: "Look here, I will have to send you to jail. Mr. Sheriff, you will have to take this boy to jail. Now, was the mule in the lot or in the stable?" The witness again answered that the mule was in the lot, and explained that the stable was not inclosed in the lot fence. In the bill of exceptions, which is certified to be true by the trial judge, it is recited that the last remark was made to the witness by the court in a very angry manner, and that the court was requested to withdraw the case from the jury and declare a mistrial. It is not quite clear from the record what information the court was seeking to elicit from the witness. He seems to have answered the question fairly and intelligently each time it was put to him, and upon the record as presented to this court the conduct of the trial judge was improper. It is improper, and often prejudicial to the rights of a party litigant, for the trial judge, by his manner and statements, to discredit a party's witness or minimize the importance of his testimony. In a close case such prejudicial conduct on the part of the trial judge would necessitate a new trial. It will not have this result in the present case, because the defendant is clearly guilty under the evidence, and the testimony about which the exception arose seems to be entirely immaterial to any issue involved in the case. The defendant was charged with having sold a pint of whisky, and it is not apparent how the question as to whether the mule was in the lot or in the stable could elucidate this issue.

[2] A technical case of guilt was made out by the defendant, even by his own witness whom it is claimed the court discredited. The state's witness testified that he bought a half pint of whisky from the accused. It is inferable from the testimony of the defendant's witness that the state's witness sold the whisky to the accused, and afterwards bought it back from him. If that be the truth, the defendant is just as guilty as if he had sold the whisky to the state's witness in the first instance. The statement of the accused accorded with the testimony of his witness, and it is thus apparent that both the evidence and the statement demanded his conviction.

1. INSURANCE (§ 767*)—INSURABLE INTEREST—NECESSITY.

"While a valid contract of insurance cannot lawfully be taken on the life of another by one who has no insurable interest therein, because it contravenes public policy, yet, as one has an insurable interest in his own life, he may lawfully procure insurance thereon for the benefit of any other person whose interest he desires to promote. Such a contract cannot be defeated because of the want of insurable interest in the beneficiary, when it appears that the person whose life was insured acted for himself, at his own expense and in good faith, to promote the interest of the beneficiary, in taking out the policy. A contract so entered into is in no sense a wagering or speculative one."

2. INSURANCE (§ 818*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—PARTIES.

It appearing from the allegations of the petition that the right of action upon the policy sued on was in one other than the legal representative of the insured, the court did not err in sustaining a general demurrer to the petition, without reference to whether a temporary administrator is a legal representative, within the meaning of that term as used in the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1994; Dec. Dig. § 813.*]

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by Frank Cain, administrator, against the Knights of Pythias of North and South America, etc. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Oliver & Oliver, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. F. B. Pettie, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. Cain, as temporary administrator upon the estate of Johnson, brought suit against the Knights of Pythias of North and South America, Europe, Asia, Africa, and Australia to recover a certain amount alleged to be due the estate of the deceased on an insurance policy which had been issued to the deceased.

The petition alleged that the proceeds of the policy were made payable to one Eliza Cunningham, who was named in the policy as Eliza Johnson, alleged to be the wife of the insured; but she was not in fact his wife, and this was known to the insurer, and it is acquainted with the fact that she is not the wife of the insured, and not entitled to the proceeds of the policy. For this reason, petitioner alleges that the proceeds of the policy are due to him as administrator on the estate of the deceased. Attached to the petition and made a part thereof was a copy of the benefit certificate issued to the deceased. Its provisions, so far as material, are as follows: "Under the following expressed conditions, stipulations, and agreements now existing or that may hereafter be enacted by the grand lodge, [it] will pay to Eliza Cunningham, wife, heirs or legal representative of such heir or heirs, at the death of [the insured], an endowment of not less than fifty dollars, nor more than three hundred and fifty dollars, being the total amount under this policy; provided that [the insured] shall have complied with all the laws and regulations of the grand and subordinate lodges" which follow. The conditions were that the insured be, at the time of his death, a member in good standing; that the policy shall not have been assigned, transferred, or hypothecated to any person before the death of the insured; that the policy shall not be assigned, transferred, or hypothecated after the death of the insured, by his widow or legal representatives, or such heir or heirs, without the consent of the grand lodge; that if the policy shall have been assigned, transferred, or hypothecated by the insured prior to his death, or by his widow, heirs, or legal representatives of such heir or heirs after the death of the insured, without the consent of the grand lodge, then the policy shall become void, and all rights and benefits arising from the same shall cease and terminate forever; that upon a faithful compliance with the foregoing stipulations and laws of the endowment bureau and subordinate lodge, and upon satisfactory proof of the death of the insured, the endowment bureau will pay, "as above expressed," according to a certain tabulated statement set forth in the certificate. The trial judge sustained a general demurrer to the petition, holding that the plaintiff was not a legal representative, within the meaning of that term as used in the benefit certificate, and was therefore not entitled to bring the action.

[2] Counsel for the plaintiff in error state in their brief that the sole question before the court is: "Has the temporary administrator authority, under the law, to collect the proceeds of this policy, and is he within the contemplation of the term 'legal representative'?" They present cogent reasons in their brief why a temporary administrator is permitted, under the laws of this state, to bring suit to recover upon a policy of insurance, payable to the estate of his intestate. The rule of practice is well settled that a judgment will be sustained, if right for any reason, even though the reason given by the trial judge for entering the judgment may have been, in the opinion of the reviewing court, wrong. Taking into consideration the business and principles of the order in which the plaintiff's intestate was insured, it would seem not to have been in contemplation of the parties that recovery on the policy could be had by an administrator or executor of the deceased. The term "legal representative" does not always include executor or administrator. Under a very similar contract to the one involved in the present case, the Supreme Court held that a permanent administrator on the estate of the insured could not recover. See Tucker v. Knights of Pythias, 135 Ga. 56, 68 S. E. 796. It is significant, as determining the meaning intended to be placed by the parties upon "legal representative," that one of the conditions was that the policy should not be assigned after the death of the member, either by his widow, or his heir, or legal representatives of such heir. It would seem, therefore, that in contemplation of the parties the benefit fund was to be paid over, either to the beneficiary named, or legal representatives of the heirs of the insured.

But, be this as it may, we are quite clear that the judgment dismissing the petition on general demurrer was right for another reason. The policy was made payable to Eliza Cunningham, and a fair construction of the allegations of the petition is that Eliza Cunningham is still in life. There is some doubt as to whether it was intended to be stated in the certificate that Eliza Cunningham was the wife of the insured. Her name is set forth as Eliza Cunningham, and a proper construction of the certificate would seem to be that the proceeds of the policy were to be paid to Eliza Cunningham, if in life, or to the wife, heirs, or legal representatives of such heirs, if neither Eliza Cunningham nor the wife of the insured were in life.

[1] But it is entirely immaterial whether Eliza Cunningham is stated to be the wife of the insured or not; and it is also immaterial whether she is in fact his wife or not. The petition alleges that the insured himself took out the policy of insurance and carried on the insurance during his lifetime; and by this it was necessarily intended to be alleged that the insured paid the premiums and himself controlled the policy. Insurance cannot be taken out by another on the life of one in whom the person taking out the policy has no insurable interest. Such insurance would be void and contrary to public policy. It would be nothing more than a wagering or speculative contract, "yet, as one has insurable interest in his own life, he may lawfully procure insurance thereon for the benefit of any other person whose interest he desires to promote. Such a contract cannot be defeated because of the want of insurable interest in the beneficiary, when it appears that the person whose life was insured acted for himself, at his own expense and in good faith, to promote the interest of the beneficiary, in taking out the policy. A contract so entered into is in no sense a wagering or speculative one." Union Fraternal League v. Walton, 109 Ga. 1, 34 S. E. 317, 46 L. R. A. 424, 77 Am. St. Rep. 350; Grand Lodge Knights of Pythias v. Barnard, 9 Ga. App. 71, 70 S. E. 678. These decisions are decisive of the present case. The fact that Eliza Cunningham was not the wife of the insured, and that the insurer knew this fact, constituted no reason why she was not entitled to the proceeds of the policy. It not being alleged that Eliza Cunningham is not in life, and it being inferable from the allegations of the petition that she is in life, this constitutes a sufficient reason for dismissing the petition on general demurrer, without reference to the right of the temporary administrator to recover if Eliza Cunningham is not in life.

Judgment affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 828*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY FOR REQUEST.

The testimony relied on by the accused to prove an alibi not being such as to show the impossibility of the defendant's presence at the time when and the place where the crime was alleged to have been committed, it was not error, in the absence of a written request so to do, to omit to instruct the jury on the law of alibi. Shaw v. State, 10 Ga. App. 776, 74 S. E. 89.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 922*)—NEW TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

While not strictly accurate, under the facts of the present case, the following charge was not so erroneous as to require a new trial: "I charge you that it would not be necessary for the state to show that the defendant actually played cards and bet. It would be sufficient if it appears to you that he bet on any game played with cards. It would not be necessary for him to actually participate in the game. If he stood by, saw the game played, and bet money on it, he would be guilty under the charge made against him in the accusation."

POTTLE, J. The proposition stated in the first headnote is well settled, and needs no elaboration.

[2] The language of the statute is that, before one can be convicted, it must appear that he played and bet for money at any game played with cards, dice, or balls. Strictly speaking, therefore, it must appear that one charged with a violation of this statute participated in a game. It is apparent, however, from the testimony that the court did not mean to charge that the accused need not take part in a game. The state's witness testified as follows: "Ross Couey, the defendant, played cards and bet with us. We were all playing cards at Standpipe Hill, playing 'skin.' Some would play sitting on the ground. The ones handling the cards were the principals, and the ones standing behind were the 'pikers.' The principals would handle the cards and the 'pikers' would reach over and pick up one of the cards thrown aside by the dealer, and then throw his money in the ring and bet on his card. Ross was standing behind Dave Cason, 'piking.' I saw Ross reach down several times and pick up the cards and put his money down." It is apparent, therefore, that what the court meant to say was that if the jury believed that the accused was a "piker," as described by the state's witness, he would be equally guilty as if he were a "principal." Manifestly this was correct. The law does not permit this form of gaming, either by "principals" or by "pikers."

A ground of a motion for new trial, based upon alleged newly discovered evidence, need not be formally approved by the trial judge in the sense that the recitals of fact contained in the affidavits offered in support of the ground are verified as true. The reviewing court will pass upon a ground of the motion for new trial, based upon alleged newly discovered evidence, if it appears that this ground was presented to and considered by the trial judge, and that the affidavits offered in support thereof were likewise considered by the judge. Where, however, the record discloses that the trial judge refused to approve such a ground of a motion for a new trial, and nothing more appears, it will be presumed that for some good and sufficient reason the trial judge refused to consider the ground of the motion, and the evidence offered in support thereof.

This was an action for personal injuries alleged to have been received by the plaintiff, in consequence of being thrown from a buggy as a result of the horse hitched thereto having stepped upon a rotten plank in a bridge along a public road of a county. The evidence fully warranted, if it did not demand, the verdict in the plaintiff's favor. The amount thereof ($750) was not only not excessive, but was less than that to which the plaintiff was fairly entitled, under the testimony introduced in her behalf. The charge of the court fairly submitted the issues. The requests to charge, so far as legal and pertinent, were covered by the general charge; and the instruction excepted to was not subject to the criticism that it contained an expression of opinion as to the weight of the evidence.

Where, in a contract of affreightment for the transportation of live stock, the shipper obligates himself to accompany the stock and feed and water them, he cannot recover of the carrier damages for injuries to the stock, caused from failure to supply them with food and water, if he abandons the stock en route without making arrangements to have them fed and watered, and without making any demand upon the carrier to furnish facilities for the feeding and watering of the stock. Especially is this true where it appears that at the point where it is claimed the carrier committed the breach of duty in failing to feed and water the stock there was a stock pen in which the stock might have been unloaded, and no demand was made upon the carrier to supply the owner with necessary vessels from which to feed and water the stock. In the absence of such a demand and of a refusal to comply therewith, the carrier cannot be held liable as for breach of its obligation to furnish facilities for feeding and watering the stock.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by G. A. Weaver, Jr., against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

See, also, 9 Ga. App. 34, 70 S. E. 222.

Burton Smith and R. W. Crenshaw, both of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. McDaniel & Black, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. This is the second appearance of this case. The facts are fully reported in the former decision in 9 Ga. App. 34, 70 S. E. 222. The suit was brought to recover damages for alleged injuries to live stock shipped from Thomaston Ga., to Atlanta, Ga., over the lines of the Macon & Birmingham Railway Company and the Southern Railway Company. At the first trial a verdict was directed in favor of the plaintiff. That judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeals, upon the ground that there was some evidence upon which the jury might find in favor of the plaintiff. In the decision rendered upon the record as then presented, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover for any injury caused by failure to supply the stock with food and water, since, under the contract of affreightment, he was bound to accompany the stock and feed and water them himself, and the evidence showed that he abandoned them at Woodbury, and that the failure to supply them with food and water was not a breach of duty on the part of the defendant. It was further held that, as there was some evidence that might authorize a finding that there was injury to some of the stock from causes other than failure to feed and water and for which the company would be responsible, the case should be submitted to a jury upon that issue. At the second trial the jury found for the defendant, and the plaintiff's motion for new trial was overruled.

The evidence is substantially the same as it was at the first trial. It is insisted that the court erred in charging the jury that the plaintiff could not recover for injury caused from failure to feed and water the stock, for the reason that the defendant had failed to supply the plaintiff with proper facilities for feeding and watering the stock at Woodbury. It appears now, as it did in the former trial, that there was a stock pen at Woodbury, where stock might have been safely confined after being unloaded from the car, but it does not appear that there were any troughs where food could be placed in the stock pen, or any receptacles for holding water for the stock to drink. If the injuries to the stock resulted from the carrier's failure to furnish proper facilities for feeding and watering, then the company would be liable. Comer v. Stewart, 97 Ga. 408, 24 S. E. 845. On the other hand, if the proximate cause of the injury was the plaintiff's abandonment of the stock and his own failure to comply with his contractual obligation to feed and water, he cannot recover. Georgia Railroad Co. v. Reid, 91 Ga. 377, 17 S. E. 934; Cooper v. Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Co., 110 Ga. 659, 36 S. E. 240. The court's instruction practically amounted to a statement to the jury that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, under the evidence, for any damage caused from failure to feed and water the stock; and this instruction, we think, was proper under the facts of the case. It was undisputed that when the stock arrived at Woodbury, and the plaintiff ascertained that there would be no freight train from Woodbury to Atlanta until the next day, he abandoned his stock, without leaving them in the care of any person, and came to Atlanta. He made no demand upon the carrier to furnish any facilities for feeding and watering the stock; he made no effort to feed and water them himself; he employed no other person to do this for him in his absence. There was a stock pen near the track, where the stock might have been unloaded. If he had made demand upon the carrier to furnish troughs wherein the stock might be fed, and buckets out of which they might be watered, and the carrier had refused to comply with his demand, and injury had resulted to the stock from the plaintiff's failure to procure the necessary facilities for feeding and watering, then the carrier would have been liable. But where no such demand was made, and no effort of any sort made to feed and water the stock which were abandoned by the plaintiff, we do not think that he can properly hold the carrier liable for the consequences of his own neglect. Having taken the risk himself and the carrier having committed no breach of its contractual obligation, and no breach of any duty which it owed the plaintiff as a common carrier of live stock, the plaintiff must abide the consequences and suffer his loss. There was no error in any of the court's instructions, nor in refusing to give in charge the requests presented by the counsel for the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by E. L. Stallings against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment of the circuit court, affirming a judgment of the justice court in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. B. Atkinson, of Spartanburg, for appellant. C. C. Wyche, of Spartanburg, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff recovered a judgment in a magistrate's court for 75 cents overcharge of freight on washstands shipped from Savannah, Ga., to Spartanburg, S. C., and $50, the penalty for such overcharge. On appeal the judgment was affirmed by the circuit court.

The plaintiff admitted in his testimony that he paid the freight without objection. This admission was fatal; for, since the case was heard, the circuit court decided, in Hardaway v. Southern Ry. Co., 90 S. C. 475, 73 S. E. 1020, that there can be no recovery for such overcharge voluntarily paid. This conclusion renders unnecessary the other questions made by the appeal.

Reversed.

STATE v. JONES.

1. JURY (§ 117*)—OBJECTIONS TO PANEL.

While Act Feb. 7, 1902 (23 St. at Large, p. 1066), providing for the selection of the jury list, no doubt contemplates that the names selected should be considered by the jury commissioners as a body, a failure to give such consideration is a mere irregularity, objection to which must be made before trial.

2. JURY (§ 117*)—OBJECTIONS TO PANEL EXCUSE FOR DELAY.

As the statute provides each step in the selection for a jury, an accused cannot excuse his failure to make objections to the panel before trial, because of lack of means of discovering irregularities; it being his duty to make inquiries of those participating in the proceeding.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Orangeburg County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

John J. Jones was convicted of manslaughter, and from an order denying his motion for new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Wolfe & Berry, Glaze & Herbert, and C. P. Brunson, all of Orangeburg, for appellant. P. T. Hildebrand, for the State.

WOODS, A. J. [1] The defendant was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced at the January, 1911, term of the court of general sessions for Orangeburg county. On appeal the judgment was affirmed. 90 S. C. 290, 73 S. E. 177. While the appeal was pending, the defendant's counsel gave notice of a motion, in the circuit court, for a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence, and on this further ground presented in the agreed statement: "In order to facilitate the work of preparing the jury list for the year 1911, the jury commissioners agreed among themselves that each commissioner would select the names from certain townships for the jury lists, and in accordance with that agreement each jury commissioner selected the names for the jury lists from his allotted portion of the county, and after they had prepared the lists in the manner above provided they met together, and put the names so chosen in the jury box, each agreeing to accept the name selected by the other, and without conjointly passing on each separate name, and declared that to be the jury list for the year 1911." Defendant's counsel did not discover that the jury box was made up in this manner until after the trial, when the fact was accidentally brought out in the hearing of a motion to quash the jury, made in another case and on a different ground. The circuit judge refused the motion, and the defendant appeals on the ground that the failure of the jury commissioners to pass conjointly on each name placed in the box was a violation of the law fatal to the validity of the presentment of a grand jury and the conviction of a petit jury so drawn.

Section 2 of the act of 1902 (23 Stat. 1066) provides: "That the said county auditor, county treasurer, and the clerk of the court of common pleas of each county shall immediately after the passage of this act, and hereafter in the month of December, of this and each succeeding year, prepare a list of such qualified electors, under the provisions of the Constitution, between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-five years and of good moral character, of their respective counties, as they may deem otherwise well qualified to serve as jurors, being persons of sound judgment and free from all legal exceptions, which list shall include not less than one from every three of such qualified electors under the provisions of the Constitution, between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-five years, and of good moral character, to be selected without regard to whether such persons live within five miles, or more than five miles from the courthouse." The statute, no doubt, contemplates that the names placed in the box should be considered by the jury commissioners as a body; but the failure to give such joint consideration is nothing more than an irregularity, objection to which comes too late, if not made before trial. Similar questions have been so often before the court that no extended discussion is necessary. In State v. Smalls, 73 S. C. 516, 53 S. E. 976, it was held to be an irregularity merely that the jury commissioners selected for grand jurors the persons whom they regarded best qualified, instead of following the statute, which required that those whose names were first put down should be assigned to the grand jury. The authorities are cited in that case, and in Rhodes v. So. Ry. Co., 68 S. C. 494, 47 S. E. 639, and State v. Lazarus, 83 S. C. 215, 65 S. E. 270.

[2] The position that the defendant had no means of discovering the irregularity before going to trial is not tenable. The statute law lays down every step to be taken in obtaining juries. When a party wishes to avail himself of any failure to comply with the law, due diligence requires that he make inquiry of those who participated in the proceedings prescribed by the statute. The cases will be very rare where every step taken will not be made known by such inquiry.

1. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 192*) — COLONIAL GRANTS.

Act April 12, 1768 (7 St. at Large, p. 88) § 5, which reserved certain tide and marsh lands as a common for the city of Charleston, being a mere reservation and not a grant, was not binding on subsequent Legislatures, and hence did not invalidate the act of August 13, 1783 (7 St. at Large, p. 99) § 5, giving the marsh land to the city council to improve or sell for the benefit of the city or its inhabitants, or the act of March 4, 1909 (26 St. at Large, p. 361), granting tidelands not theretofore granted.

sold, or improved as shall appear to the council most conducive to the welfare of the city and its inhabitants, made the council a mere trustee, so that a judgment against it would not be conclusive on the city and its inhabitants.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Frank B. Gary, Judge.

Actions by the West End Development Company, a corporation, against John P. Thomas and others, and by the same plaintiff against W. J. O'Hagan and others. From a judgment for plaintiff in each case, the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Mitchell & Smith and Wm. Henry Parker, all of Charleston, for appellants. James Simons and Geo. H. Moffett, both of Charleston, for respondent.

FRASER, J. In 1909 the Legislature of this state (Acts 1909, p. 361) enacted:

"Whereas, the city council of Charleston contemplates the extension and improvement of the water front of the said city by extending its seawall from the southwest extremity of White Point Garden to a point known as 'Chisolm's Mill,' on the Ashley river, as defined upon a plat hereinafter mentioned, and the filling in of the lowlands lying between the said seawall and the highlands of the said city, and the extension and construction of highways upon the lands so reclaimed:

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of South Carolina, in consideration of the public improvements involved in the work aforesaid, the state of South Carolina has given and granted, and by this act does give and grant, unto the city council of Charleston, its successors and assigns, all the right, title, interest and estate of the state of South Carolina as the same may now be, of, in and to the land not heretofore granted under any of the grants hereinafter mentioned, lying between high-water mark and the outer line of the seawall so to be constructed as indicated upon the plat of Simons and Mayrant Company, dated the 19th day of January, 1909, and filed in the office of the Secretary of State and also recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyances for the county of Charleston; and also the right to dig, excavate and remove from the bed of the Ashley river such soil as may be necessary to fill up the land lying between the said seawall and the highland of the present water front of the said city."

In 1783 (7 Statutes, p. 99) the provincial Legislature passed an act in which it provided as follows: "The marsh lands appropriated by law for a common * * * shall be vested in the said city council and their successors for the use and advantage of said city, to be leased, sold improved on or otherwise disposed of as to the said city council shall appear most conducive to the welfare and advantage of said city and the inhabitants thereof."

In 1768 (7 Statutes, pp. 88, 89) the provincial Legislature passed an act, the fifth section of which is as follows: "V. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all the vacant marsh land lying on each side of the said canal, hereby directed to be made, situate on the east side of Ashley river, within the limits of Charleston, shall forever hereafter be reserved and kept for the use of a common for Charleston; and any grant that may be made or obtained for the same, or any part thereof, is hereby declared to be absolutely null and void."

Under the act of 1909, the city council of Charleston conveyed to the respondent (an auxiliary corporation), and went to considerable expense in filling up, lands referred to in that act, and preparing the same for sale as building lots. The defendant appellants herein agreed to purchase two of the lots, but declined to comply with their contract, on the ground that under the act of 1768 this land had been granted to the use of the people of Charleston as a common, and the acts of 1783 and 1909 are invalid. The appellants also claim that the city is estopped from selling the lots by virtue of two judgments in which the city council was a party. The judgments, it is claimed, fix the right of common, and by these judgments the city is bound.

The case was referred to the master, who held that the land described in the acts of 1768 and 1783 were not the lands covered by the act of 1909, and no part of the land lately improved by the city council; and that, even if they are the same, the act of 1783 is valid, and the judgments set up as estoppels are not estoppels. The circuit judge confirmed the report of the master, and ordered the appellants to comply with their contracts. From this decree, this appeal is taken on the following grounds:

Exception 1:

"(1) In holding that the said grant of land for a common under the act of 1768 did not include the lands, now known as the 'Boulevard Lots,' or any part thereof; whereas he should have found that such lands, as the 'Boulevard Lots' generally, and the two lots thereof here in question specifically, formed a part of the land so granted and dedicated under said act for a common."

The concurrent findings of fact by the master and the circuit judge are abundantly supported by the evidence, and this exception is overruled.

[1] Exception 2:

"(2) In holding that the plaintiff is not estopped from making the question of location on account of the litigation in the cases of Campbell v. Charleston and O'Brien v. Charleston; whereas (a) he should have held that the decrees in these cases were a judicial recognition of the existing validity of the act of 1783, and of the grant of lands thereunder for a common, embracing the lands here in question, and that the said city council is now estopped from questioning the validity thereof; and it is submitted his honor should have held that the inference to be drawn from said cases is that the marsh lands south of Broad street, including the boulevard lots generally, and the two lots here in question specifically, were in fact included in the grant of 1768 for a common; it being admitted by the agreed statement that the lots here in question and the greater part of the boulevard lots generally whether so included or not, were never sold or disposed of by the city council of Charleston prior to the year 1853. (b) And he should have held that, whatever the force and effect of the acts of 1768 and 1783, apart from these cases, and whatever the original limits of the land granted by the act of 1768 for a common, the legal effect of the decree of Judge Kershaw in 1883, in the case of O'Brien v. City Council of Charleston, was a judicial recognition and determination that the said act of 1768 was of force, not superseded by the act of 1783, embracing in its terms the boulevard lots generally, and the two lots here in question specifically, dedicating the same for a common in perpetuity; and that the city council of Charleston is, by the terms of said decree and the consent of said city council thereto, estopped from denying the same."

The Master finds "there is absolutely nothing before me to show that any portion of the lands sold to the West End Development Company by the city was within this grant."

[2] This finding being affirmed, of course, there is no ground for estoppel. Even if it were the same land, there would be no estoppel. The act of 1768 granted nothing. That act contained a reservation, and not a grant. The act merely declared the intention of the Legislature to keep the marsh land as a common, and could not bind any other Legislature, even if it had not been passed before the adoption of the Constitution. The act of 1783 then gave the marsh land to the city council, to be sold, etc., as to the city council shall appear most conducive to the welfare and advantage of said city and the inhabitants thereof. The city council were mere trustees with power to improve, sell, etc. The city and its "inhabitants" were not parties to the suit, and not bound by it. This exception is overruled.

Exceptions 3 and 4:

"(3) In holding that, even if the lots in dispute were embraced in the legislation of 1788, such legislation has been superseded by subsequent legislation, especially by the act of 1783, incorporating the city of Charleston; and that since the enactment of 1783 it has been competent for the city council of Charleston to make such disposition of vacant marsh land appropriated for a common as to the said city council might appear most conducive to the welfare and advantage of said city and the inhabitants thereof; and more particularly: (a) Whereas he should have held that said act of 1768 was not superseded, but is now of force, and the dedication thereunder of lands for 'a common for Charleston' is valid and subsisting, not only because the act of 1783 and the subsequent acts have not that effect, and, even if the same had been intended to have such effect, this would have been beyond the power of the Legislature to enact such legislation as would divest vested rights. (b) And whereas his honor should have held that said act of 1783 did operate against a subsequent grant by the Assembly of 1783 (sic), and that there were then, and are now, restrictions of the right of a state Legislature to sanction the change of use of a public grant, and more particularly a restriction in favor of abutting landowners, who have vested rights in the use for a common of the land upon which their lands abut. (c) And whereas his honor should have held that such grant, being for a restricted portion of the public, was not a grant to the public in the sense of the principle contended for.

"(4) That in this his honor should have held that a conveyance, subject to said consent decree, and not subsequent to the consent decree in O'Brien, could not and should not be approved by the court, and that the city council, thereto consenting, could so far give to such an act legislative effect as to estop said city council forever thereafter, especially when, as in the case at bar, the consent of city council in said two cases, and the resulting dedication effected by the decree of court in said cases under said consent, was given for a valuable consideration to the city council of Charleston in the release of certain claims and demands expressly waived and disposed of by said consent decree; and whereas in this case the rights of abutting landowners are shown to be in question; and whereas his honor should have held that the defendants have shown that the grantors have no title; that at all events there is a cloud on the said title, and that there is nothing shown in the proceedings, in the way of law or evidence, to remove the cloud; and therefore the defendants should not be compelled to comply."

[3, 4] Abutting owners could acquire no easements over land held for the public. Even if they could, they would themselves be estopped. They could not stand silent while large sums were being expended in valuable improvements and the use of the property changed, and then assert the rights they had lost by their silence.

What has already been said disposes of these exceptions; and they are overruled.

Exception 5:

"(5) That his honor erred in finding that the defendants have failed to establish the special defenses alleged, and in finding, as matter of law, that plaintiffs are entitled to the relief prayed for; whereas he should have found that the defendants have shown that plaintiffs have no title, and that the defendants should not be compelled to perform specifically."

What has already been said disposes of this exception; and it is overruled.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Gary, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by W. H. Jones against the Enoree Power Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson, Nash & Daniel, of Spartanburg, for appellant. Bomar & Osborne, of Spartanburg, for respondent.

WOODS, J. By a contract executed February 27, 1900, W. H. Jones, the plaintiff, and others, conveyed to A. B. Groce, his heirs and assigns, "the right and privilege to raise a dam on the Van Patton Shoals, now owned by the Westmoreland estate and S. H. Calvert, to such height as he may desire." The questions made by this appeal arise under the following stipulation of the contract: "It is further agreed that if the land of the parties above named become in any way injured or damaged by water from said raising of the dam on said Van Patton Shoals on Enoree river, the said A. B. Groce hereby binds himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to pay the amount of such damages to the said parties above named, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns. The amount of such damages shall be derived and determined in the following manner, to wit: The said Abraham Cook, W. L. Hudson, P. B. Cooper, T. L. Bragg, R. T. Newman, Mrs. M. T. Newman, R. B. Newman, B. F. Newman, W. H. Jones, J. F. King, O. E. Godfrey, M. E. Jones, W. F. Fowler, the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, are to select one arbitrator, and the said A. B. Groce, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, the other, and these two a third; and if these two cannot agree on a third, then such third arbitrator is to be selected by the clerk of the court, and if he will not then the probate judge, and if he will not select then the third arbitrator shall be selected by the sheriff, and if for any reason the arbitrators cannot be chosen or a majority of them cannot agree, then the amount of such damage is to be determined by action at law. The award of said arbitrators shall be final and conclusive."

The defendant, Enoree Power Company, acquired by assignment of the contract the rights of Groce. On July 19, 1907, the plaintiff served on the defendant a notice that he would contest the validity of the contract, and that, even if the contract should be declared valid, the plaintiff revoked the agreement to arbitrate. Afterwards the plaintiff, disregarding the agreement, brought this action for damages and injunction, alleging in his complaint: "That about the first of the year 1908, the defendant, Enoree Power Company, erected a dam across Enoree river, at what is known as Van Patton Shoals, of considerable height just below plaintiff's land, thereby impeding the water in said stream and backing it up into the small stream running through plaintiff's land referred to in such manner as to impede its progress and flow and caused said land to be saturated and slobbered with water and become unfit for cultivation, to the plaintiff's great damage. That plaintiff is a farmer and is dependent on the products of his farm for a living; and the defendant, by its said unlawful act, has so impeded the water, as it was wont to flow above, over, and along his said lands, as to cause mud, sand, and debris, in case of even ordinary freshet, to be deposited in the bed of said stream and out upon the cultivated land, to his damage in the sum of $500." The defendant set up as a defense that the action could not be maintained until the plaintiff had submitted the amount of damage, if any, to arbitration. In reply, the plaintiff alleged that the contract was without consideration, that it had been obtained by fraud, and that the agreement to arbitrate had been annulled by revocation.

[1, 2] The verdict of the jury was in favor of the defendant. The circuit judge instructed the jury: (1) That if the contract was obtained by fraud, it was of no effect; the plaintiff should have a verdict for whatever damage he had proved. (2) That if the contract was not obtained by fraud, then the plaintiff was bound by its terms; that he could not revoke the agreement to arbitrate, and could not maintain his action until he had offered to submit to arbitration the amount of the damage. The issue of fraud is out of the case, having been settled by the jury against the plaintiff.

Before considering the real question involved, it may be well to remark that no question under our Constitution or statute law is involved, for the arbitration provided for in this contract is a common-law arbitration falling entirely without the statute enacted by the General Assembly under the mandate of the Constitution. The Constitution provides: "The General Assembly shall pass laws allowing differences to be decided by arbitrators, to be appointed by the parties who may choose that mode of adjustment." Article 8, § 1.

Section 2849 of the Civil Code provides for arbitration agreements as required by the Constitution; but the statute contemplates arbitration of differences which have already arisen, and requires as a part of the contract "each party to enter into bond in double the amount involved to faithfully abide the result of the arbitration." Thus on its face the statute shows, without analysis, that it does not cover agreements contained in written contracts made before any difference has arisen to have any specific question of damage, loss, measurement, or the like arising under the contract settled by arbitration; and certainly it could not be contended for a moment that the statute or the Constitution expresses or implies any intention to take away the common-law right to make such an agreement. The indisputable right to make such a common-law agreement, not falling under the statute, was expressly recognized in Bishop v. Valley Falls Mfg. Co., 78 S. C. 312, 58 S. E. 939.

The exceptions raise two questions: First, was the agreement for arbitration binding on the plaintiff in the absence of fraud? Second, did the plaintiff have the right to revoke the agreement that the amount of damage should be ascertained by arbitration?

We shall not discuss in detail the numerous cases in which the validity of arbitration agreements under the common law and the right to revoke them have been considered. As to the validity of such contracts, the authorities with entire unanimity now lay down this rule. An agreement to submit to arbitration all questions of law and fact that may arise under a contract is contrary to the public policy and void, as an attempt to oust the courts of their jurisdiction and establish in their place a contract tribunal. But an agreement that any particular issues of fact that may arise, such as quality of goods or amount of loss or damage, or the like, shall be submitted to arbitration, leaves the question of ultimate liability open for the decision of the courts and is valid; and if the contract expressly or by necessary implication makes the ascertainment of such fact by arbitration a condition precedent to a right of action, it is a good defense to a suit on the contract that the plaintiff has, without such good excuse, failed to arbitrate. Freedom to contract for arbitration to this extent imports no invasion of the province of the courts, and there is no ground upon which a right so essential to the convenient transaction of modern business affairs can be denied.

It is true that the case of Herbemont v. Percival, 1 McMul. 69, decided in 1840, does lay down in very broad language the general rule that a suit may be brought in disregard of any sort of agreement to arbitrate, though it is important to observe that the court also held in that case that the terms of the contract were too indefinite for enforcement. The case, however, is no longer authority in this state against the rule we have stated as to the validity of arbitration agreements, for in the case of Maxwell v. Thompson, 15 S. C. 612, decided in 1881, it was held that agreements to arbitrate are not against public policy. In the still later case of Brooke v. Laurens Milling Co., 78 S. C. 200, 58 S. E. 806, 125 Am. St. Rep. 780, and Id., 84 S. C. 299, 66 S. E. 294, the court held an agreement like that in this case binding on the parties. Since the decisions in Hamilton v. Liverpool, etc., Ins. Co., 136 U. S. 242, 10 Sup. Ct. 945, 34 L. Ed. 419, and Hamilton v. Home Ins. Co., 137 U. S. 370, 11 Sup. Ct. 133, 34 L. Ed. 708, we think no authority can be found which questions the following summary of the law made in the latter case: "A provision, in a contract for the payment of money upon a contingency, that the amount to be paid shall be submitted to arbitrators, whose award shall be final as to that amount, but shall not determine the general question of liability, is undoubtedly valid. If the contract further provides that no action on it shall be maintained until after such an award, then, as was adjudged in Hamilton v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co., above cited, and in many other cases therein referred to, the award is a condition precedent to the right of action. But where no such condition is expressed in the contract, or necessarily to be implied from its terms, it is equally well settled that the agreement for submitting the amount to arbitration is collateral and independent; and that a breach of this agreement, while it will support a separate action, cannot be pleaded in bar to an action on the principal contract." Numerous authorities following this rule are cited in 19 Cyc. 873; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. 573; Kinney v. Baltimore & O. Employees Relief Ass'n, 35 W. Va. 385, 14 S. E. 8, 15 L. R. A. 142; Chadwick v. Phoenix Accident & Sick Benefit, 143 Mich. 481, 106 N. W. 1122, 8 Ann. Cas. 170.

As to the question of revocation, the language just quoted clearly imports that a valid agreement to arbitrate, made by the parties a condition precedent to the right of action, is not revocable. The general rule undoubtedly is that a contract of arbitration entered into after the controversy has arisen is revocable at will at any time before the award has been made, and many cases will be found holding that in general arbitration agreements are revocable even when entered into before any controversy has arisen; but we have found no authority holding an agreement to be revocable when made by the parties before any issue has come between them, that any issue of fact, that may in the future arise, as to a specific point, such as valuation, quality, damage, and the like, shall be determined by arbitration before suit shall be brought. If on any such matters the parties have agreed that arbitration shall be a condition precedent to the right of action, there is no principle of law which warrants the courts in dispensing with the condition.

The rules we have set out and the principles on which they rest were stated with such convincing clearness and force by Mr. Justice Lamar, now Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Parsons v. Ambos, 121 Ga. 98, 48 S. E. 696, that we quote at length: "Courts favor the submission of controversies to speedy and inexpensive tribunals of the parties' own selection, and generally, in the absence of fraud or palpable mistake, will not interfere with their findings, even though a verdict of a jury, to the same effect, might be set aside as contrary to law. But the underlying reason for the recognition of the award is found in the fact that the parties not only agreed to submit their differences, but voluntarily permitted the agreement to be executed, and consented for the award to be actually made by judges of their own selection. The mere executory agreement to submit is generally revocable, otherwise nothing would be easier than for the more astute party to oust the courts of their jurisdiction. By first making the contract, and then declaring who should construe it, the strong could oppress the weak, and in effect so nullify the law as to secure the enforcement of contracts usurious, illegal, immoral, or contrary to public policy. Civ. Code 1895, § 3668. A common-law agreement, therefore, to submit the validity and effect of a contract, or to submit all matters in dispute, to arbitration, may be revoked by either party at any time before the award. For statutory awards, see Civ. Code 1895, § 448. Some of the early cases put this rule upon the ground that a provision whereby the courts may be ousted of their jurisdiction is repugnant to that other provision, implied in every contract, that its validity and effect shall be determined by the courts and the law of the land. But whether predicated on the idea that the agreement is repugnant to the contract or to public policy, the principle is universally recognized that such general submissions are revocable. But this does not mean that nothing can be submitted, nor that the parties may not stipulate that certain facts must be determined by those of their own choosing. For example, in building contracts it is manifest that there must be some one other than a court or jury to pass on the question as to whether there has been a compliance with the specifications as the building proceeds, or to determine whether the work shall be accepted or rejected as completed. Hence there may be a lawful and irrevocable stipulation for the certificate of the architect or engineer. In contracts of insurance the assessment of the amount of damages may be made a condition precedent to a suit by the insured on the policy. So, too, in contracts of sale, the parties may stipulate for the opinion of an attorney as to the validity of the title, or that the value of the property shall be ascertained by appraisers before either has the right to sue. This fixing of value, however, is a mere incident, and not of the substance of the contract. It rather serves the office of evidence, than of finding which construes the contract or determines rights. The jurisdiction of the courts over these substantial matters may be retained by revocation, though the incidental stipulation for valuation is not revocable by the act of the parties, each of whom is bound to do all that is reasonably in his power to procure the appraisal, and must continue to act until he puts the opposite party in the wrong, or makes it manifest that no suitable person can be obtained to do the service within a reasonable time. Hood v. Hartshorn, 100 Mass. 121, 1 Am. Rep. 89."

Applying these rules of law, the question here is whether it appears from the contract, either expressly or by necessary implication, that as a condition precedent to an action on the contract the amount of damages first should be ascertained by arbitrators. The contract, after providing in detail for the arbitration on the amount of damages from backwater, stipulates: "And if for any reasons the arbitrators cannot be chosen, then the amount of such damages is to be determined by action at law." This clearly means that the amount shall be determined by action only in the event the arbitrators cannot be chosen or cannot agree, thus necessarily implying that in the ascertainment of damages suit could be resorted to only after arbitration had become impossible. For these reasons it seems to me that the contract to arbitrate the amount of damages was valid, that it made arbitration as to such damages a condition precedent to an action, and that it was not revocable. Hence I think the judgment should be affirmed.

HYDRICK, J., concurs. FRASER, J., concurs in result. WATTS, J., absent.

GARY, C. J. (dissenting). This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, through the wrongful acts of the defendant, in erecting a dam across Enoree river, thereby causing the overflow of his lands. The plaintiff also asks equitable relief by way of injunction. The defendant, to whom A. B. Groce subsequently assigned his rights under said contract, denied all the allegations of the complaint, except the corporate existence of the defendant, and plaintiff's ownership of the lands that were overflowed, and set up as a defense the following contract: "State of South Carolina, Spartanburg County. This contract made and entered into, this 27th day of February, 1900, between W. H. Jones (and other parties therein named) and A. B. Groce, witnesseth: The said W. H. Jones (and others), for valuable consideration, hereby made unto the said A. B. Groce, his heirs and assigns, the right and privilege to raise a dam on the Van Patton Shoals * * * to such height as he may desire. It is further agreed that if the lands of the said parties above named become in any way injured or damaged, by water from said raising of the dam, * * * the said A. B. Groce binds himself * * * to pay the amount of such damage, to the said parties above named. * * * The amount of such damage shall be arrived at and determined, in the following manner, to wit: The said W. H. Jones (and others) * * * are to select one arbitrator, * * * and the said A. B. Groce * * * the other, and these two, a third; and if these two cannot agree on a third, then such third arbitrator is to be selected, by the clerk of court, and if he will not, then the probate judge, and if he will not select, then the third arbitrator shall be selected by the sheriff, and if, for any reason, the arbitrators cannot be chosen, or a majority of them cannot agree, then the amount of such damage, is to be determined by action at law. The award of said arbitrators shall be final and conclusive." After setting forth the terms of the contract, the defendant alleged "that the plaintiff has no right to make or have fixed any claim to damages, save and except as is provided by the terms of the contract aforesaid." The plaintiff, in reply, alleged failure of consideration, fraud, and that he revoked the agreement to arbitrate, before the commencement of the action.

The notice served on the defendant, by the plaintiff, dated July 18, 1907, uses this language: "You will, also, take notice, that even if said paper (the contract) be declared valid, the undersigned, W. H. Jones, does hereby revoke, any and all agreement or agreements to arbitrate, mentioned in said paper."

The question raised by the exceptions is thus stated, in the argument of the appellant's attorneys: "There is only one question made, as we understand it, by the several exceptions of the plaintiff, which is succinctly embraced in the plaintiff's first request to charge, which was refused by his honor, and which was as follows: 'The notice of revocation served on July 19, 1910, revoked the agreement to arbitrate, and it was no longer in force, the jury, therefore, having nothing to do with anything about the arbitration.' His honor refused this, and charged, in effect, that the plaintiff was bound by the provisions of the paper referred to, unless it was obtained by fraud; and quoted at length from the case of Hamilton v. Insurance Co., 136 U. S. 254, 10 Sup. Ct. 945, 34 L. Ed. 419, telling the jury that the principles announced in that case were applicable to this case, provided the paper was not fraudulent. The court further charged: 'If you find that this paper was not obtained by fraud, then the plaintiff has no cause of action, because, before he can bring his suit, he must have his damage ascertained by arbitration. If you find that this paper was not obtained by fraud, you will find for the defendant; if you find that this paper was obtained by fraud, as I have endeavored to explain the law to you on that subject, then you will find for the plaintiff such a sum as represents his injury, if any has been proven.'"

"Where the parties to a contract enter into an absolute agreement, or covenant, that, in case a dispute should arise under such contract, all matters in difference between them relating thereto shall be submitted to arbitration, it is void on grounds of public policy, because to give effect to it would be to oust the courts of their jurisdiction." 2 Encyc. of Law, 571.

The appellant's attorneys do not dispute this principle, but contend for the doctrine, which is thus stated in 3 Cyc. 595: "Though the parties cannot, by any agreement to submit, oust the jurisdiction of the courts, they may agree to impose, as a condition precedent to any right of action, that, with respect of the liability to pay, the mode of settling the amount to be paid, or the time for paying the same, an arbitration shall first be held."

In the first place, the provision in said contract for submitting the amount of damages to arbitration is not a condition precedent, and his honor erred in applying to this case the principle announced in Hamilton v. Insurance Co., 136 U. S. 254, 10 Sup. Ct. 945, 34 L. Ed. 419. In the said case (upon which his honor principally relied), the facts were very materially different from those in the present case. The policy therein provided that any difference arising between the insured and insurer, as to the amount of loss or damage thereunder, should be submitted, at the request of either party, to certain persons as arbitrators, to be chosen in the manner therein provided, whose award should be conclusive as to the amount of loss or damage only, and should not determine the question as to the liability of the company, and that, until such an appraisal should have been permitted, and such an award obtained, the loss would not be payable and no action would lie against the company.

"In order to make such award (under arbitration provided for in policy) a condition precedent to the right of maintaining suit, it must be so expressed in the policy, or necessarily implied from its terms. A mere provision in the policy that the amount to be paid, in case of disagreement, shall be submitted to arbitration, does not prevent the insured from maintaining an action, unless the policy further provides that no action shall be maintained until after award; but such agreement to submit to arbitration is regarded as a collateral and independent agreement, the breach of which, while it will support a separate action, cannot be pleaded in bar to an action on the principal contract." Mutual F. Ins. Co. v. Alford, 61 Fed. 752, 9 C. C. A. 623.

We do not deem it necessary to cite other authorities to show that the provisions of the contract herein do not constitute a condition precedent. But even if there was a condition precedent, it would not bar the plaintiff's right to bring his action, until there was a compliance with the requirements thereof.

In an exhaustive note to the case of Chadwick v. Phoenix, etc., Association, 143 Mich. 481, 106 N. W. 1122, 8 Ann. Cas. 170, it appears that the authorities are in irreconcilable conflict.

There are cogent reasons why the doctrine for which the respondent contends should not prevail. It would enable parties, practically, to abrogate the principle that they cannot oust the court of jurisdiction in the manner hereinbefore mentioned, for they could accomplish this purpose, by simply designating specifically every question that could arise under the contract. The authorities sustaining this view do not place any limitation upon the power of the contracting parties to specify what issues shall be referred, and may thus leave the court powerless to do more than pass a formal order, affirming the award of the arbitrators.

In the note to the case of Chadwick v. Phoenix, etc., Ass'n, 143 Mich. 481, 106 N. W. 1122, 8 Ann. Cas. 170, the annotator cites numerous authorities to sustain the proposition that a denial of all liability by the insurer leaves nothing for arbitration, and that the insured may maintain an action on his policy before arbitration.

We come now to the main question in the case, to wit, whether the provision in the agreement for arbitration was revocable.

An agreement to arbitrate does not stand upon a higher plane than an actual submission to arbitration, which, as will be seen from the authorities, may be revoked by either party at any time, before the award is made.

"Though there are cases which hold that a submission under a contract or agreement, founded upon a valuable consideration, or a submission which is part of an agreement containing other terms to be performed by the parties, is irrevocable, by one party without the consent of the other, the general rule is that a submission may be revoked by either party thereto before award, if the submission is not made a rule of court, or is not otherwise regulated by statute. The remedy of the adverse party in case of a revocation is by an action on the agreement to submit, or on the submission bond. But where an award is made and published, neither party can revoke the submission, without the consent of the other." 3 Cyc. 610, 1. "A distinction has been drawn in some cases, the courts holding that an arbitration clause in a contract is merely collateral to the agreement to pay, and is therefore no bar to an action upon the contract." 2 Encyc. of Law, 582:

"At the common law, a submission might be revoked by any of the parties thereto, at any time before the award was made, nor was this right taken away by an express stipulation in the submission that it should be irrevocable. And where one of several persons, who jointly made but one party, revokes the submission, even against the will of the others, it makes the submission void as to all." Id., 594-596.

"Outside of the liability for breach of the agreement to submit, the effect of revoking the submission is to restore the parties to their original rights against each other, as they existed before the submission was made." Id., 603, 604.

"The authority of an arbitrator is at common law, in its nature, revocable, and no act of the party submitting can render it irrevocable; but, if the party is bound under a penalty to abide the arbitration, the bond is forfeited by his countermanding the authority." Vynier's Case, 3 Eng. Ruling Cases, 357. "It is an ancient and well-established rule that either party may revoke his submission, at any time before the award is made, and by this revocation render the submission wholly ineffectual, and, of course, take from the arbitrators all power of making a binding award. * * * As an agreement to submit is a valid contract, the promise of each party being the consideration for the other, a revocation of the agreement or of the submission is a breach of the contract, and the other party has his damages. The measure of damages would generally include all the expenses the plaintiff has incurred about the submission, and all that he has lost by the revocation in any way. * * * It may be implied as well as express; and would be implied by any act, which made it impossible for the arbitrators to proceed." 2 Par. on Com. pp. 710, 711.

These authorities show that his honor the presiding judge erred in his ruling upon the question of revocation.

Thus far we have discussed this question without reference to the constitutional and statutory provisions in our state. Section 1, article 6, of the Constitution is as follows: "The General Assembly shall pass laws, allowing differences to be decided by arbitrators, to be appointed by the parties, who may choose that mode of adjustment."

Section 2849 of the Code of Laws provides that "it shall be lawful for any and all persons, in cases of disagreement or differences of opinion, as to the proper settlement of any contention that may hereafter arise and either party to the contention may, propose to leave their differences to arbitrators, each party to enter into bond, in double the amount involved, to faithfully abide the result of arbitration. The arbitrators shall be selected in the following manner: * * * The finding of said board of arbitration shall be final."

In construing this statute, the court used this language in the case of Bishop v. Manufacturing Co., 78 S. C. 312, 58 S. E. 939: "The agreement for arbitration is complete, when one party to a dispute proposes arbitration, and the other assents to it, and each party enters into bond, in double the amount involved, to faithfully abide the result. The selection of arbitrators is no part of the agreement required by the statute. After the agreement has been made, the statute provides a method of selection, so that there may be no reason for difference between the parties on the point. But this is nothing more than conferring on each party the right to demand that the arbitrators be selected in the manner indicated in the statute. This right, like all others, may be waived by agreement of the parties to select the arbitrators in some other way. Hence it is illogical to say an arbitration cannot be referred to the statute, merely because the parties agree on the arbitrators, instead of exercising the right to require them to be selected, in the manner indicated in the statute."

The words of the statute and the language of the court indicate that the remedy of either party, for a failure of the other, to abide by the terms of the contract, is by an action on the bond; thus showing that an agreement to arbitrate is collateral in its nature, and that damages for a breach thereof are recoverable in an independent action.

The question now under consideration was determined in the case of Herbemont v. Percival, 1 McMul. 59, cited with approval in Smith v. Thomson, 1 Strob. 344. For the purpose of an amicable settlement of the controversy in that case, a written agreement was entered into, by which it was agreed that certain negroes should be delivered to Dr. Percival; he agreeing to pay hire for such of them as counsel of the parties should decide the plaintiff was entitled to. And, on default of such decision, the plaintiff was to file a bill in equity, which was to include all the matters in controversy between them. In that case the court said: "The first thing in this case is to ascertain the character and decide on the effect of the special plea in bar, filed by the defendant. The plea sets out a special agreement, by which it appears that the plaintiff had delivered up to the defendant certain slaves which came into his possession at the death of his intestate, and had retained for a specific purpose two others; and that defendant was to pay such a sum, for the hire of those he took, as should be determined on by the counsel of the parties, or by the court of equity; and the plea alleged that no sum had been agreed on by the counsel, nor had the plaintiff filed his bill in the court of equity. But it does not aver that the defendant had applied to counsel to have the matter adjusted himself. * * * It seems to have been the object of the parties to submit the matters in controversy to arbitration, and this is the true character of their agreement. An agreement to arbitrate, or a bond to submit to arbitration, may be the subject of a suit, where the damages stipulated or the penalty will authorize a recovery. But such an agreement, or bond, would not deprive either party of his remedy in the courts, or oust them of their jurisdiction, in regard to the matter in dispute."

This language was used with reference to a special issue just such as is now under consideration. Mr. Justice WOODS practically concedes that the question now under consideration was decided in that case, for he says: "It is true that the case of Herbemont v. Percival, 1 McMul. 59, decided in 1840, does lay down in very broad language the general rule that a suit may be brought, in disregard of any sort of agreement to arbitrate," etc. He, however, contends that the case just mentioned is no longer authority in this state, against the rule for which he contends as to the validity of arbitration agreements, for the reason that the cases of Maxwell v. Thompson, 15 S. C. 612, and Brooke v. Laurens Milling Co., 78 S. C. 200, 58 S. E. 806, 125 Am. St. Rep. 780, and Id., 84 S. C. 299, 66 S. E. 294, held that agreements to arbitrate are not against public policy. Conceding that agreements to arbitrate are not against public policy, it by no means follows that such an agreement can have the effect of ousting the court of its jurisdiction. It seems to us that the failure of Mr. Justice WOODS to observe this distinction has caused him to reach an erroneous conclusion.

Let us, however, see if the causes upon which he relies sustain the proposition that the case of Herbemont v. Percival, 1 McMul. 59, has been overruled. The case of Maxwell v. Thompson, 15 S. C. 612, was regarded as so unimportant that it is published among the unreported cases, and all that it says in regard to this question is as follows: "A building contract provided that, in case of any disagreement, the matter of difference should be referred to three disinterested persons as arbitrators; such agreement is not against public policy, but may be waived by the parties." No mention is made of the case of Herbemont v. Percival, 1 McMul. 59, nor is there any reference as to the power of parties to oust the court of jurisdiction, by agreements to arbitrate special issues.

The case of Brooke v. Laurens Milling Co., 78 S. C. 200, 58 S. E. 806, 125 Am. St. Rep. 780, and Id., 84 S. C. 299, 66 S. E. 294, has no application whatever to the question under consideration, as there was an award in that case, and the right of the parties to oust the court of jurisdiction was not involved. There is no doubt that the agreement in the present case was to arbitrate, which, of course, meant that the parties should have all the rights incident to arbitration, one of which is the right of revocation.

It will thus be seen that the court cannot be ousted of its jurisdiction, until the right of revocation is destroyed, for which we fail to find any authority in this state. Mr. Justice WOODS quotes the following language from the case of Parsons v. Ambos, 121 Ga. 98, 48 S. E. 696: "This fixing of value is a mere incident, and not of the substance of the contract. It rather serves the office of evidence." In the first place, this decision is against the rule stated in Herbemont v. Percival, which shows that it is not a rule of evidence, but an agreement to arbitrate, with all the incidents of arbitration. And, in the second place, we do not understand how, as a mere rule of evidence, such an agreement could have the effect of ousting the court of jurisdiction.

But whatever might have been done under the Constitution of 1868 towards ousting the court of its jurisdiction, no agreement of any kind whatsoever can have such effect since the adoption of the Constitution of 1895, section 15, art. 5, of which provides that "the courts of common pleas shall have jurisdiction in all civil cases." This provision was inserted for the prevention of just such questions as have arisen in this case. This section was construed in the case of Epperson v. Jackson, 83 S. C. 157, 85 S. E. 217, in which the court said: "Section 15, art. 5, of the Constitution provides that the court of common pleas shall have jurisdiction in all cases, thus showing that its jurisdiction, with that of the probate court in matters such as are now under consideration, is concurrent. The words, 'they shall have jurisdiction in all civil cases,' in section 15, art. 5, of the Constitution of 1895, are not to be found in section 15, art. 4, of the Constitution of 1868, which was construed in Ex parte White, 33 S. C. 442 [12 S. E. 5]." In the last-mentioned case, it was held that the jurisdiction of the probate court as to the matter then before it was exclusive.

The court of common pleas is the tribunal constituted by law for the trial of civil cases. A board of arbitrators is, also, a tribunal for the trial of such issues, as may be submitted to it. Such board may be created by law, or by agreement of the parties. The final determination of the rights of the parties by the court is denominated a judgment, while that of a board of arbitrators is defined as an award. But whether there is a judgment rendered by the court, or an award made by a board of arbitrators, it is conclusive of the question thus decided. If there is an award by arbitrators, it is so far res adjudicata in its nature, as to the question submitted, that it cannot again be made an issue in the court of common pleas, unless there was fraud or undue influence. But until there is an award, section 15, art. 5, of the Constitution shows that the parties cannot by agreement oust the court of its jurisdiction.

I cannot conceive how the framers of the Constitution could have expressed in stronger language their intention that the court of common pleas should not be deprived of its jurisdiction, by agreement or otherwise.

For these reasons I dissent.

SOUTHERN POWER CO. v. WHITE et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 7, 1912.)

1. JURY (§ 31*)—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—INFRINGEMENT—SETTING ASIDE VERDICT.

The constitutional guaranty of trial by jury does not deprive the circuit court of power to set aside a verdict fixing the compensation in condemnation proceedings and to grant a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 204-219; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 239*)—NEW TRIAL—POWER TO GRANT.

Civ. Code 1902, § 2191, providing that the verdict in condemnation proceedings in the circuit court shall be conclusive unless a new trial is ordered by the Supreme Court, does not deprive the circuit court of power to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial; such provision appearing to have been inserted merely to provide a right of review by the Supreme Court, when viewed in the light of legislation contemporary with the condemnation act, particularly of Civ. Code 1902, § 2734, giving circuit courts power to grant new trials after verdict, of Code Civ. Proc. § 288 (adopted March 1, 1870, 14 St. at Large, p. 485), authorizing a trial judge to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial, and also in the light of the fact that the Supreme Court has no appellate jurisdiction in such proceeding, but can correct only errors of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 615-620; Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 239*)—CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—TRIAL—RIGHT TO OPEN.

Where both sides appealed from the verdict of the clerk's jury in condemnation proceedings, the landowners were entitled to open and reply on trial in the circuit court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 615-620; Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

Fraser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Ernest Gary, Judge.
"To be officially reported."

Action by the Southern Power Company against A. L. and T. J. White. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The order appealed from is as follows: "This was an appeal by both parties from the verdict of a jury impaneled by the clerk in condemnation, and came on for hearing at the November term of said court. An issue was framed submitting to the jury the question of the amount of compensation defendants were entitled to on account of the erection by the plaintiff of a line of steel towers and wires over and across defendants' lands in the suburbs of Spartanburg. The jury fixed the compensation at $3,500. Plaintiffs gave notice of a motion for a new trial, nisi, upon the minutes, and the same has just been argued before me; the plaintiff's attorneys contending that the verdict is excessive, and that I should set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, unless the defendants would remit from the verdict such amount as I might conclude was excessive. After hearing argument, I am of the opinion that, under the terms of the provisions of the Code, I am without jurisdiction or power to interfere with the verdict or grant a new trial, and that defendants' attorneys contention as to that is correct. The Code provides that the verdict of the jury, on appeal, shall be final and conclusive, unless set aside by the Supreme Court; and I so hold. The motion is refused for the foregoing reasons."

Osborne, Lucas & Cocks, of Charlotte, North Carolina, and Nicholls & Nicholls and John Gary Evans, all of Spartanburg, for appellant. Bomar & Osborne, of Spartanburg for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. [1] The circuit court erred in holding that it had no power to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, absolute or nisi. The argument that the court must be denied that power because the Constitution provides that the compensation for the use of land shall be ascertained by a jury is untenable on principle and authority. The Constitution also guarantees the right of trial by jury in many other cases in which the power of the court to set aside the verdicts of juries and grant new trials, absolute or nisi, has been sustained so frequently by this court that it is now unquestioned, and, in the face of these decisions, it cannot logically be maintained that the exercise of the power deprives the parties of their constitutional right of trial by jury. Warren v. Lagrone, 12 S. C. 45; Stuckey v. Railroad Co., 57 S. C. 395, 35 S. E. 550; Hall v. Railroad Co., 81 S. C. 533, 62 S. E. 848.

[2] If the power is denied, it is only by implication from the use of the following words in section 2191, vol. 1, Code 1902, where it is said with regard to the verdict of the jury in the circuit court: "Whose verdict shall be final and conclusive, unless a new trial shall be ordered by the Supreme Court." The language quoted certainly does not expressly deny the power of the circuit court to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial. On the other hand, the power to do so is expressly conferred in section 2734, vol. 1, Code 1902, which reads: "Circuit courts shall have power to grant new trials in cases where there has been a trial by jury for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law of this state."

Prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1868 and the act from which section 2734 was taken, the circuit courts in this state had no power to grant new trials. That could be done only by the Supreme Court. But under the Constitution of 1868 and the present Constitution, the provisions of which, as to the matter under consideration, are substantially, if not identically, the same as those of the Constitution of 1868, the power to grant new trials, which is an appellate power, is denied to the Supreme Court, which has appellate jurisdiction only in equity cases, and its power in law cases is limited to the correction of errors of law. State v. Bailey, 1 S. C. 1; Byrd v. Small, 2 S. C. 388; State v. David, 14 S. C. 430.

A consideration of the provisions of the condemnation act, as it now appears in section 2191, above quoted, in the light of contemporaneous and subsequent legislation, reorganizing the courts and prescribing new methods of procedure therein, under the Constitution of 1868, will show conclusively that those words were never intended to have the effect which is now claimed for them; and, furthermore, that the necessary result of subsequent legislation has been to repeal that provision, if it can be construed to have that effect.

On August 28, 1868, it was enacted, pursuant to the limitations of the power of the Supreme Court by the Constitution, which had been ratified in April before, that "final judgments and decrees in civil and criminal actions in the circuit courts, brought there by original process, or removed there by appeal from any inferior court or jurisdiction, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court, upon writ of error," etc., 14 Stat. p. 12. The same statute provided for an appeal to the Supreme Court in equity cases. Naturally, therefore, we find in the original condemnation statute, which was enacted later, on September 22, 1868 (14 Stat. p. 89), these words: "Whose verdict shall be final and conclusive, unless, on writ of error, a new trial shall be ordered by the Supreme Court." It will be observed that these words are slightly different from those now found in section 2191. The reason for this difference becomes apparent when we remember that the writ of error was abolished on the adoption of the Code of Procedure on March 1, 1870, and an appeal substituted for it in all cases. 14 Stat. pp. 500, 527. Hence in the next codification (Rev. Stat. 1873, p. 354) we find the words "on writ of error" omitted.

In view of the practice which had obtained in this state for a long time, and the prevailing opinion that new trials could be granted only by the Supreme Court, it may, indeed, have been supposed that the circuit court would have no power to grant new trials in such proceedings; but such supposition, if it existed, was erroneous, because this court held distinctly, in State v. Bailey and in State v. David, supra, that the power to grant new trials in cases tried by the circuit courts was one of their inherent powers. At any rate, the statute from which section 2734 was taken was enacted just four days after the condemnation act, to wit, September 26, 1868 (14 Stat. p. 136). We think the history of the legislation of the time shows that the purpose of inserting those words was merely to provide the right to have the proceedings reviewed by the Supreme Court, at first on writ of error, and afterwards, when that writ was abolished, by appeal; because, at that time, there had not been enacted any general law as to what proceedings of the circuit courts could be reviewed by the Supreme Court, and hence, no doubt, it was thought necessary to provide in the condemnation act for such review; otherwise, there would have been no appeal from the judgment of the circuit court. Therefore we do not think those words should be construed to deny a power to the circuit courts which was expressly conferred upon them by a statute of a subsequent date, enacted by the same Legislature, for even if their proper construction would, without considering any other legislation, result in a denial of the power by implication, the subsequent statute, granting the power in express, though general, terms, overrides and repeals the former.

Again, we find in section 288 of the Code of Procedure (adopted March 1, 1870, 14 Stat. p. 485), under the chapter headed "Trial by Jury," this provision: "The judge who tries the cause may, in his discretion, entertain a motion, to be made on his minutes, to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial upon exceptions, or for insufficient evidence, or for excessive damages."

There is another consideration which should have some weight in leading the court to this conclusion. In proceedings of this kind, this court has no appellate jurisdiction, but can correct only errors of law. Therefore, no matter how excessive a verdict might be, and even though it should be apparent that it was influenced by prejudice or caprice, if it be true that the circuit court cannot reduce it or set it aside, there is no power lodged anywhere to correct it. Because, if the circuit court has no power to grant a new trial, it has no power even to consider the grounds upon which a new trial would be ordered. Hence, as there could be no ruling, there could be no error of law in respect to all such matters of fact, and therefore nothing with respect thereto which this court could review. Again, under such holding, no matter how plainly it should be made to appear to the circuit judge that he had erred in matters of law, during the trial—in the admission or exclusion of evidence, or in his charge—and no matter how plainly it might appear that such errors had affected the verdict, he would be powerless to correct them, and the litigants would be compelled to undergo the unnecessary delay and expense of an appeal to this court.

Unless the language used by the lawmakers plainly required it, we would be inclined against a construction of the statute which might result in such unnecessary expense, inconvenience, and delay, and possibly a great and irremediable wrong. We see no reason for denying the power to the court in the trial of an issue to determine the value of land, and in granting it in the trial of an issue involving the title to the land, and we are satisfied the lawmakers did not intend to make any such difference.

[3] As both sides appealed from the verdict of the clerk's jury, the court correctly ruled that the landowners were entitled to open and reply on the trial in the circuit court. Railroad Co. v. Blake, 6 Rich. 634. Reversed.

GARY, C. J., and WOODS and WATTS, JJ., concur.

FRASER, J. (dissenting). This is a special proceeding in condemnation of land of the respondents for the use of the appellant company. The appeal is from the decision of Judge Ernest Gary in which he held: (1) That the appellants (respondents here) were entitled to the opening and reply; (2) that he had no right to grant a new trial nisi.

I. The statute gives the right to open and reply to the "appellant." Both parties appealed from the verdict of the jury before the clerk. The case of Railroad Co. v. Blake, 12 Rich. 650, after stating that in condemnation proceedings the right to open and reply is largely in the discretion of the judge, says: "We are of opinion, however, that in general, in the absence of contrary direction by the judge ordering the issue, the owner claiming damages has the right to open and conclude." This exception is overruled.

II. The second exception is as follows: "Second. His honor erred, it is submitted, also, in holding that he had no power or jurisdiction to grant a motion for a new trial nisi in a condemnation suit, and in refusing to entertain and grant said motion, it being respectfully submitted that the circuit judge has power to grant a new trial in a condemnation case as well as other cases, and his honor should have considered the merits of the motion and should have granted a new trial nisi."

The Constitution, art. 9, § 20, says: "No right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation until full compensation therefor shall be first made to the owner or secured by a deposit of money, irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation, which compensation shall be ascertained by a jury of twelve men, in a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law."

"Which compensation shall be ascertained by a jury of twelve men": If the judge grants a new trial nisi and thereby alters the amount in any way, the compensation is fixed by the judge and not by the jury. To allow the compensation to be fixed by the judge, and not by the jury of 12 men, would be to repeal this constitutional protection to the landowner. The Judicial Department is as much bound by the Constitution as the Executive and Legislative Departments. There is no such thing as an "inherent power" that overrides the Constitution. It is hardly necessary to quote the statute because it cannot change the Constitution. The act cannot empower any other than a jury of 12 men to ascertain the compensation. When the statute says "the question of compensation shall be thereupon submitted to a jury in open court, whose verdict shall be final and conclusive," it declares the law in full accord with the Constitution and is a legitimate exercise of legislative power and binding. When the statute goes on to say "unless a new trial shall be ordered by the Supreme Court," it must be held to mean that the new trial shall be ordered for a cause for which the Supreme Court is empowered by the Constitution to order a new trial, to wit, for errors of law committed in the trial.

In my opinion the second exception ought to be overruled.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al. v. DICKSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DEATH (§ 55*)—ACTIONS FOR CAUSING DEATH—PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

In an action brought by a mother for the homicide of her son, where the original petition alleged in substance that the son contributed to her support, it was amendable by alleging that she was also dependent upon him for support. Ellison v. Georgia Railroad Co., 87 Ga. 691, 13 S. E. 809.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 72; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. DEPOSITIONS (§ 90*)—USE IN EVIDENCE—PRESENCE OF WITNESS.

Where, under the provisions of the Civil Code 1910, § 5910 et seq., depositions of a witness are taken for use in a case pending, at the trial of such case the depositions so taken may, in the discretion of the court, be read in evidence, notwithstanding the presence of the witness at the trial. W. & A. R. Co. v. Bussey, 95 Ga. 584 (1), 23 S. E. 207.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Depositions, Cent. Dig. §§ 258-260; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 125*)—PRESENTING QUESTION IN TRIAL COURT—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

One ground of the motion for new trial was that, after the engineer of the train which killed the plaintiff's son had testified as to his experience as a locomotive engineer, and as to his observation as to the "way a moving train will pull a person," the court refused to permit the witness to testify as to "the manner in which a train in forward motion will pull or jerk such person catching hold of the same." As it does not appear from the ground of the motion what would have been the testimony of the witness on the point, had he been permitted to testify, no point is presented for decision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 254, 255; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1056*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS NOT NECESSARY TO DECISION.

Inasmuch as this court holds that the plaintiff made out no case authorizing a recovery, considering the depositions to which objections were made along with other evidence in the case, it is unnecessary to discuss points raised in regard to their admissibility, especially in view of the peculiar facts and circumstances under which the objection and motion to exclude were made and the time of the making thereof—a situation which is not likely to arise again. If the depositions should be offered in evidence upon another trial, such proper objections as may be raised to them can then be passed upon, not complicated by the peculiar circumstances under which the ruling was made at the last trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4187-4193; Dec. Dig. § 1056.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 80*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EFFECT.

Where one knowingly and voluntarily takes a risk of physical injury, the danger of which is so obvious that the act of taking such a risk, in and of itself, amounts to a failure to exercise ordinary care and diligence for his own safety, damages resulting from a hurt thus occasioned are not recoverable, although the same may be in part attributable to the negligence of the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 84, 85; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fayette County; R. T. Daniel, Judge.

Action by H. T. Dickson against the Southern Railway Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

C. E. Battle and Howell Hollis, both of Columbus, and Blalock & Culpepper, of Fayetteville, for plaintiffs in error. J. W. Wise, of Fayetteville, and R. R. Arnold, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. Mrs. H. T. Dickson brought an action against J. A. Kenney and the Southern Railway Company for the alleged wrongful homicide of the plaintiff's minor son, Will A. Dickson. So much of the petition as is now material was as follows: "(3) Petitioner further shows that Will A. Dickson was a son of your petitioner, being 20 years old and unmarried, and living with your petitioner and waiting on her, and contributing to her support and comfort and looking after her welfare. (4) Petitioner further shows that she was entitled to the services and labor and association of the said Will A. Dickson, her minor son; your petitioner's husband, and the father of the said Will A. Dickson, being dead. (5) Your petitioner further shows that she is a widow, and the said Will A. Dickson being the only minor son of petitioner, and the only one whom petitioner had to live with her and protect her and labor and work for her."

The original petition was demurred to. One of the grounds of demurrer was that it did not appear from the allegations of the petition "that the plaintiff was dependent upon her son, wholly or in part, for her support." To meet this ground, the third paragraph of the petition, quoted above, was amended, over the objection of defendants, by adding to such paragraph the following allegation: "And upon whom your petitioner was dependent for support; your petitioner being a widow with two girls living with her, and no other man to work for and support her." The ground of demurrer above stated, was then urged to the petition as amended, and was overruled, to which judgment the defendants excepted pendente lite. On the trial at a subsequent term, a verdict was rendered in behalf of the plaintiff, and the defendants' motion for a new trial being overruled, they excepted, assigning error, also, upon the exceptions pendente lite. The petition alleged that the plaintiff's son was killed about 5:20 o'clock p. m. on November 27, 1909, by being run over by a freight train, on which the defendant Kenney was engineer, at a public crossing over the track of the Southern Railway Company in the city of Fayetteville, this state. According to the petition, it was dark at the time of the homicide. The engine was running backwards, pulling a regular freight train having a tender and cars in front of the engine, with no lights on them, and no headlight on the engine. Other negligence alleged in the petition was as follows: "Said engineer and said Southern Railway Company did not slow up and slacken the speed of said train, so as to have the same under control as it approached the said crossing, where the said Will A. Dickson was killed, as alleged, said train being run at said time at a rapid rate of speed, to wit, at a speed of 30 miles per hour, and did not slacken and slow up and continue to slacken the speed of said train as it approached said crossing, so as to have the same under control, as the law requires in such cases." The answer of the defendants denied the material allegations of the petition.

There was evidence in behalf of the plaintiff to the effect that there were two tracks of the Southern Railway, one the main line, the other a side track crossing the public crossing on which the plaintiff contended that her son was struck and killed, at the time alleged, by a freight train running north on the main line, which was to the right, or east, of the side track, and that the engine pulling the train was running backwards, with the tender and a freight car in front or ahead of it, with no lights, either on the engine, the tender, or the freight car in front; that the body of the deceased was found to the left or west of the main line, and near the rail on that side, about 20 or 30 yards north of the crossing; and there were signs as if something had been dragged along near the left rail of the main track from a point from 5 to 10 feet north of the crossing towards where the body was found, with a little blood on some leaves 4 or 5 feet further north from where it appeared something had been dragged. A piece of skull was found by the side of the track, about 10 feet north of the place where the body was found. A witness for the plaintiff, who said he was a passenger on the train that killed plaintiff's son, testified: "It was kind of dark, and I recollect when it [the train] passed Hampton's crossing [whereon plaintiff claimed her son was killed]. It didn't blow for the crossing, and was running 30 or 35 miles an hour, as well as I can come at it." While there was some diversity in the testimony of the witnesses for the plaintiff as to whether it was dark at the time of the homicide, all of them who testified with reference to the train said that they saw the train as it approached the crossing. The plaintiff herself testified on this subject that "it was getting dark on the evening Will was killed," and that she saw the train before it reached the crossing, but could not see well enough to tell how the engine was running, whether backwards or forwards, because of the darkness.

It does not appear from the record that any one saw the plaintiff's son at the time he was killed. Lindsay Pyrom, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that on the day of the homicide the witness and a boy named Sam Ross left Fayetteville about sundown, and drove a wagon across the railroad at the public crossing south of the depot, whereon the plaintiff contended her son was killed. As Pyrom was the only witness for the plaintiff who saw the deceased immediately before he was killed, we quote all of his testimony that we deem material. He testified: "When we approached the crossing, Mr. Will Dickson hollered to me to hurry up and cross, that the train was coming, and I did hurry up and crossed. At the time that Mr. Dickson spoke he was standing. He had come down a little slant from his house, coming towards town. He was just coming up to the railroad. He was off of the crossing and coming to the crossing. He was coming from the house, going towards the crossing. He was in the big road when he hollered to me. When he called that the train was coming, I jerked up the lines and hit the mules and hurried across the track. Mr. Dickson went upon the track. He passed close to the wagon, and we went over the railroad. He was going straight across the track. When I looked up the last time and saw Mr. Dickson, I did not see the train. The train was right at me before I saw it, as close as that window, about 12 or 15 feet. I could not see it before. It didn't have any light on the train. The engine did not blow for that crossing. The train missed me about this far [indicating with his hands]. The wagon got fastened against the post at the crossing. I should say that it missed us 2½ feet. The last time I saw Mr. Dickson, he was going over the right-hand rail. I don't know, don't remember, how far the train run before it stopped. In order to get away from the post, I had to back onto the track. * * * As I have stated, when I last saw Mr. Dickson, he was going upon the railroad. If he went up between the track and the embankment, I did not see him. I was whipping my mules when I saw him last, and the train was right on him."

On cross-examination he testified: "When I first saw Mr. Dickson, he was standing in the road pretty close to the crossing; and this was when he called to me. At that time I was mighty nigh on the track. He said to me: 'Hurry up and cross; the train is coming.' I hurried and barely got across. He did not stand there. We crossed about the same time. I started to whip the mules, and they run and got across. The post to which the wagon was caught was the sign-board standing by the side of the railroad and of the dirt road. I was sitting on the right of the wagon, driving. Sam Ross was sitting by me. He was on the side of the seat next to Mr. Dickson. * * * I was doing all I could to keep the mules from running away, and trying to keep the train from hitting me. I looked at Mr. Dickson, because he was watching me to see that I got across. I hurried up. Yes, sir; he was afraid that I would be hit by the train; I guess that he was. He was hurrying me up to keep me from being hit by the train. He was standing there urging me to go across as fast as I could, and me and him started across at the same time. The mules started to run from the side track. At that time Mr. Dickson was right on the other side of the railroad, and was hurrying me to cross. He only spoke once, and told me to hurry. He feared that I would get hit. After he told me, I got in view of the train. I could not see it at the time that he told me. I started from town that afternoon. I don't know how far it is from the square out to the crossing. I could not tell whether it was 300 or 400 or 500 yards. I have no idea. I left the square about sundown. It was dark right after sundown. It was night when the sun went down. I testified in this matter before, when my depositions were taken. In that examination I testified that Mr. Will Dickson was coming down a little slant from his house. I did not afterwards say that nobody was in the wagon with me. I never said that, because I knew somebody was in the wagon with me. I testified before that Mr. Dickson hollered to me and told me to look out the train was coming, and that is correct. I stated in my former examination that at the time I was on the railroad, I was on the side track. In answer to the question in my former examination, how come him to tell me to hurry across, I answered, 'He said that I didn't hear it.' That is a fact. He hollered and told me that the train was coming. That is correct; at that time the train was no piece from me. That was correct. Q. 'Did you look and see the train?' A. 'Yes, sir; time I looked I saw it.' That answer

I gave in my former examination, and it is correct. I did not look on the side track; I looked when I was on the main line. It was not far when we got on the railroad. In my former examination I testified: 'He had not got on the track when he told me to hurry up. The mules were near to it; the wagon was not. I was going at a slow walk when he hollered to me.' That is the way it was. I then went across in a hurry. I was not frightened much. If I had been frightened, I would have jumped out of the wagon. * * * When Mr. Will Dickson hollered to me to hurry up, I might have been six feet from the main line. I was on the west side of the side track. He was standing pretty close to the crossing, and we started across the crossing at the same time. I saw the train when I was on the main line. I was driving to get out of the way. I was hurrying to get away from it, and he passed me and went onto the track. When he passed me, I had got over the crossing; but the hind part of the wagon was not. He passed right by the wagon as I passed over the crossing. I do not know in what direction Mr. Dickson turned after he passed me. I do not know whether he passed between the track of the main line and the embankment. If he did, I did not see him. I do not know what direction he took. The mules were trying to back into the track, and I was whipping them to keep the track from striking the wagon; and while I was doing so I was not noticing Mr. Dickson. I was not looking back. He had passed me before I got hung to the post. As I have stated, I was on the west side of the track when Mr. Dickson called me to go across; that the train was coming. In my former examination, I stated that I was on the west side of the side track when he called to me that the train was coming; and that is correct. Mr. Dickson had hurried me across, and after he had hurried me across he stepped on the track himself. * * * I whipped the mules to keep from being killed. * * * I didn't hear it rolling. The train was sneaking upon me."

The theory of the defendant was that Will Dickson was not killed on the crossing, but that he ran towards the north across the track in front of the train, and endeavored to mount a box car while in motion, and was thrown or fell from it and was killed. There was evidence tending to support this theory.

[1-4] 1-4. The matters dealt with in the headnotes 1 to 4, inclusive, do not, when considered in connection with statement of facts, need any elaboration. The grounds of the demurrer, other than the one ruled on, are clearly without merit, and call for no further discussion.

[5] 5. After a most careful examination of the evidence submitted in behalf of the plaintiff below, and viewing it in the most favorable light for the plaintiff, we are clearly of the opinion that it was wholly insufficient to support the verdict; and that the trial judge, for this reason, erred in refusing a new trial. Granting that the decedent was killed upon the public crossing, and that the defendants were negligent in not observing the law in reference to approaching it, the evidence of the plaintiff's witness Pyrom, which is fully set forth in the statement of facts, and which tends more strongly than the testimony of any other witness for the plaintiff to show that the homicide occurred on such crossing, clearly indicates, to our minds, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. From Pyrom's testimony, it is manifest that the decedent knew of the near approach of the train to the crossing. He was standing near the crossing in a position from which he could see the approaching train, so far as the evidence showed to the contrary. He was urging Pyrom "to hurry up and cross; that the train was coming"—and "to go across as fast as [he] could." Pyrom whipped his mules and hurried across the track, barely getting over; the train missing the rear of his wagon only some 2½ feet. Decedent, though urging Pyrom to hurry across, started to cross the main line himself from the opposite direction at the same time Pyrom was crossing it, and passed close to the wagon as he went onto the track. The last Pyrom saw of decedent the latter "was going over the right-hand rail," which was the first rail he came to in crossing the main line. The body of the wagon had not then passed over the main line. Pyrom had then seen the train. Decedent must have then seen it also. At all events, he was fully aware of its near approach before Pyrom knew of it, as he warned Pyrom of it, and urged him to hurry up and get across as fast as he could, in order to avoid the train. Decedent was bound to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of the negligence of the defendants. This he evidently failed to do. He knowingly and voluntarily took the risk of injury to himself by attempting to pass immediately in front of the approaching train; the danger of the act being so obvious to him as to amount, in and of itself, to a manifest failure to exercise ordinary care for his own safety. If the defendants were negligent in approaching the public crossing, such negligence was existing, and must necessarily, from the testimony of Pyrom, have been apparent to the decedent when he attempted to cross the track. The rule is so well settled, by numerous decisions of this court, as not to need their citation that, if, after the negligence of the defendant commenced, the decedent became aware thereof, or by the exercise of ordinary care should have become aware thereof, and thereafter failed to exercise ordinary and reasonable care and diligence for his own safety, there could be no recovery. While the question of ordinary care is generally to be determined by the jury, yet where, as in the case at bar, it is manifest from the evidence submitted in behalf of the plaintiff that the decedent knew of the defendants' negligence, and thereafter not only failed to exercise ordinary and reasonable care and diligence for his own safety, but voluntarily and recklessly took the risk of a danger that must necessarily have been obvious to him, then, in such circumstances, the court may say that there can be no recovery.

TALLEY v. MITCHELL et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 216*)—RENT—LIABILITY FOR DOUBLE RENT.

Where, under a contract for the rental of certain premises for a term of three years, the landlord was not required to rebuild in case of destruction of or damage to the building upon the property by reason of fire, but there was a stipulation that, "should the premises be destroyed or damaged by fire so as to be untenable, the conditions of this lease shall cease from the date of the fire until the premises shall be restored to as good condition as they were in previous to the fire;" and where during the term a fire occurred, causing a large portion of the premises to be untenable, but the tenant refused either to deliver possession or pay rent, though continuing to use a portion of the property, under a statutory proceeding to dispossess him, to which he interposed a counter affidavit, he was liable for double rent.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 216*)—RENT—LIABILITY FOR DOUBLE RENT.

Under such facts, the tenant was liable for double the contractual rate of rental, and could not reduce such amount by showing that after the fire the value of the premises for rent was much less than before.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 861-865; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

3. REJECTION OF EVIDENCE.

None of the rulings in regard to rejecting evidence require a new trial.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1140*)—LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 216*)—RECOVERY OF DOUBLE RENT—DISPOSITION OF COSTS—AFFIRMANCE ON CONDITION.

Under the proceeding authorized by the Civil Code 1910, § 5385 et seq., double rent cannot be recovered from a tenant prior to demand for possession; nor is such action an appropriate one for the recovery of rent due under the contract prior to such demand.

(a) It not clearly appearing how long before the commencement of the proceeding demand for possession was made, it is directed that if, within 20 days from the filing of the remittitur in the office of the clerk of the superior court, the plaintiffs will write off from verdict and judgment $400, to cover the double rent included therein prior to the beginning of the action, the judgment will stand affirmed; otherwise it will be reversed.

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 231*)—LIABILITY FOR DOUBLE RENT—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover double rent, where a tenant retained possession and refused to pay rent after a fire, the exclusion of a letter from an agent of the landlord, expressing the opinion that the fire canceled the lease, and offering a new lease on the rear end of the lot, and one stating unwillingness that the tenant should build till a satisfactory arrangement had been made, were properly excluded.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by Mrs. E. J. Mitchell and others against W. M. Talley. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed on condition.

R. B. Blackburn and L. Z. Rosser, both of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. C. W. Smith and M. A. Hale, both of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. John J. Woodside, as agent for Mrs. E. J. Mitchell and Mrs. G. M. Bridges, made affidavit and obtained a warrant for the eviction of W. M. Talley from certain premises. The affidavit alleged "that said tenant fails to pay the rent now due on said house and premises; and that the said tenant is holding said house and premises over and beyond the term for which the same were rented to him;" also that demand had been made upon him for delivery of possession, which had been refused. The defendant filed a counter affidavit, in which he denied that the rent claimed to be due was so, and also denied that he was holding over and beyond his term. He further pleaded that, under the terms of the contract of rental, it was agreed that, if the premises should be destroyed or damaged by fire so as to be untenable, the conditions of the lease should cease until the premises should be restored to as good condition as they were in previous to the fire; that a fire occurred, "destroying the front end of said building in such a way as to make a large portion of said premises untenable"; that he immediately gave notice to the renting agent, and requested that the premises be restored to a tenantable condition; that the plaintiffs "have refused and still refuse to restore the premises partially destroyed by fire to the condition in which they were prior to said fire"; and that they are not entitled to recover against him. He also denied that any demand was made upon him for possession, or that any rent was due to the plaintiffs at the time of the commencement of the proceeding.

The contract of rental contained the following, among other, clauses: The tenant, "further agrees that he will deliver the premises at the expiration of this lease in as good order and repair as when first received (natural wear and tear excepted). Said John J. Woodside, agent, agrees that, should the premises be destroyed or damaged by fire so as to be untenable, the conditions of this lease shall cease from the date of the fire until the premises shall be restored to as good condition as they were in previous to the fire. * * * It is further agreed by both parties to this contract that the said second party shall take the above described premises in their present condition, knowing the premises are in bad repair and agreeing to make such repairs and improvements as are necessary at his own, the said second party's, expense, and further to require no repairs or improvements from said owner or agent."

The jury found for the plaintiffs $2,500. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted.

[1] 1. The contract of rental involved in the present case has been before this court on a former occasion. It was then held that the contract imposed on the lessor no obligation to effect a restoration of the premises after the building was destroyed or damaged by fire. Woodside v. Talley, 135 Ga. 337, 69 S. E. 492. The tenant, therefore, had no right to contend that he was relieved from the payment of the rental provided in the contract, on the ground that the lessor was guilty of a breach of duty in not restoring the premises to their previous condition. If the landlord was not required to repair or rebuild, either there was no duty to do so, or it rested on the tenant. If there was a duty on his part to make such restoration, he could take no advantage of his failure to do so. If there was no duty of restoration, but a mere privilege, did the occurrence of the fire and the damage resulting therefrom operate, by virtue of the terms of the contract, to relieve the tenant, either permanently or until a restoration could be made, from the payment of rent, he retaining possession and using the premises?

In Snook & Austin Furniture Co. v. Steiner & Emery, 117 Ga. 363, 43 S. E. 775, the lease contract provided that, "should the leased premises be destroyed by fire," the lessors "are to rebuild the same with all reasonable dispatch, at their option, and that from the time of such fire until the rebuilding has been completed the rent shall abate for such time." It was held that, if, after the buildings were totally destroyed by fire, the lessors promptly notified the lessee that they elected to rebuild, and thereupon proceeded with all ordinary diligence to erect a structure substantially like that destroyed, the relation of lessor and lessee was suspended until the new building was ready for occupancy, when the rights and obligations of both under the lease were renewed; but that it was optional with the lessors whether they would rebuild; and that if they notified the lessee that they elected not to rebuild, or that they would rebuild a different kind of structure, the tenant was relieved from the obligation to pay rent, and was no longer entitled to possession of the vacant premises. In the opinion the following was quoted approvingly from Buschman v. Wilson, 29 Md. 553: "The clause with reference to the cessation of rent implies an obligation on the part of the tenants to surrender the premises upon the occurrence of the event that released them from the further payment of rent. Any other construction would work gross injustice, and contravene the plain purpose and design of the parties." It was also added: "Complete surrender of the premises is a condition precedent to the tenant's release from liability for rent under statutes containing provisions substantially similar to the contract here." 24 Cyc. 1160.

In the case now under consideration, the contract provided that, should the premises be destroyed or damaged by fire so as to be untenable, "the conditions of this lease shall cease from the date of the fire until the premises shall be restored to as good condition as they were in previous to the fire." It will be noticed that this provided, not merely for an abatement of the rent, but for a cessation of "the conditions" of the lease. This included the right of use by the tenant, as well as any of the other stipulations. But if this provision of the contract should be treated as identical with that in the case of Snook & Austin, supra, the tenant does not set up in his affidavit or show by evidence that the premises were untenable. In his counter affidavit he says that "a large portion of said premises" was untenable after the fire, and in another place that the landlord refused to restore the premises "partially destroyed by fire." The evidence shows that he continued to occupy the premises after the fire until just before the trial of the case. His position apparently was that the premises, though damaged, were sufficiently tenantable to occupy, but not to require him to pay rent. If he had a right to terminate the tenancy, he should have done so, and not have claimed the benefits of occupancy for himself, while refusing the corresponding payment of rent to the landlord. Having continued to occupy and use the premises he continued to be liable for the rent.

[2] 2. It was contended that, if the defendant was wrongfully holding over, he was a tenant at sufferance, and was liable only for double what the rent of the premises was shown to be worth, and not for double the contract rental. The affidavit, made for the purpose of evicting the tenant, alleged that he failed to pay the rent due, and was also holding over beyond his term. The written contract showed that the term had not expired by lapse of time. From what has been said above, it will appear that the defendant was not in a position to contend that the obligation to pay rent had terminated by reason of the fire. The Civil Code, section 5389, declares that, if the issue provided for in the preceding sections should be found against the tenant, "judgment shall go against him for double the rent reserved or stipulated to be paid, or, if he be a tenant at will or sufferance, then for double what the rent of the premises is shown to be worth"; and that a writ of possession shall issue. Under section 5385, a demand for possession and refusal or omission to deliver it is necessary before commencing such proceedings. There can be no eviction of the tenant until it is wrong for him to continue to hold adversely to the landlord. If it should be held that, whenever he ought to deliver on demand and fails to do so, he becomes a tenant at sufferance, and is liable only for double what may be proved to be the rental value of the property, then the portion of the section in regard to recovering double the rent "reserved or stipulated to be paid" would have no room for application. It is evident that the statute contemplated cases in which it should become wrongful for the tenant to continue to hold possession against his landlord's demand, and in which he might be ousted, and at the same time double the stipulated rent might be recovered. This is just such a case as the statute contemplates. The time to which the tenancy was to continue, subject to the terms and stipulations of the contract, was April 30, 1911. The fire occurred in April, 1909. The tenant then ceased to pay rent. The proceeding to dispossess him was commenced in July of that year. The presiding judge submitted to the jury the question of whether there had been a demand for possession, and they found that there was. We thus have a case, not of a tenant holding over after the expiration of the time mentioned in the contract of rental, but of a tenant refusing to pay rent or deliver the premises, without sufficient legal ground therefor. The rate named in the contract was $50 per month. The defendant contended that after the fire the premises were not worth above $10 per month. The court ruled that if the plaintiffs were entitled to recover they could recover double rent at the contractual rate, and rejected evidence to show the reduced rental value after the fire. In this he ruled correctly. See Purtell v. Farris, 137 Ga. 318, 73 S. E. 634.

[3, 5] 3. Several rulings in regard to the rejection of evidence were assigned as error. The foregoing discussion covers the merits of the case, so far as the rights of the plaintiffs to recover are concerned. None of the rulings mentioned furnish any ground for a new trial. Certain letters from the agent of the plaintiffs to the attorney of the defendant were rejected. In one of them he expressed the opinion that the result of the fire was to cancel the lease, and stated that "we" would entertain a wish on the part of the tenant to make a new lease on the rear end of the lot. In another he stated that he had been informed that the tenant was preparing to build an office on the front end of the lot, and that "we" are unwilling that this should be done until a satisfactory arrangement has been made. One of these letters was dated April 20, and the other April 28, 1909, after the tenant had given a check for the payment of the rent for April, due on the 1st day of that month, and had later stopped its payment. Under the pleadings and evidence, the rejection of such letters does not require a reversal.

[4] 4. The remedy provided by the statute for the summary eviction of a tenant is primarily one for the recovery of possession, and not a suit to recover ordinary rent due prior to the demand by the landlord for possession. The statutory provision authorizing the recovery of double rent imposes this liability upon the tenant who improperly falls or refuses to deliver possession upon demand, and resists the proceeding to dispossess him by his landlord. Such a liability does not attach to the tenant, merely because he fails to pay rent when it is due, nor until demand by the landlord. The recovery in the case before us evidently includes double rent from the 1st day of April, 1909, thus giving double rent prior to the date of the demand. Whatever remedy the landlord may have for the rent due prior to the demand, it is not to be enforced by giving him double rent under the statute. Willis v. Harrell, 118 Ga. 906, 45 S. E. 794. The exact date on which demand for possession was made cannot be fixed with certainty by this court. The agent for the plaintiffs testified that, "prior to the issuing of the dispossessionary warrant, on the 28th day of July, 1909, he made demand on Talley for possession of the premises." It is therefore directed that if the plaintiff shall, within 20 days from the filing of the remittitur in the office of the clerk of the superior court, write off from the recovery the sum of $400, to cover the double rent included in the verdict as accruing prior to the commencement of the proceeding, the judgment will stand affirmed; otherwise it is reversed.

Judgment affirmed on condition. All the Justices concur.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 10, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 22*)—ACTION—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

By section 2798 of Civil Code 1910, the court of the county in which a contract is to be performed has jurisdiction of a suit brought to recover damages by one railroad company against another such company, alleging a breach of such contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 46-50; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

2. RAILROADS (§§ 142, 143*)—CONSOLIDATION—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—LIABILITY OF PARTY.

Where the stockholders of a railroad corporation authorize its board of directors to "purchase, absorb, and merge into itself the stock, property, assets, etc." of another designated railroad corporation, which is done accordingly, and by the terms of a contract entered into by the acquired railroad, prior to its acquisition by the other corporations, it is provided that "all covenants and agreements herein contained shall be binding upon the successors and assigns of the parties hereto," the acquisition of the one railroad corporation by the other constitutes a merger and not a sale.

(a) The acquiring corporation by reason of the merger becomes liable for the payment of all unpaid debts and unperformed contracts of the acquired corporation, and is bound by the terms of the contract entered into between the latter and another corporation prior to the merger.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 392, 444-450; Dec. Dig. §§ 142, 143.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 144*)—CONTRACTS—ACTIONS BETWEEN RAILROADS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The verdict was demanded by the evidence, and the court did not err, under the facts of this case, in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 392, 393, 451-455; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

Error from Superior Court, Glynn County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company against the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company brought its suit against the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company for the recovery of the sum of $730.29, alleged to have arisen and become due from the breach of a contract originally made between the plaintiff and the Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company, the predecessor in title of the plaintiff in error. The contract was in respect to certain changes in the track of the plaintiff, as the same was at that time laid in a street in Brunswick, Glynn county, Ga., which the Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company desired made. The latter company also desired to lay a track in a street in said city and county, and there was not sufficient room between the track of the plaintiff and the eastern line of the street to allow the Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company to lay its proposed track, and therefore it was necessary for the latter company either to condemn private property to the east of the street, or to contract with the plaintiff to remove its track further to the west before the desired track could be laid. The Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company agreed to contract to pay the expense "of changing the track of the second party from its present location to its proposed position, including all filling necessary to be done for the laying of the track of the second party on such new location at the grade as shown in blueprint or map attached, and also whatever expense may be incurred in making said filling permanent and satisfactory; and should said fill hereafter settle or give way, then the same shall be repaired and restored by the first party, or by the second party at the expense of the first party, provided such settlement or caving shall not be caused by the failure of the second party to maintain its present wharf or bulkhead on the line of the Atlantic Land & Improvement Company's property on Academy creek; it being understood that the first party is under no obligation or duty to maintain said wharf or bulkhead on the wharf of Academy creek. * * * It is further understood and agreed that the second party will change its present track location between L. and O. streets in the new town of the city of Brunswick so as to occupy the new location marked 'Proposed line of A. C. L. R. R.,' and the second party will do the same as promptly as the circumstances will permit, and in doing thereof will charge the party of the first part with all expense of all character arising by reason, not only of the filling in and grading of the new location, the laying of the tracks, cost of ties and appurtenances rendered requisite by the change of line, but as well such other filling as may be made to insure permanency in the maintenance of said fill and new tracks of the second party, and the first party hereby binds itself that it will, within fifteen (15) days from receipt of any bill or bills rendered its general manager, promptly repay unto the second party in making such changes, grading and filling, and the first party binds itself to hereafter and from time to time pay any and all proper charges which may arise in the repairing or restoring such new embankment so to be constructed for the track of the second party, should the first party become liable therefor under the contract. * * *

After such new fill is constructed and the track of the second party laid thereon as herein provided, the cost of ordinary maintenance of said fill or track thereon shall be borne by the second party, it being the intent of this contract that after said fill is once constructed and made permanent by the first party to the satisfaction of the second party, that any expense in maintaining said fill or track thereon shall be borne by the second party, save or except such expense as is caused by giving away or caving of the said fill shall always be paid for and borne by the first party, its successors and assigns, provided such caving in or giving away shall not be caused by the failure of the second party to maintain said wharf-line bulkhead on Academy creek." The petition alleged: That the Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company "is now, by consolidation and merger," the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company; that the terms of the contract are binding upon the defendant; that in pursuance of the terms of the contract the track of the petitioner was removed to the westward of its original location on said street to the new location named in the contract; that the track as removed rested and lay upon made ground, or a fill, and before the same had become settled and permanent, on account of rains during the months of May and June, 1906, the fill or foundation of petitioner's track became washed away and caved in so as to need and require repairs; that such giving away and caving in was not caused by the failure of petitioner to maintain its wharf-line bulkhead on Academy creek, but that this had been kept and maintained by petitioner in good order and condition; that defendant was notified of the condition of plaintiff's roadbed and requested to make the needed repairs under the terms of the contract, but failed to do so; that plaintiff made the necessary repairs to said roadbed and temporary bulkhead, at an actual cost and expense to plaintiff of the sum of $730.29; and that said sum was a reasonable cost of such repairs. An itemized statement of such cost and expense in making the repairs was attached. A special demurrer to two of the items included in the exhibit, amounting to about $15, was sustained, and these items stricken. No exception was taken to this ruling. A general demurrer to the petition was overruled, and error is assigned on this ruling. Upon call for trial the defendant made a motion to dismiss the case, on the ground, among others, that the court was without jurisdiction over the defendant on the case as laid. The court overruled this motion, and exceptions were taken. The plaintiff introduced evidence tending to support the material allegations in the petition. There seems to have been no issue of fact. On the close of the plaintiff's evidence defendant moved for a nonsuit. The motion was overruled, and this ruling was excepted to. No evidence was offered by the defendant, and its counsel asked the court to direct a verdict for it. The court, instead, directed a verdict for the plaintiff, which ruling is made one ground of assignment of error by the defendant.

Bolling Whitfield, of Brunswick, for plaintiff in error. Bennet, Twitty & Reese, of Brunswick, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Error is assigned because the court below overruled a general demurrer to the petition, and a motion to dismiss the case on the ground that the petition showed that the superior court of Glynn county was without jurisdiction to entertain the suit. It is insisted that the suit must be brought in the county of the principal office of the company, Fulton, and that any judgment obtained elsewhere is utterly void, unless the cause of action comes within the provision of Civil Code 1910, § 2798. It is contended that this is not a case in which the right to sue elsewhere than in the county of the defendant's principal place of business is given by statute. We cannot agree to this contention. Our Civil Code 1910, § 2798, broadly declares: "All railroad companies shall be sued in the county in which the cause of action originated, by any one whose person or property has been injured by such railroad company, its officers, agents, or employees, for the purpose of recovering damages for such injuries; and also on all contracts made or to be performed in the county where suit is brought; any judgment rendered in any other county than the one in which the cause so originated shall be utterly void. But if the cause of action arises in a county where the railroad company liable to suit has no agent, then suit may be brought in the county of the residence of such company." The contract was to be performed in Glynn county, where the suit was brought. It will thus appear that the venue of the suit was properly laid in that county. For a general discussion of the history of the above section of the Code, see Bracewell v. Southern Ry. Co., 134 Ga. 537, 541, 68 S. E. 98.

[2] 2. Was the contract entered into between the Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company and the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company one of merger or of sale? It is insisted that the contract is one of sale, and that the fact that the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company was the successor in title to the original contractor, the Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company, did not make it liable as its predecessor might have been to the plaintiff under the contract, for the reason that it was a contract between two companies, and, without more, expired when the Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company parted with its title to the property described in that contract, and that the contract was not binding upon any subsequent assignee of the Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company. In support of this contention, the plaintiff in error cites the case of Hawkins v. Central of Georgia Railway Co., 119 Ga. 159, 46 S. E. 82, and refers especially to page 164 of 119 Ga., to page 84 of 46 S. E., where it is said that, "where a railroad has a right to sell, the buyer is not responsible for more than the purchase price," and that the court held the purchaser not liable for the duty of its predecessor in title, unless it was assumed in the purchase, or cast upon it by operation of law. But we think, from a careful reading of the contract, that this is a merger and not a sale. The action of the stockholders of the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company, authorizing the acquisition of this property, resolved to "purchase, absorb, and merge into itself the stock, property, and assets," etc., of the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company. It seems, therefore, that the intention of those acquiring this property was that it should be a merger. In the case of the A. B. & A. Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 127 Ga. 392, 56 S. E. 482, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1119, it was held that: "Where two corporations effect a consolidation, and one of them goes entirely out of existence, and no arrangements are made respecting its liabilities, the resulting consolidated corporation will, as a general rule, be entitled to all the property and answerable for all the liabilities of the corporation thus absorbed." The petition alleged that the Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company "is now by consolidation and merger" the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company, and that the terms of the contract are binding upon it.

The main contention in the case is, not so much that the defendant company is not liable because of the merger, but that there is no liability at all; that whatever damage was repaired was on account of the bulkhead of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. But the evidence in the record does not bear out this contention. It appears that the temporary bulkhead was the only one damaged, and the only one on account of which the work was done for which a charge was made. And this being true, the recovery was proper; the repairs being made on account of temporary bulkhead coming within the terms of the contract.

[3] 3. Error is assigned, because the evidence of the plaintiff in the court below was insufficient to show that the reasonable, actual cost of making the repairs, as claimed by the plaintiff, amounted to the sum found to be due by the jury, viz., $715.14; and that the cost of the material was not shown, nor its market value; and that the expense for making the repairs on the bulkhead was placed by the contractor upon the plaintiff and not upon the defendant. A proper construction of the contract was that the plaintiff was only bound to repair damages to the fill on A. street, caused by caving, settling, etc., in the event damage was occasioned by the giving way of the wharf bulkhead on Academy creek, and that any such damage not thus caused was to be repaired by or at the expense of the defendant. The evidence shows that there was no giving way or other defect in the wharf bulkhead on Academy creek, nor any repairs necessary thereon; it remaining in good condition. The contract did not exempt the defendant from any damage occasioned by the giving way of the temporary bulkhead, which the evidence shows to have occurred. The defendant therefore was liable under the contract to bear the expenses of repairs for which suit was brought.

We think the evidence sustained the allegations as laid in the petition. This being true, and no evidence being offered by the defendant denying the correctness of the account sued upon, the verdict was demanded.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WESTERN & A. R. CO. v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 47*) — TELEGRAPH LINE—RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY.

A telegraph company may condemn a right of way on and along the right of way of a railroad company, when the proposed line of telegraph will be so constructed as to produce no material interference with the railroad company's free exercise of its franchise or with the actual operation of the railroad.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-120; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 10*) — TELEGRAPH LINE ON RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY.

It is not a prerequisite to the exercise of such right of condemnation that the telegraph company should first file with the railroad commission its consent that the commission shall have jurisdiction over it for the purpose of regulating tolls on messages originating and ending within the state of Georgia.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-48; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 47*) — TELEGRAPH LINE ON RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY.

A telegraph company may not condemn a railroad company's right of way on both sides of the track, at least without making it appear that it is necessary to occupy both sides and that the railroad company's operation of its trains is not materially interfered with.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-120; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 47*) — TELEGRAPH LINE ON RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY.

Where it appears that the demands of a modern railroad company are such that a telegraph system is a necessary auxiliary to its safe and proper operation, and where it appears that present telegraph service is afforded to the railroad company by an existing line of telegraph by virtue of a contract between the railroad company and the telegraph company, which contract is about to terminate, and where it appears that the existing lines are located on an advantageous portion of the right of way and that the railroad company, in order to obtain the necessary telegraphic service, intends and purposes, in good faith, to construct a line of its own on the location of the old telegraph line, relatively to the telegraph company proposing to condemn a right of way, the railroad company has a preferential selection of the route. Under such circumstances, the telegraph company will be enjoined from condemning the route which has been selected in good faith by the railroad company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-120; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

5. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 47*) — RAILROADS — RIGHT OF WAY—TELEGRAPH LINE.

A railroad company cannot defeat the exercise of the right of eminent domain by a telegraph company in constructing a line of telegraph on a portion of its right of way by the construction and maintenance of a line on both sides of its track, when a line on one side of its track is ample to furnish it with necessary telegraph service.

6. EMINENT DOMAIN (§§ 169, 177*) — TELEGRAPH LINE OVER STATE PROPERTY.

A telegraph company cannot construct a line of telegraph over the land of the state without permission of the state. Civil Code, § 2811, does not grant that permission except upon due compensation. That section allows condemnation of the state's land by telegraph companies upon the same plane as the right of way of a railroad company and private land. The lessee of the state's road has only a usufructuary interest therein, and this cannot be condemned by a telegraph company, separately and apart from the state, in the absence of legislative sanction. Any condemnation proceeding must be against both.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 461, 478, 480, 481, 483, 485; Dec. Dig. §§ 169, 177.*]

7. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 171*) — TELEGRAPH LINE—CONDEMNATION.

Where a telegraph company in its notice of condemnation seeks only to occupy a railroad company's right of way for the purpose of constructing and maintaining a telegraph line, the possibility of stringing telephone wires for the use of a telephone company is no objection to the right to condemn. When the telegraph company attempts to impose an additional servitude, the railroad company has its remedy against such act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 468, 469; Dec. Dig. § 171.*]

8. COMMERCE (§ 48*) — EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 47*) — TELEGRAPH LINE ON RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY.

A telegraph company will not be permitted to condemn the right of way of a railroad company for the construction and maintenance of lines of telegraph in such a manner as to materially interfere with the railroad company in the operation of its trains and in the transportation of passengers and goods. A telegraph line so constructed and maintained as not to interfere with the transportation of passengers and goods beyond the state is not a burden on interstate commerce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-44, 46; Dec. Dig. § 48;* Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-120; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

9. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 280*)—DAMAGES—DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

The ruling in the case of Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Postal Telegraph, etc., Co., 120 Ga. 268, 48 S. E. 15, 1 Ann. Cas. 734, that the measure of damages, where the right of way of a railroad company is taken by a telegraph company, is the value of the land actually taken, and the extent to which the use of the right of way by the railroad company is diminished by its use by the telegraph company, that the right of way of a railroad company has no general market value for other uses than that to which it is applied, and that peculiar advantages and benefits accruing to a telegraph company from its use of the railroad's right of way cannot be considered in the assessment of damages, has not the effect of putting the eminent domain laws of the state in opposition to the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 877-890; Dec. Dig. § 280.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Suit by the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company against the Western Union Telegraph Company to restrain proceedings to condemn a right of way for telegraph line along complainant's railroad. From a decree denying an injunction, complainant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Tye, Peeples & Jordan, of Atlanta, and Claude Waller, of Nashville, Tenn., for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. Many of the questions presented by this record are novel, and arise from the peculiar facts of the case. The state of Georgia owns a railroad extending between Atlanta and Chattanooga, Tenn. On the 19th day of July, 1890, by authority of the General Assembly (Acts 1889, p. 141), the railroad was leased to the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway for the period of 29 years from December 27, 1890. The leasing company by the terms of the act became a body corporate under the name and style of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company. Prior to the lease there had been erected on the right of way of the railroad a line or lines of telegraph poles and wires. At that time and continuously since a line of wire on these poles was set apart for the exclusive use of the lessee in the transaction of its railroad business. In 1891 another line of wire was strung for the exclusive use of the leasing company, at considerable cost to the lessee. And in 1906 a line of double wires and a line of single wire were stretched upon the same poles at segmental parts of the railroad, at considerable expense to, and for the exclusive use of, the leasing company in the operation of the railroad. In 1884 the Western Union Telegraph Company and the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway Company entered into a contract for the maintenance and operation of a telegraph line upon its own railroad and such other railroads that it might subsequently acquire by lease or purchase. This contract was to continue in force for 25 years from July 1, 1884, and thereafter until the expiration of one year after written notice by either party to terminate the contract. In this contract the telegraph company obligated itself to set apart one wire on the main line for the preferential use of the railroad company and agreed that, if the railroad company should require greater wire facilities, the telegraph company would furnish an additional wire at the cost price upon poles already erected, and that the railroad company at its own cost would string such additional wires. In August, 1911, the telegraph company gave to the railroad company written notice of its intention to terminate the contract after the expiration of one year. The telegraph company then opened up negotiations with the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company to purchase an easement for their line of poles and wires, which negotiation was fruitless. Whereupon the telegraph company served the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company with written notice of its purpose to condemn, along its right of way in this state, a right of way upon which to construct (when necessary), maintain, and operate its telegraph line. "The location of the right of way sought to be acquired is substantially that location now occupied by the telegraph line of the Western Union Telegraph Company along main line of your railroad from Atlanta, Ga., to the Tennessee line at or near Graysville, Ga., and along the branch line known as the Rome branch"; the main line running from Atlanta, Ga., to the Tennessee state line at or near Graysville, Ga., through the counties of Fulton, Cobb, Bartow, Gordon, Whitfield, and Catoosa, a distance of approximately 121.37 miles. The telegraph line will enter upon the right of way of the railroad company at the Marietta Street Bridge at the same point where it now enters upon the right of way, and continue upon the east side of the tracks a specified distance of about three miles, then to cross the tracks and continue on the west side, a specified distance, to a point north of the 5-mile post, then to cross the tracks and continue on the east side at a specified distance to the 6-mile post, at which point the line would divide, and part of the line cross to the west side of the tracks. From the 6-mile post to the Tennessee state line the line would extend on both sides of the track as now located, except at Marietta, Adairsville, Dalton, and Tunnel Hill. The right of way thus sought to be acquired by the telegraph company to be of sufficient width to enable it to conveniently construct (when necessary), maintain, and operate its line located and constructed substantially as follows: As many wires or cables of wire as might be necessary from time to time to transact the business of the telegraph company, to be strung on poles placed at an average distance from the center of the main line track of 27 feet, except where your right of way is limited or widened, with a minimum distance from edge of right of way (except where right of way is limited or widened) of 6 feet. Poles to have a length of not less than 20 feet, to be placed in the ground a depth of not less than 4 feet. At highways, railway crossings, depots, and side tracks, poles to have a height of from 25 to 40 feet above the ground, with an average of 40 poles per mile on both sides of the track from Atlanta, Ga., to Kingston, Ga., and of 80 poles per mile from Kingston, Ga., to the Tennessee line. "Said poles will nowhere be placed upon any of the embankments or in the cuts of your railway, nor will said wires be attached or fastened to any of the bridges or trestle work of said railway." There will be wires crossing the tracks from the main telegraph line to reach the offices of the telegraph company at various points mentioned along the railroad. At all points where the wires so cross the tracks, the lowest wires to be not less than 25 feet above the tracks. The term for which the condemnation was desired was the term expiring December 27, 1919, which date is the expiration of the railroad company's lease with the state. Thereupon the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company filed a petition to enjoin the proposed condemnation by the Western Union Telegraph Company. The telegraph company showed cause by demurrer and answer, and after hearing evidence the court refused an interlocutory injunction.

[1] 1. It is settled law in this state that a telegraph company, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain granted to it by the state, may condemn a right of way on and along the right of way of the railroad company when the proposed line of telegraph will be so constructed as to produce no material interference with the railroad company's free exercise of its franchise or with the actual operation of the road. Whether the construction of the telegraph line on a particular portion of the railroad's right of way will or will not materially interfere with the operation of the railroad is ordinarily a question of fact. Savannah, etc., Ry. Co. v. Postal Telegraph Co., 112 Ga. 941, 38 S. E. 353.

[2] 2. The railroad company denies that a telegraph company possesses any power of condemnation without first filing with the railroad commission of this state its consent that the railroad commission shall have jurisdiction over it for the purpose of regulating tolls charged on long-distance messages originating and ending within the state of Georgia. Originally the railroad commission of Georgia had jurisdiction only over railroads. In 1891 its authority and jurisdiction were extended so as to embrace telegraph companies and express companies. Acts of 1890-91, p. 151; Civil Code 1895, §§ 2217, 2218. In 1894 an act was passed providing for the condemnation of private property for public uses by all corporations or persons authorized to take or damage private property for public purposes. Civil Code, § 5206 et seq. In 1898 the provisions of this act were made applicable to telegraphic companies. Civil Code, § 5235. In 1905, section 2347 of the Code of 1895, which authorizes a telegraph company to construct, maintain, and operate telegraph lines through or over any lands of this state, and on, along, and upon the right of way and structures of any railroad, and, when necessary, under or over any private lands in this state, was so amended as to extend its provisions to telephone companies and to confer upon both telephone and telegraph companies the power of eminent domain; provided, that where it is necessary for such companies to exercise the right of eminent domain, they shall proceed to exercise it in the same manner as heretofore provided by law for the exercise of such right of eminent domain by telegraph companies; and further provided, that no corporation shall have the benefit of this section until it has filed with the railroad commission of the state its consent that the railroad commission shall have jurisdiction over it for the purpose of regulating intrastate rates. Civil Code, § 2811. In 1907 the railroad commission of this state was expressly given jurisdiction over both telegraph and telephone companies for the regulation of their intrastate business. Civil Code, § 2662. The history of the legislation on this subject, as thus outlined, shows that telegraph companies were not originally under the jurisdiction of the railroad commission; that, as soon as the commission was given jurisdiction over them, the power of eminent domain was conferred upon them; that the telephone companies were not brought within the jurisdiction of the railroad commission until 1907; and that prior to that time telephone companies could not exercise the right of eminent domain without first voluntarily submitting to the jurisdiction of the commission. It would seem from a reference to the act of 1905 that so much of Civil Code, § 2811, as requires a filing with the railroad commission of its consent to submit to its jurisdiction was applicable to telephone companies which did a purely telephone business or in conjunction therewith a telegraph business. The Code section is a little confusing, but this confusion is dissipated by a reference to the act of 1905. Given this construction, the provision of section 2811, about filing consent to submit to the jurisdiction of the railroad commission, is not applicable to telegraph companies.

We therefore hold that it is not prerequisite that a telegraph company, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain under the statute, shall first file with the railroad commission its consent to submit to its jurisdiction.

[3] 3. The telegraph company claims the right to condemn the railroad company's right of way on both sides of the track. We have been unable to find any reported case dealing with the exact question. In solving this problem we must look to our statute to ascertain the extent of the power of condemnation which is given to telegraph companies. The act of 1894 (Civil Code, § 5206 et seq.) is a general statute defining the manner of the exercise of the right of condemnation by those entitled to take or injure private property for public use upon making adequate compensation. It was specially made applicable to telegraph companies by amendment. Civil Code, § 5235. It is declared in section 5236 that "when a telegraph company undertakes to condemn so much of the right of way of a railroad company as may be necessary for its use for the purpose of constructing, maintaining and operating its telegraph line along and upon such right of way, the notice provided for in section 5218 of the Code shall be directed to the railroad company and shall set out the manner in which the telegraph company proposes to construct its line on the right of way of the railroad company." This implies that a telegraph company can only take of the railroad's right of way so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating its line of wire. Without such limitation it would be in the power of a telegraph company with a monopolistic tendency to acquire, by condemnation proceedings, the right to occupy all of the right of way of a railroad company not required for railroad use, to the arbitrary exclusion of any other telegraph company that subsequently might wish to occupy a portion of the right of way, either with the consent of the railroad company or by virtue of the exercise of eminent domain. We are mindful of the case of S. F. & W. Ry. Co. v. Postal Telegraph Co., supra, wherein it was ruled that "it is not essential that the telegraph company should affirmatively show that in order to erect, maintain, and operate its telegraph lines between the points proposed it is necessary for it to condemn such right of way; nor is it essential for it to show that it is necessary for it to use the particular portions of such right of way which it proposes to condemn." No case is broader than its facts; and the quotation we take from the headnotes in that decision, as illustrated by the discussion in the opinion, was not intended to cover the question in hand. In that case the telegraph company was only seeking to condemn a portion of the right of way on one side of the track, and there arose a controversy as to the right of the telegraph company to select that particular portion without showing a necessity for the location of its poles on the particular portion. And in that connection the court said: "In the very nature of things it would be impossible to show this; for a similar strip located almost anywhere else on the right of way, at a sufficient distance from the railroad track, might answer for the purpose in view, and certainly numerous other locations for such a strip could be found upon the right of way." The court had in mind only one strip of land, and not two strips separated by the railroad track. And even where a single strip of the right of way is sought to be taken by the telegraph company, the telegraph company cannot take more than may be necessary for its use for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating its telegraph lines along and upon the railroad's right of way. If the corporation should attempt to take more land than is authorized, a court of equity will restrain it from so doing. Savannah Ry. Co. v. Postal Tel. Co., 115 Ga. 554, 560, 42 S. E. 1. The condemnor has a large discretion in the selection of its route, but we do not understand that it was ever contemplated by the statute that a telegraph company could arbitrarily condemn both sides of a railroad track for the construction of lines of wire on both sides of the track, when the necessary wires could be strung upon poles on one side of the track.

[4] 4. It appeared from the evidence that the railroad company could not safely and expeditiously operate its cars and engines without the aid of a telegraph line; that the demands of a modern railway are such that a telegraph system is a necessary auxiliary to its safe and proper operation. In view of the telegraph company's voluntary termination of its contract with the railroad company, the latter is compelled to erect and maintain its own telegraph post and wires, in order to operate its road by means of electrical signals and orders. The railroad company contends that it should have the right of prior selection in the location of a line of telegraph for railroad use, and that it intends to erect poles upon substantially the same location as at present occupied by those of the telegraph company. On the other hand, the telegraph company denies that the railroad company has any such right, but asserts that it has the right to select a route over the railroad's company's right of way at any point which does not materially interfere with the railroad company in the conduct of its business. These conflicting claims must be solved by the application of the rule that property dedicated to one public use cannot be subjected to another public use, except in cases where the later use does not materially interfere with the former. If the railroad company owned the existing line of telegraph, and it was necessary to maintain and have it for the safe and convenient handling of its trains and cars, no one would seriously contend that the telegraph company could deprive the railroad company of its use by virtue of the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Assuming, of course, the necessity of a line of telegraph as auxiliary to the operation of a railroad company, the railroad company would have the same right in locating its telegraph lines as it would have in locating its railroad track, or its depot, and its warehouses on its own right of way. If a railroad company was originally constructing its track, could it be said that a telegraph company could arbitrarily select sites for its poles so as to force the railroad company to build its track on a less desirable place on its own right of way? Surely not. The fundamental basis of the principle of subjecting one public use to a second public use is that the first use must not be materially interfered with. It would indeed be most unfair demand to make of the owner of property charged with the discharge of a public duty, that he must make his property subservient to the convenience of the demandant who desires it for another public use. The railroad company is held off by its contract from constructing its line of telegraph on that portion of its right of way which it prefers, and which it has selected, until the contract expires; and the telegraph company should not be given a preference because it is not fettered by the same contract in proceeding to condemn the same portions of the railroad right of way. This conclusion cannot be affected by the fact that the telegraph line was in existence at the execution of the lease. There was no exception, either in the leasing act or the contract of lease, that the lessee was to take the road burdened with a use by the telegraph company. The telegraph company recognizes that its right to occupy the right of way is contractual; hence its notice to the railroad company to terminate the contract, and its proceedings to acquire the right of occupancy by condemnation.

[§] 5. The telegraph company at present occupies with its poles and wires both sides of the railroad track for nearly the entire distance of the main line of the railroad. According to the evidence a single set of poles is sufficient to carry the necessary wires for a telegraph line for railroad use. It therefore cannot be said that it is necessary that the railroad needs a line on both sides of its track. But, as we have already said, the railroad company has the right of prior selection of the route.

[§] 6. The railroad company takes the position that the telegraph company has no power to condemn its usufructuary interest in the right of way without express permission of the state, and that, at all events, the state is a necessary party to the condemnation proceedings. The telegraph company contends that the state has expressly given its assent to any telegraph company to construct and maintain a line of telegraph upon the lands of the state. In support of this contention section 2811 of the Civil Code is cited. That section, after declaring that any chartered telegraph company shall have the right to construct and maintain its line along and over the public highways of the state with the approval of the county or municipal authorities, proceeds as follows: "And, upon making due compensation, shall have the right to construct, maintain, and operate telegraph or telephone lines, or both, through or over any lands of this state, and on, along, and upon the right of way and structures of any railroad, and, where necessary, under or over any private lands in this state, and to that end may have and exercise the right of eminent domain." The quoted clause does not give to a telegraph company a free license to construct its lines over the lands belonging to this state. It expressly provides that "upon making due compensation" a telegraph company is given the right to construct its lines upon the lands of the state, upon the right of way of a railroad company, and upon private lands. The telegraph company's making due compensation is put forth as a condition precedent for the construction of its lines. This provision of the Code places the land of the state upon the same plane as railroad's right of way and private owners of land, with respect to condemnation. There is nothing in the language granting this concession which can be construed into a general permission to telegraph companies to build their lines upon the state's land without compensation.

In this state a tenant can neither assign his lease nor sublet the premises without the landlord's permission. Nor can a tenant who leases premises for a particular use devote them to other uses without the landlord's consent. Dodd v. Ozburn, 128 Ga. 380, 57 S. E. 701. Acquisition of the right of occupancy of land by means of condemnation is the equivalent of a conveyance. The difference consists in the means of acquiring the right; the former is involuntary and the latter is voluntary. If a tenant cannot convey the right to devote the premises to a use not authorized by the lease, it must follow that the right cannot be acquired by condemnation. A telegraph line can only be constructed by an invasion of the premises of the landlord; and that cannot be accomplished except by his voluntary consent, or by condemnation. It is true that, if a tenant's possession be disturbed by the construction of a telegraph line, he is to be separately compensated for his injury; but it does not follow that separate condemnation proceedings may be taken against landlord and tenant. The relation of the state to the lessee of its railroad is that of landlord and tenant. The lessee has but a usufructuary interest in the possession of the leased premises, for the specific uses named therein. State of Georgia v. W. & A. R. Co., 138 Ga. 619, 625, 71 S. E. 1055. Because of this relation any condemnation proceeding must be instituted jointly against the state and the lessee, unless the state gives to the telegraph company permission to occupy its railroad without condemnation, which it has not done.

Our attention is called to the provisions of the eminent domain law respecting the right of a telegraph company to condemn the right of way of a railroad company, and especially to the provision that in such cases only the railroad company is to be notified. The argument is that the lessee is a railroad company, and therefore falls within all of the provisions of the statute on the subject. We do not think so. The statute refers to railroad companies who own their rights of way; the ownership extending either to the easement of right of way or to the fee in the soil. For reasons already stated, it is manifest that the statute does not contemplate proceedings solely to condemn the right of way of a railroad company which has no ownership or easement of the right of way or of the fee; one which is merely a tenant, possessing no estate, but only a usufructuary interest in the land.

[7] 7. Another objection to the telegraph company's right to condemn is its contractual stipulation with the American Telegraph Company and subsidiary companies that the respective parties shall use in common as far as practicable the facilities of each other in order to avoid unnecessary duplication of lines and wires. This contract was made to cover large systems of telegraph and telephone companies, and it will not be imputed to the telegraph company that it will attempt to impose an additional use not mentioned in the notice of condemnation. If the telegraph company undertakes to impose an additional servitude, the railroad has its remedy against such an act. Nolan v. Cen. Ga. Power Co., 134 Ga. 201, 210, 67 S. E. 656.

[8] 8. The railroad company further sets out that it is a common carrier engaged in interstate business; that, if a portion of its right of way is condemned for the construction of a telegraph line, the danger of falling poles and other inconveniences would interfere with its traffic and would be a burden on interstate commerce. The deduction is sought to be drawn that the condemnation of the railroad's right of way is prohibited by that provision of the Constitution of the United States giving to Congress the exclusive power to regulate commerce between the states. We fail to appreciate this objection. A telegraph company cannot condemn any portion of a railroad's right of way necessary for the operation of its trains and cars. The possibility of poles falling upon the track is too remote a contingency to be considered. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co., 120 Ga. 268, 48 S. E. 15, 1 Ann. Cas. 734. The railroad is now being operated with a telegraph line on both sides of its track, and yet no complaint is made that existing conditions interfere with the railroad company in the discharge of its duties as a carrier of passengers and goods.

[9] 9. A further contention advanced by the railroad company in bar of the proposed condemnation of its right of way is that the eminent domain laws of this state, as construed in Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co., 120 Ga. 268, 48 S. E. 15, 1 Ann. Cas. 734, authorizing condemnation of the right of way of a railroad company by a telegraph company, are unconstitutional, in that they allow the property of the railroad company to be taken without due process of law. In the case cited this court ruled "that the measure of damages in such cases is the value of the land actually taken, and the extent to which the use of the right of way by the railroad company is diminished by its use by the telegraph company; that the right of way of a railroad company has no general market value for other uses than that to which it is applied; and that peculiar advantages and benefits accruing to a telegraph company from its use of the railroad's right of way cannot be considered in the assessment of damages." The effect of this ruling is alleged to be that a railroad company is entitled to no more than nominal damages for the appropriation of a portion of its right of way under condemnation proceedings for the erection or maintenance of lines of poles and wires of a telegraph company, and hence it is not permitted to receive the full value of the property taken and the injury inflicted. The rule laid down for the measure of damages in 120 Ga. 268, 48 S. E. 15, 1 Ann. Cas. 734, is the correct rule, supported by reason and by authority. The measure of damages as there defined affords to the railroad company full compensation for the value of the land taken, and the statute providing for the condemnation of a railroad's right of way is not unconstitutional for the reason that the railroad company's property is taken without due process of law.

The case is reversed and remanded for another hearing.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

These cases and that of Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 75 S. E. 471, were argued together, and are controlled by the rulings made in the latter case, this day decided.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Suit by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company against the Western Union Telegraph Company, and by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and others against the Western Union Telegraph Company, to restrain proceedings to condemn a right of way along complainants' line for telegraph facilities. From a decree refusing an injunction, complainants bring error. Reversed.

WILKINSON v. LEE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 10, 1912.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 2)—CUSTODY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

A father is entitled, prima facie, to the control of his minor child.

(a) But parental power may be lost "by voluntary contract, releasing the right to a third person," or "by failure of the father to provide necessities for his child."

(b) A contract releasing the right of parental power over a child must be clear, definite, and certain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-32; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 10*)—PARENT AND CHILD (§ 2*)—CUSTODY AND CONTROL.

Where a father, a few days after the death of his wife, voluntarily told the great-grandfather of his child, three days old, that he might take and keep the child as long as he and his wife lived, or until the child was 21 years old, and the grandparent did take, keep, maintain, and protect it until it was abducted by the father, at three years of age, this was a voluntary contract on the part of the father releasing his right to the child to a third person, and it was sufficiently definite and certain to be enforced.

(a) In such a case the contract is not void as being unilateral.

(b) Nor is it void and unenforceable for want of consideration.

(c) The evidence is amply sufficient to support the finding in this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 21-40; Dec. Dig. § 10;* Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-32; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

3. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 113*)—PROCEEDINGS—
CUSTODY OF CHILD.

In a habeas corpus proceeding by a great-grandfather to recover possession of a child alleged to have been given to him by its father, and who was alleged to have been abducted from him by the latter, it is not reversible error for the court, pendente lite, to award the temporary custody of the child to the grandparent from whom it had been so taken, upon his giving bond for its production in court, where it appears that the final judgment was right.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. §§ 102-115; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

4. HABEAS CORPUS (§§ 6, 53, 113*)—PLEAD-INGS—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

As strict technical pleadings are not required in habeas corpus proceedings as in some others.

(a) Judges of the superior court are vested with large discretion in habeas corpus cases, and their judgment in such cases on questions of law and fact will not be interfered with by this court, unless manifestly abused.

(b) The court below did not abuse its discretion in this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. §§ 6, 50, 50½, 102-115; Dec. Dig. §§ 6, 53, 113.*]

5. OTHER GROUNDS OF ERROR WITHOUT MERIT.

The other grounds of error assigned are without merit.

Error from Superior Court, De Kalb County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Habeas corpus proceedings by J. R. Lee against R. A. Wilkinson for custody of Theodore Lee Wilkinson, a minor child. From a judgment overruling certiorari to a judgment awarding the custody of the child to the plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Alonzo Field and Paul L. Lindsay, both of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Hooper Alexander and J. D. Kilpatrick, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. This is a habeas corpus proceeding commenced by J. R. Lee, the great-grandfather of Theodore Lee Wilkinson, a minor child three years old, to recover possession of the minor from his father, R. A. Wilkinson. The plaintiff in error, Wilkinson, married the granddaughter of the defendant in error. By this union the child in controversy was born. The mother died seven hours later. After the funeral of the mother, the question arose as to what should be done with the child. There is a conflict in the evidence, but the preponderance of it is to the effect that the father, the plaintiff in error, being consulted about the disposition of the child, said, in substance, to the great-grandfather, Lee, that he "couldn't just give the child away like a puppy," but that he might take the child and keep it as long as he and his wife lived, or until the child was 21 years old. The plaintiff in error insists that the child was left as a temporary loan, and that no definite contract was set forth. This old couple did take the child, cared for it, and paid all of its expenses, of whatever kind, including medical bills, etc. The wife of Lee was not related to the child, she being a second wife; but the evidence discloses that she was kind and attentive, and loved and cared for the child as a mother. Some time after the death of his wife, Wilkinson moved from Henry county, where he had lived and worked around in various places, and in the neighborhood where the Lees lived, and sometimes for the Lees. He was frequently a visitor at the Lee home, and seemed fond of the child. He was permitted to see the child as often as he wished, and on one occasion was allowed to take the child away from the Lee home to a picnic. Leave to take the child to his home for a visit shortly thereafter was refused. At one time Wilkinson gave Lee $2 for the child, which he loaned out for the latter, but would never accept any compensation for the rearing or expenses of the child. About a year before the bringing of the present action, Wilkinson, the father, married a second time, and his wife was received at the Lee home on the same terms as her husband had been. No claim to the child as a matter of right seems to have been asserted by Wilkinson; and Mrs. Lee testified that on one occasion she told Wilkinson she had heard of a threat on his part to take the child away, which he denied. He testified that he made no reply. No question is raised in the record as to the excellent character of either party to the case, or as to the ability of either to properly raise, maintain, and educate the child. On Sunday, the 28th day of August, 1910, the day previous to the suing out of the writ of habeas corpus, Wilkinson with his wife came on a visit to the Lee home, and were received as usual. His two brothers came in a buggy, but concealed themselves in the woods near the house, where they could not be seen by the Lees. The Lees and the Wilkinsons sat on the porch and ate watermelons. A little later Wilkinson walked out in the yard with the boy, then about three years old, placed him in a buggy from which the horse had never been unhitched. Suddenly and without any apparent warning he drove off with the boy at a rapid gait. His wife, seizing her hat, rushed out into the road and was taken in the buggy of the brothers and driven rapidly away. The two sons of Lee, as soon as a horse could be hitched to a buggy, gave pursuit and overtook Wilkinson about two miles from the Lee home. Being called on by them to stop, he informed the Lees he had a gun. The pursuit was there abandoned, and the present action begun the next day before the Hon. J. R. George, ordinary of De Kalb county, to recover possession of the child so taken. The trial was postponed several times at the instance of Wilkinson, in order to allow him to take the testimony of his mother, who was unable to attend court. A continuance later, in order to take the testimony of other witnesses as to Wilkinson's good character, was denied; the counsel for Lee stating that the character of Wilkinson was admitted to be good. The court, after hearing all the testimony in the case and argument of counsel, awarded the custody of the child to the plaintiff, Lee. To this judgment Wilkinson applied for a writ of certiorari to the superior court. After the hearing upon the certiorari, the superior court declined to interfere with the judgment of the ordinary, and the present writ of error was sued out, excepting to the judgment of the superior court.

[1] 1. A father is entitled, prima facie, to the control of his minor child. Civil Code, § 3021. But parental power may be lost, among other ways, "by voluntary contract, releasing the right to a third person," "or by failure of the father to provide necessities for his child." Civil Code, § 3021; Janes v. Cleghorn, 54 Ga. 9; Bently v. Terry, 59 Ga. 555, 27 Am. Rep. 399; Miller v. Wallace, 76 Ga. 479, 2 Am. St. Rep. 48; Townsend v. Warren, 99 Ga. 105, 24 S. E. 960; Lamar v. Harris, 117 Ga. 993, 44 S. E. 866; Eaves v. Fears, 131 Ga. 820, 64 S. E. 269. The contract releasing the right to the parental power and custody of a child must be clear, definite, and certain. Miller v. Wallace, 76 Ga. 479 (c), 2 Am. St. Rep. 48. The case last cited relied on by the plaintiff in error makes a very different situation from the present. In that case Miller was as much in possession of the child as the grandparents. And the court says of Miller, at page 488 of 76 Ga. (2 Am. St. Rep. 48), that "he never at any time assented to claims set up by its grandmother, by act or word, to its exclusive custody and control, but always, when such issues were raised, denied her authority by courteous and deferential conduct and language." Here the reverse is true. The stepgreat-grandmother asserted the right in her husband to the child, and the parent said nothing, according to her testimony. Wilkinson, it is true, denies this; but the great weight of evidence was with the Lees, that neither "by act or word" did Wilkinson ever assert any right to the power over or custody of the child, after making the contract, until the Sunday on which he abducted the child. See, also, Janes v. Cleghorn, 54 Ga. 13.

[2] 2. The main question in this case is whether there was a contract between the father of the child and the great-grandfather, and whether the contract was sufficiently definite that by its terms the parental power over the child was lost by the father and acquired by the great-grandparent. On the question of the existence of a contract the evidence is conflicting, but the great preponderance of it is in favor of the defendant in error. His testimony, corroborated by a number of witnesses, was to the effect that the father had told him, when the child was but a few days old, that he might take and keep it as long as he and his wife lived, or until the child was 21 years old. The evidence shows that the great-grandparent did take and keep the child from that time until it was three years old, before the father asserted any positive claim of right to it. We think the evidence and all the circumstances of the case were sufficient to authorize the ordinary to award the custody of the child to its great-grandparents. Nor do we think the superior court erred in refusing to interfere with the judgment of the court of ordinary. Townsend v. Warren, 99 Ga. 105, 24 S. E. 960; Eaves v. Fears, 131 Ga. 820, 64 S. E. 269. See Moore v. Dozier, 128 Ga. 93, 57 S. E. 110. The contract was sufficiently definite and certain to be enforced. According to the contention of the defendant in error, the great-grandparent was to have the child as long as he and his wife lived, or until the child was 21 years old. If this contract be proved (and the preponderance of the evidence is to that effect), then the father has lost his power over and control of the child as long as the great-grandparent and his wife live, or until the child becomes 21 years old. We do not see how the contract could be much more definite or specific.

Nor do we think there is any merit in the contention of the plaintiff in error that the contract is unilateral and without consideration. The parent gave up the possession of his child, with his right of power and control, and, on the other hand, the great-grandparent received the child and assumes all the responsibility of its maintenance, education and protection, and thus stands in loco parentis; and such a contract entered into by a parent and great-grandparent cannot be said to be unilateral and without consideration. The evidence in the case shows there was a sufficient consideration to support the contract. See Eaves v. Fears, supra.

[3] 3. One ground of exception taken is that the ordinary, pending the hearing of the main issue of the case, after several motions had been made to continue the case and the same were overruled, awarded the temporary custody of the minor child to the great-grandparent upon his giving bond for the production of the body of the child in court. It is insisted that this action on the part of the court was a prejudgment of the case, and disqualified the court from passing a final judgment awarding the child. We do not so consider. At the conclusion of the entire case, the ordinary awarded the custody of the child to its great-grandparent, and the judgment of the superior court was in effect the same; and on a careful review of the whole case, we cannot say that the temporary awarding of the custody of the child to the great-grandparent, pendente lite, is cause for a reversal where, upon a review of the entire record, the final judgment of the court of ordinary and of the superior court is found to be right.

[4] 4. Error is assigned on the refusal of the court to sustain a demurrer to the traverse of the answer to the writ of certiorari, and a motion to strike exceptions to the same. It is sufficient to say that technical pleadings in a case like this are not required. The necessity for strict technical pleadings do not apply to habeas corpus proceedings as in some others. As Mr. Justice Lumpkin well said in the case of Robertson v. Heath, 132 Ga. 313, 64 S. E. 74: "Still the rule is not arbitrary or inflexible in certain hearings. On the subject of writs of habeas corpus to test the legality of the detention of one deprived of his liberty, the Penal Code [1895] § 1222, provides as follows: 'If the return denies any of the material facts stated in the petition, or alleges others upon which issue is taken, the judge hearing the return may, in a summary manner, hear testimony as to the issue, and to that end may compel the attendance of witnesses, the production of papers, or may adjourn the examination of the question, or exercise any other power of a court which the principles of justice may require.' The writ is also used as a means of determining the custody of minor children. The presiding judge often has to use great discretion in judging of the status of parties and what is for the welfare of the child. He needs all the light he can obtain for the just and faithful discharge of his duty. It may be that a witness is beyond seas, or inaccessible, or for other reason cannot be put upon the stand. The writ is a speedy writ. The proceeding is summary in its nature. It is a judicial proceeding, and to be conducted in an orderly manner as such. But it is not exactly a lawsuit in the ordinary sense of the term. Simmons v. Georgia Iron & Coal Co., 117 Ga. 309, 43 S. E. 780, 61 L. R. A. 739. To delay its hearing until a witness absent from the state or the country can return, or until interrogatories can be prepared, notice given, cross-questions propounded in writing, and commission forwarded to a distant state or country and there formally executed, might require so much time that the hearing under the writ would be unreasonably delayed. It may be necessary to admit an affidavit, or, in default of it, to exclude much needed light altogether. Or there may be other circumstances rendering the use of affidavits proper." In habeas corpus cases the judge of the superior court is vested with large discretion, and his judgment in such cases will not be interfered with by this court, unless it is manifestly abused. Bently v. Terry, 59 Ga. 555 (4), 27 Am. Rep. 399.

[5] 5. The other grounds of error assigned are without merit.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

PALMER BRICK CO. v. WOODWARD et al.
WOODWARD et al. v. PALMER BRICK CO.
 (Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CONTRACTS (§ 10)—VALIDITY—MUTUALITY.

A contract is not unilateral and unenforceable which contains mutual obligations equally binding on both parties to the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 21-40; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 56*)—LEASES IN GENERAL—REQUISITES OF CONTRACT.

A contract which grants to one of the parties thereto the use and occupation of premises for a definite term, with the right to take brick clay from certain land of the other party and manufacture the same into merchantable brick, for a valuable consideration moving from the other party thereto during a specified term of years, is a contract of lease.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 166; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

3. MINES AND MINERALS (§§ 62, 70*)—LEASE—CONSTRUCTION.

Where in such a contract it is provided that the lessee, "the said brick company, [is] to have the exclusive right to take from said land, or any portion thereof, and use, in the manufacture of brick, such amount of dirt and clay as they may see proper, for the said period of 20 years," and the said brick company shall pay "a royalty of 12½ cents per thousand for all merchantable brick manufactured out of the clay taken from said land herein leased, payments to be made as follows: Two hundred and fifty dollars cash, and $100 on the 1st day of each month during the continuance of this lease; but, on the 1st day of January, in each year, an accounting shall be had between the said parties, when the said * * * trustee, as aforesaid, shall account for any overpayment made, and the * * * brick company shall account for any deficit on the said basis of 12½ cents per thousand for said brick, as aforesaid." Held:

(a) The lessee is to have the exclusive right to take from the land, or any portion thereof, and use in the manufacture of brick, all clay that it chooses to take therefrom, and to pay ultimately for the clay so used at the rate of 12½ cents per 1,000 of merchantable brick manufactured therefrom.

(b) The payment of the $100 per month is to continue regularly as a minimum alternative sum, subject to be reduced if, at the end of each year, the company shows on an accounting that, after using reasonable diligence in operating the clay mine and brick plant under ordinary conditions, there was not sufficient clay mined to make the sum of $1,200 at 12½ cents per 1,000 merchantable brick, and in that event the lessee could require the lessor to refund the overpayment.

(c) If the lessee, after operating the mine and brick plant as stated in note (b), took clay from the mine in quantities sufficient to make a sum in excess of $1,200 during the year previous to 1st day of January in each year, pending the lease, as to which the accounting was to be had, the lessor had the right to demand and receive from the lessee the amount of such excess on the basis of 12½ cents per 1,000 merchantable brick manufactured out of the clay so taken.

(d) By necessary implication the lessee is bound to exercise reasonable diligence in taking clay from the mine and operating the brick plant, or else is liable to the lessor in the minimum alternative sum of $100 fixed in the contract.

(e) If the lessee failed to exercise reasonable diligence in mining the clay and operating its brick plant in the manufacture therefrom of merchantable brick, or declined altogether to mine the clay and operate its plant in the manufacture of brick, the lessee would lose its right of having an accounting on the 1st day of January of each year, and would be liable, absolutely and unconditionally, to the lessor for the $100 per month agreed to be paid, and the latter could recover of the former such payments, or deferred payments, with interest.

4. FINDINGS OF AUDITOR—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There being ample evidence to support the findings of the auditor on the questions of fact, and his findings of law being in accord with the rulings herein made, the judgment of the court overruling the exceptions of law and fact to the auditor's report was not erroneous.

Fish, C. J., and Atkinson, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by A. P. Woodward, trustee, and others, against the Palmer Brick Company. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant excepts, and plaintiffs file a cross-bill of exceptions. Judgment affirmed, and cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

See, also, 135 Ga. 450, 69 S. E. 827.

The petition of the plaintiffs against the Palmer Brick Company showed substantially the following facts:

In 1876 C. Howell, father of Catherine S. Woodward, conveyed to A. P. Woodward, the husband of Catherine S. Woodward, as trustee for his wife and children, 300 acres of land, more or less, in Fulton county, situated on and near the Chattahoochee river, a large portion of which was bottom land, valuable for farming purposes, and also containing large deposits of clay suitable for making brick. In 1896 negotiations were entered into between A. P. Woodward, trustee, and the Collins Brick Company, resulting in a lease of the said lands by said trustee to said brick company for a term of 20 years, for the purpose of establishing thereon a brick manufacturing plant and using the clay for the manufacture of brick. Before the lease was executed, a petition was filed by counsel for the brick company (who was paid by the trustee) in the superior court of Fulton county, praying an order of the court authorizing the trustee to make the lease. Service was perfected on the beneficiaries, and a guardian ad litem was appointed for the minors. The order of the court authorizing the lease was granted on the 17th day of September, 1896. In accordance with the authority granted by the order, the contract of lease (prepared by the same counsel) was duly executed on the 25th day of September, 1896, the material portions of which are as follows:

"This memorandum of agreement, made and entered into this 25th day of September, 1896, between A. P. Woodward, as trustee for his wife, Catherine S. Woodward, and her children, of the one part, and Collins Brick Company, a corporation, of said county, of the second part, witnesseth as follows: The said A. P. Woodward, trustee as aforesaid, by this instrument hereby leases to the said Collins Brick Company, for the term of 20 years from this date, the certain tracts of land herein described, to wit: [Here follows detailed description of tracts of land amounting to 200 acres, more or less.] The said Collins Brick Company to have the exclusive right to take from said land, or any portion thereof, and use in the manufacture of brick, such amount of dirt and clay as they may see proper, for the said period of 20 years. The said Collins Brick Company also to have the use of such part or parts of said land as may be necessary for the purpose of establishing a brickyard thereon, and building such sheds or houses, tramways, and roads, and digging such wells, ditches, and waterways, as may be necessary for the carrying on of said business of making brick, in such quantities as to them may seem proper, and for the carrying of such live stock and implements, and providing quarters for employes as may be necessary in the conduct of said business. The said Collins Brick Company shall have the further right, by themselves, or through the agency of others, to build, equip, and operate, for the carrying on of said brick manufacturing business, a railroad, of such gauge as may to them seem proper, from such point on the line of the Western & Atlantic Railroad as may be most accessible and convenient, to and across the property herein leased, or such portion of the same as may be desirable or needful, with full right of way for the same, and the privilege of changing the location of the tracks, and having such side tracks and terminals, as the exigencies of the work may seem to demand. And the said A. P. Woodward, trustee as aforesaid, further covenants and agrees, without further change [charge?] than the consideration hereinafter expressed, to procure for the said Collins Brick Company, from Nathan Lyons, trustee, etc., a right of way across his property, lying between the property herein leased and the right of way of the Western & Atlantic Railroad, for the building, equipping, and operating of the railroad hereinabove provided for, procuring from him the same right, as to the point of beginning, etc., as is provided hereinabove on his own land. It is further agreed and understood that, for the rights and privileges above granted, the said Collins Brick Company shall pay to the said A. P. Woodward, trustee as aforesaid, a royalty of 12½ cents per 1,000 for all merchantable brick manufactured out of the clay taken from said land herein leased, payments to be made as follows, to wit: Two hundred and fifty dollars cash, and $100 on the 1st day of each month during the continuance of this lease; but on the 1st day of January in each year an accounting shall be had between the said parties, when the said A. P. Woodward, trustee as aforesaid, shall account for any overpayment made, and the said Collins Brick Company shall account for any deficit on the said basis of 12½ cents per 1,000 for said brick as aforesaid. It is further understood that the said Collins Brick Company may take said clay from any one or more parts of said land, at the same or different times, and may have and use the right of way for such wagon roads and other ways as may be necessary for the conduct of said business. This lease is not to restrict the right of the said A. P. Woodward, trustee as aforesaid, to the use of the farming lands of said property; but the right of the said Collins Brick Company to ingress and egress is not to be interfered with by the cultivation thereof."

The brick company took possession of the leased land, and began to mine and remove the clay and to manufacture it into brick. In 1898 the name of the brick company was changed to Palmer Brick Company, and in July, 1899, W. D. Palmer sold his stock in the Palmer Brick Company and ceased to be an officer or stockholder therein. On July 5, 1899, the Palmer Brick Company made a contract with one Lyons, whereby it leased from him certain land adjoining the Woodward land, for the purpose of mining clay therefrom. The clay taken from the Lyons land was moved to the railroad over the Woodward land. Until the lease of the Lyons land, the monthly payment of the $100 was regular, but subsequently became irregular, and the quantity of clay mined on the Woodward land became less, until the brick company ceased to mine clay and manufacture brick from the Woodward land, or to pay rent therefor, but continued to occupy the Woodward land for the purposes stated in the lease contract, other than mining the clay and manufacturing the same into brick, and, while retaining possession of the land, paid no rent after 1904, nor until the filing of this suit on July 24, 1909. Prior to 1900 rent was paid as it became due, but from that time until 1904 the payments were irregular and not in full.

The case was referred to an auditor, C. L. Pettigrew, Esq., who, after hearing the case, made his findings both on questions of law and fact, which were (generally) in favor of the plaintiffs. To the auditor's report the defendant filed exceptions to findings of law and fact, on various grounds, which were overruled by the court, and the report was confirmed and approved, and a decree entered in favor of the plaintiffs for the amount the auditor found to be due by the defendant to the plaintiffs. To this judgment and decree the defendant excepted, and the plaintiffs took a cross-bill of exceptions to certain rulings.

Mark Bolding and Madison Bell, both of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman and H. C. Erwin, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). The vital issue in this case is the proper construction to be given to the contract which is the foundation of the present suit, and which is set out in the facts above recited. (1) Is it a unilateral contract, as contended, and not enforceable? (2) If it is not unilateral, but mutual, does it create a lease? (3) If it creates a lease, what is the meaning of it, and what are the rights of the parties thereunder? The auditor to whom the case was referred in the court below made a remarkably clear report, finding for the plaintiffs on questions of law and fact, to which the defendant filed exceptions. Some of these exceptions are substantially as follows: That this contract, while called a lease, was in reality a sale of clay or a license to mine the clay upon the best terms obtainable, without any fixed rental by the month or year; that there was no right of user in anything granted, and no contract to pay rent; that the sale of the clay was the real consideration of the contract, and all else was merely incidental to it; that the clay that was sold was the clay actually mined, and what was not mined was not sold, but remained the property of the estate; that no certain amount was to be mined, but what was mined was sold at the rate of 12½ cents per 1,000 brick manufactured therefrom, or $1 per car of clay suitable for making brick. It is also insisted that the contract is unilateral and unenforceable; that no definite amount of clay was sold; that, in order to sustain the contract, the plaintiffs must have agreed to sell and the defendant to take a certain and definite amount of clay. All of these contentions were argued by counsel for the plaintiff in error with much ingenuity and skill; but after giving the case, and all the questions involved, much consideration and research, we cannot bring ourselves to agree with the conclusions reached by the able counsel for the plaintiffs in error.

[1] In construing a contract, the intention of the parties will be ascertained, if sufficient words be used to arrive at the intention; and if the intention be clear, and contravenes no rule of law, it will be enforced. Civil Code, § 4266; Fletcher v. Young, 69 Ga. 592; Maxwell v. Hopple, 70 Ga. 160 (2). That construction should be given to a contract which will uphold and make it valid and legal, rather than a construction which will make it otherwise. Civil Code, § 4268. Unless there are mutual promises in the contract which will bind both parties, it may be conceded that the mere promise of one of the parties to do or not to do a particular thing, without binding both, would make the contract unilateral and unenforceable. Harrison v. Wilson Lumber Co., 119 Ga. 6 (3), 45 S. E. 730, and cases cited: 1 Page on Contracts, § 17; Swindell v. First Nat. Bank, 121 Ga. 714, 49 S. E. 673; Singer v. Grand Rapids Match Co., 117 Ga. 86, 43 S. E. 755. But where there is a mutuality of obligations and promises, the contract is enforceable. The issue is squarely raised in this case. There is no middle ground that can be taken in the construction of this contract. The plaintiff in error insists that there is nothing in the contract which imposes on it the obligation to take clay from the premises with which to make brick, nor to pay any sum to the defendant in error unless it does so take and use clay for the purpose of manufacturing brick. Under this contract, the plaintiff in error is bound thereby, either to take and use the clay located on the premises, as provided in the contract, or, failing in that, to pay the alternative minimum sum agreed to be paid monthly, or else it is not so bound. If it is so bound, and the lessor is also bound by his covenants, then the contract cannot be unilateral, but is a bilateral contract, binding on both the plaintiff and the defendant alike. Applying the familiar rules of construction above stated, we are clear that this contract is a mutual one, equally binding upon both parties. The contract itself, the conduct of the parties after the contract was first executed, and all the attendant circumstances, leave little room for doubt that the intention of the parties was that both should be bound in the manner herein contended for. Both were bound in terms of the contract. The plaintiff gave up possession of his land and the right to cultivate the portions used for mining purposes, or to mine the clay, or lease it to others for either purpose. He was getting, prior to the contract, an income of $500 annually from the land for farming purposes, and all of these things he relinquished to the defendant for the purposes stated in the contract. He is still out of possession, and of the right to use the land for mining clay. On the other hand, the defendant is in possession, and those under whom it holds went into possession, of the land containing the brick clay, and built thereon houses, wells, ditches, railroad, and other improvements necessary to a well-equipped brick plant. For several years it paid, and the plaintiffs received, the minimum alternative sum fixed in the contract, without protest. It is still in possession of the premises, without any offer of yielding up possession, or of paying the amount stipulated in the contract for the use of the same. We are clearly of the opinion that the contract is mutual, and binds both parties thereto, and that the parties themselves so regarded it until a comparatively recent date.

[2] 2. Having held that the contract is not a unilateral, but a mutual, or bilateral, one, we pass to the next step in this inquiry, namely: Does the contract create a lease? The Civil Code, § 3690, declares: "When one grants to another an estate for years out of his own estate, reversion to himself, it is usually termed a lease. It may be confined to a particular interest in lands, such as mining or agricultural, in which event no other interest passes. If no object of the lease is stated, the mining interest will not pass unless the circumstances justify an implication of such an intention in the parties." In Jones on Landlord & Tenant, § 41, it is said: "Where the acts of digging, and so forth, are of such a character that they necessitate an actual occupation of the licensor's land, the license must be in writing to be valid, as the transaction is really a lease of the premises to that extent. Thus the right to mine certain land must be created by a lease. The case would be no different than if the piece of ground had been demised for cultivation or for any other purpose. A lease may not only confer upon the lessee the right to occupy and cultivate and to remove the products of cultivation, but it may confer on him the power to occupy and remove a portion of that which constitutes the land itself. Familiar and common examples of such leases are those authorizing the lessee to quarry and remove stone, to open mines and remove minerals, or to sink wells for petroleum and natural gas. The power to execute leases for such purposes, and the fact that the instrument by which such interest in land is granted may be in all essential particulars a lease, will not be questioned." And in cases like the present, what constitutes a lease is stated in 27 Cyc. 690, as follows: "It is an established rule of law that whatsoever words are sufficient to explain the intent of the parties that one should divest himself of the property and the other come into it for a definite time, whether they are in the form of a license, covenant, or agreement, will, in the construction of law, amount to a lease as effectually as if the most proper and pertinent words were made use of for that purpose." See, also, note to Barnsdall v. Bradford Gas Co., 225 Pa. 338, 74 Atl. 207, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 614, 615. And see Bouvier's Law Dict., title "Lease." By the very terms of the contract itself the estate granted is termed a lease. It provides that "the said A. P. Woodward, trustee as aforesaid, hereby leases to the said Collins Brick Company, for the term of 20 years from this date," the lands on which is located the brick clay. The contract then defines the rights of the lessee and of the lessor, binding both to the performance of their obligations.

But it is insisted that the lessee is not bound to use any clay from the leased premises, nor to pay any rental when it uses no clay. This insistence is founded on two expressions in the lease contract, to wit: "The said Brick Company to take from said land, or any portion thereof, and use in the manufacture of brick, such amount of dirt and clay as they see proper for said period of 20 years," and "The said Brick Company shall pay a royalty of 12½ cents per 1,000 for all merchantable brick manufactured out of the clay taken from said land herein leased." The quoted language is only a part of the contract. The contract is to be construed as a whole, and not from one or two isolated excerpts from it. If it be conceded that the Brick Company is not bound to use any clay, nor to pay anything whether it has used any clay or not, then the contention of the plaintiff in error might be correct. But to this contention we cannot agree. We think the lessee was bound to exercise reasonable diligence in using clay, and in supplying its plant with a sufficient amount of clay to meet its reasonable requirements under ordinarily favorable conditions. Such was evidently the intention of the original parties to the contract, and they provided against just such a contingency as that insisted upon here. There was to be in any event, whether the lessee took clay or did not take clay from the mine, a payment of $100 a month, not for the term the lessees actually did take clay and manufacture the same into brick, but monthly for the full term of 20 years from the date of the lease. This view is abundantly sustained by the authorities cited to that effect later in this opinion. The parties to the contract evidently estimated that the amount of clay mined would make brick and yield an income to the lessor of at least $100 per month; that the capacity of the plant and mine would yield at least that much on a basis of 12½ cents per 1,000 brick manufactured from the clay taken from the leased premises, or $1 per car of clay used for making brick, and the contract provides that that amount used shall be paid by the lessee to the lessor each month during the continuation of the lease, and at the end of each 12 months there shall be an accounting between the two. In the accounting, if the lessee shows that, by the exercise of reasonable diligence in the use of his brick plant and in mining the clay, it makes brick in quantities less than sufficient to yield the lessor $1,200 annually on the basis of 12½ cents on every 1,000 brick made, or on a basis of $1 for every car load of clay used, then the lessee is to have a reduction accordingly; but if the clay used on the above basis yields more than $1,200 annually, according to the accounting, then the lessor is to have the excess above that amount, calculated on that basis.

But surely it was never in the contemplation of the parties to so important a contract as this that the lessee could use the leased premises, with houses, wells, railroad, and all the other privileges granted, and arbitrarily refuse to mine the clay for the purpose of making brick, and thus defeat the plaintiffs in their right to collect any of the rent at all. This idea is negated by the terms of the contract itself, which provides that the $100 shall be paid each month during the continuance of the lease of 20 years. If the lessee could keep possession of the leased premises for the period of 20 years with its entire plant thereon, lease all adjoining land containing brick clay, and create a monopoly of the brick business, and thus prevent the lessor from either using his own clay or getting pay for his leased premises, it would impute to the original parties to the contract an inconceivable amount of stupidity. It would be unjust and unreasonable to place such a construction upon the contract. It would contravene the very nature and spirit of it, as manifest by the instrument itself, and by the conduct of the parties for several years after the execution of the lease. The $100 to be paid monthly was paid regularly and promptly from the beginning of the lease until the year 1904, and no question was raised, so far as the record discloses, of the construction of the contract now insisted upon. It cannot be that under the contract the lessee was to be allowed to hold this property for any considerable length of time without making any effort to mine the clay or to pay the lessor his rent. Such a construction would deprive the lessor of his rent, the privilege of mining the clay himself, or from leasing it to others for that or any other purpose. The law does not sanction such an absurdity, or allow such an injustice to be done. When premises are leased for a certain purpose, and the amount of rent is contingent in part upon the diligence which the lessee exercises in the operation of the leased premises, the law implies such reasonable diligence. In 2 Snyder on Mines (1902) § 1284, it is said: "The lease of a mine, in the absence of covenants requiring a certain amount of work, at least implies that the lessee will work the same with reasonable diligence. Thus, where a right to mine coal or other minerals is granted in consideration of the reservation of a certain portion of the product to the grantor, the law implies a covenant on the part of the grantee to work the mine in a proper manner and with reasonable diligence, so that the lessor or grantor will derive the income which both parties had in contemplation when the contract was entered into." In the case of Hiller v. Ray, 59 Fla. 285, 52 South. 623, 20 Ann. Cas. 1162, it was held: "Where the lessors of land for the specific purpose of taking therefrom phosphate rock of a specified character and volume do not covenant that the rock actually exists in the land, and the lessees do not covenant actually to find the rock in the land, but the contract contemplates the existence of the rock and a search for it by the lessees, there is an implied obligation on the lessees to make due and reasonable effort to find the rock in the land." And in a note to the above case in 20 Ann. Cas. at page 1172, citing a number of authorities, it is said: "Thus it has been held that where a lease provides for a definite rental per well for each gas well drilled, and the lessee fails to perform his implied covenant to prosecute the work of drilling wells with reasonable diligence, an action at law for damages is an adequate remedy, and an action in equity for the cancellation of the lease will not lie." See, also, Venedocia Oil & Gas Co. v. Robinson, 71 Ohio St. 302, 73 N. E. 222, 104 Am. St. Rep. 773, 2 Ann. Cas. 444.

[3] 8. From what has been said, we conclude that the contract under review created a lease of the land described therein for mining purposes for a term of 20 years. The lessee was to have the exclusive right to take from the land, or any portion thereof, and use in the manufacture of brick, all clay that it chooses to take therefrom, and to pay ultimately for the clay so used at the rate of 12½ cents per 1,000 of merchantable brick manufactured therefrom, or at the rate of $1 per car load of clay so used. The Brick Company was to pay the lessor $250 in cash and $100 on the 1st day of each month during the entire continuance of the lease. The payment of the $100 per month was to continue regularly as a minimum alternative sum, subject to be reduced if, at the end of each year, the company shows on accounting that, after using reasonable diligence in operating the clay mine and brick plant, under ordinary conditions, there was not sufficient clay mined at 12½ cents per 1,000 merchantable brick, or at $1 per car load of clay taken and used, to make the sum of $1,200, and, in that event, the lessee could require the lessor to refund the overpayment. If the lessee, the Brick Company, after operating the mine and brick plant as above, took clay in quantities sufficient to make a sum in excess of $1,200 during the year previous to the 1st day of January in each year, on which the accounting was to be had, the lessor had a right to demand and receive from the lessee the amount of such excess on the basis of 12½ cents per 1,000 of merchantable brick manufactured out of the clay so taken, or at $1 per car load of clay so taken and used. We hold, further, that if the Brick Company failed to exercise reasonable diligence in mining the clay and operating its brick plant by the use of such clay in the manufacture of merchantable brick, or declined altogether to mine the clay and operate its brick plant therewith in the manufacture of brick, the lessee would lose its right of having an accounting on the first day of each year, and would be liable to the lessor for the $100 per month agreed to be paid, absolutely and unconditionally, and the latter could recover of the former such payments, or deferred payments, with interest.

[4] 4. There being ample evidence to support the findings of the auditor on the questions of fact, and his rulings of law being in accord with this opinion, the trial judge did not err in overruling the exceptions filed to the report of the auditor.

Judgment affirmed. Cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

FISH, C. J., and ATKINSON, J., dissent. LUMPKIN, J., disqualified. The other Justices concur.

FISH, C. J., and ATKINSON, J. (dissenting). It will be noted, from the terms of the contract, that the Brick Company did not lease the land for all purposes, as the owner reserved the right to the use of the farming lands, provided such use should not interfere with the Brick Company's right of ingress and egress. The Brick Company, under the contract, procured the exclusive right to take from the land "such amount of dirt and clay as they may see proper" for a given time, to be used in the manufacture of brick, as well as the right to use such parts of the land as might be necessary for establishing a brick-yard thereon, and building such houses, etc., as might be necessary for the carrying on of the business of making brick "in such quantities as to them may seem proper"; the Brick Company agreeing to pay a given price per 1,000 "for all merchantable brick manufactured out of the clay taken from said land." The company was to pay down a given amount in cash and $100 on the 1st day of each month for a specified time; but on the 1st day of January in each year thereafter an accounting should be had between the parties, when the owner of the land should account for any overpayments made, and the Brick Company should account for any deficit, on the basis of the price stipulated as royalty. In view of these express stipulations in the contract, there was no implied obligation on the part of the Brick Company to use reasonable diligence in operating the clay mine and brick plant under ordinary conditions. The cardinal rule of construction of contracts is to ascertain the intention of the parties. If that intention be clear, and it contravenes no rule of law, and sufficient words be used to arrive at the intention, it shall be enforced, irrespective of all technical or arbitrary rules of construction. Civil Code, § 4266. Of course, the whole contract should be considered in arriving at the intention of the parties, and all parts of the instrument should be construed with reference to each other, but no part should be discarded or ignored if such a course can be avoided; and in the absence of any fraud, accident, or mistake, the instrument, if free from ambiguity, must be taken as written—in other words, in such a case the parties must stand or fall by the terms of the writing.

In the majority opinion, as it seems to us, no force whatever is given to the terms of the contract which clearly indicate that the Brick Company should have the option to use such amount of dirt and clay from the land as to the company might seem proper. While it is true that the company obligated itself to pay $100 on the 1st day of each month, an accounting was to be had on the 1st day of January of each year for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the company had paid for more or for less clay than it had used during the preceding 12 months. It had paid for more than it had used, the owner of the land was to repay the company the overplus; and if it had paid for less than had been used, the company was to pay the deficit. Doubtless the very reason for having such an accounting was that the company had the option, under the express terms of the contract, of determining how much clay should be taken and used from the land. The quotation from 2 Snyder on Mines, § 1284, used in the opinion of the majority of the court, is not, in our opinion, applicable to the contract involved in the case at bar. The gist of that quotation is: "The lease of a mine, in the absence of covenants requiring a certain amount of work, at least implies that the lessee will work the same with reasonable diligence." While it is true that the contract in the present case does not contain a covenant requiring a certain amount of work to be done in mining the clay, there are, as we have seen, express provisions to the effect that the Brick Company should have the option to remove from the land such amount of clay as it should see proper, and to pay for the amount so removed a given price. In support of the text from Snyder on Mines, quoted in the majority opinion, are cited the following cases: Koch's Appeal, 98 Pa. 434; Sharp v. Wright, 28 Beavan, 150; Brainerd v. Arnold, 27 Conn. 617; Watson v. O'Hern, 6 Watts (Pa.) 362. In none of the contracts construed in these cases, nor in any other case cited in the majority opinion, was there anything indicating that the person who was given the right under the contract to mine the coal or other mineral had the option or discretion of determining the quantity of the mineral that he should take from the land. In the case in hand, as we have already indicated, the contract clearly expresses all of the obligations undertaken by the Brick Company, and there is no room for imposing more upon it by implication. The intention expressed in the instrument must be given its legal effect.

If, however, the majority of the court are right in deciding that, under the terms of the contract, the Brick Company was under an implied obligation to use reasonable diligence in operating the clay mine and brick plant under ordinary conditions during the entire lease, then we are of opinion that the measure of damages which the owner of the land would be entitled to recover of the Brick Company for failure to mine the clay and operate its brick plant would not be $100 per month, with interest thereon. The exclusive right given to the Brick Company under the contract in this case to take clay from the land for the purpose of making brick does not stand upon the same footing as, say, a lease by the owner of his gristmill to another for a given term; the rental to be paid being a given proportion of the tolls. In such a case, if the lessee should immediately shut down the mill and refuse to operate it at all during the term, the lessor at the end of the lease would merely get back his mill without receiving any rental, and would therefore have a right of action for the value of the full amount of what would have been his proportion of the tolls, had the mill been operated as the parties contemplated. Where, however, a right to mine minerals is granted in consideration of the reservation of a certain portion of the product for the lessor, and the lessee wholly fails to operate the mine, the lessor, at the end of the term, would still have the minerals which the lessee had failed to mine, and therefore the lessor would not be entitled to get back all of his ore and also recover from the lessee for the portion of it which he would have received, had the lessee mined it all. In such a case, as to the proportion of the mineral which the lessor would have received, had it been mined as contemplated, the damages which he would be entitled to recover would be the difference between its stipulated price and its value in the mine. Lyon v. Miller, 24 Pa. 392.

SHAW v. CITY OF ATLANTA (two cases).
(Nos. 4,200, 4,201.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 10, 1912.)

1. COMMERCE (§ 60*)—SUBJECTS OF REGULATION—TRAFFIC IN INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Section 1537 of the Code of Atlanta, which prohibits the keeping for unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors in any of the places described in the section is not invalid as being an attempt to regulate or interfere with interstate commerce. The section has no application to the keeping of intoxicating liquors by a carrier while engaged in interstate commerce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 91-95; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

2. COMMERCE (§ 41*)—INTERSTATE SHIPMENTS—INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

A citizen of Atlanta, who has ordered intoxicating liquors to be shipped to that city in interstate commerce, cannot be convicted of a violation of section 1537 of the Code of Atlanta until after the contract of carriage is completed by delivery to the person for whom the liquors were intended, or some agent authorized by him to receive the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 30, 31; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

3. COMMERCE (§ 41*)—INTERSTATE SHIPMENTS—INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Where intoxicating liquors are brought to Atlanta in interstate commerce, for delivery to a resident of that city, who pays the freight and surrenders the bills of lading, and receives from the carrier an order directed to its agent for the delivery of the liquors, the contract of carriage is ended, and the carrier thereafter holds the goods as the agent of the person entitled to receive them; and if such person intends to use the liquors for the purpose of unlawful sale, he can be convicted of a violation of section 1537 of the Code of Atlanta, even though he has not taken the liquors from the custody of the carrier.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 30, 31; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 140*)—OFFENSES—INTERSTATE SHIPMENTS.

As a general rule, where an owner of goods delivers them to a common carrier in one state, consigned to his own order in another state, with direction to the carrier to notify a third person in the latter state, delivery to the carrier is delivery to the consignee. In such a case the title remains in the shipper, and the goods are subject to his direction and control until delivery is consummated in the state of destination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 150; Dec. Dig. § 140.*]

5. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 236*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where a bill of lading issued by a common carrier calls for the delivery of a certain package said to contain whisky, and a package is found in the possession of the carrier, corresponding in number and weight to the description in the bill of lading, and having thereon marks indicating that it contains intoxicating liquor, a prima facie case is made out that the package in fact contains such liquor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 300-322; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Dan Shaw was convicted of violations of an ordinance of the City of Atlanta, and brings error. Affirmed in one case, and reversed in the other.

The plaintiff in error was convicted in two cases of violating the provisions of an ordinance of the city of Atlanta, a copy of which is as follows:

"Any person, firm, or corporation who shall keep for unlawful sale in any store, house, room, office, cellar, stand, booth, stall, or other place, or shall have contained for unlawful sale in any barrel, keg, can, demi-john, or other package, any spirituous, fermented, or malt liquors for such sale, shall on conviction be punished by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, or labor on the public works for not exceeding thirty days, or, in the discretion of said recorder, such offender may be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars and imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, or by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars and labor on the public works for not exceeding thirty days."

Intoxicating liquors were shipped by freight from Chattanooga, Tenn., from R. M. Rose, consigned to his order, with a direction in the bill of lading to notify a named person. In some way, not disclosed by the record, Shaw came into possession of the bills of lading. On the back of each bill was an order, signed by the consignor, to deliver the goods to —; the name of the person entitled to receive them not being filled in by the consignor.

In case No. 4,201 it appears that Shaw was in possession of a large number of these bills of lading, which described the goods shipped as whisky, consigned to R. M. Rose, the shipper, "order notify Fred Walker." It does not appear whether Walker was a real or a fictitious person, nor does it appear how Shaw came into possession of the bills of lading. He employed one Coggins to receive the goods for him. Coggins signed his own name in the blank indorsement on the reverse side of each bill of lading, and presented them to the agent of the carrier and demanded the goods. This agent accepted the bills of lading and delivered to Coggins orders upon another agent of the carrier for the goods; these orders being referred to in the record as "expense bills." Coggins delivered the expense bills to Shaw. It appears that in the carrier's warehouse, and in a place called the "whisky pen," there were boxes and packages corresponding to those described in the bills of lading and expense bills; each of the packages having marks on the outside indicating that it contained intoxicating liquors. None of the packages ever came into the actual manual possession of either Shaw or Coggins, and none of them were ever broken to ascertain if they in fact contained intoxicating liquors.

In case No. 4,200 Shaw was arrested while he had upon his person 17 bills of lading such as are described above, except that the order was to "notify Salesman's Club." The testimony of the police officer indicates that there is probably no such organization in Atlanta as the "Salesman's Club." If there is, Shaw was not shown to have any connection with it. While on the way to the police station in a buggy, Shaw surreptitiously dropped the bills of lading to the ground. The police officer recovered them, signed his own name in the blank indorsement on the back, delivered them to the carrier, and received in their stead "expense bills," upon the surrender of which the packages were delivered to him. When broken open, they were found to contain intoxicating liquor. When found by the officer, the goods had but shortly arrived from Chattanooga, and no effort had been made to effectuate delivery to Shaw or to any one for him. The delivery of the packages to the officer in the manner above pointed out was made without the knowledge or consent of Shaw.

The questions presented by the record in each of the two cases are: (1) Is the ordinance void, as being an unlawful attempt to interfere with interstate commerce? (2) Can the plaintiff in error, on the facts proved, be convicted of keeping intoxicating liquors for the purpose of unlawful sale, before obtaining the actual custody of the liquors? (3) If he can, is the evidence otherwise sufficient to sustain the conviction?

John A. Boykin, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Jas. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. [2] Prior to the passage of the act of Congress known as the "Wilson Act," the right of a citizen of one state to import intoxicating liquor from another state and sell it in the original package could not be taken away by the state. Intoxicating liquor being a legitimate subject of commerce, the police power of the state did not become operative until after the original package was broken and the contents had become intermingled with the general mass of property in the state. The right to sell "was an inseparable incident to the right to import." Bowman v. Chicago Ry. Co., 125 U. S. 466, 8 Sup. Ct. 689, 1062, 31 L. Ed. 700; Lelsy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 10 Sup. Ct. 681, 34 L. Ed. 128. The Wilson act provided that intoxicating liquors shipped in interstate commerce from one state to another "should, upon arrival in a state or territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such state or territory." It was at first thought and was so held by several of the state courts that this language of the act gave the states the right to legislate the moment the shipment arrived at the state line; but the Supreme Court of the United States in several cases distinctly held that a shipment of intoxicating liquors moving in interstate commerce was protected from adverse legislation by the state, under its police power, until delivery to the person entitled to receive it. Vance v. Vandercook Co., 170 U. S. 438, 18 Sup. Ct. 645, 42 L. Ed. 1100; Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S. 412, 18 Sup. Ct. 664, 42 L. Ed. 1088; American Express Co. v. Iowa, 196 U. S. 133, 25 Sup. Ct. 182, 49 L. Ed. 417.

In Heymann v. Southern Ry. Co., 203 U. S. 270, 27 Sup. Ct. 104, 51 L. Ed. 178, 7 Ann. Cas. 1130, the writ of error was sued out to test the correctness of a decision of the Supreme Court of Georgia, reported in 118 Ga. 616, 45 S. E. 491. The Supreme Court of Georgia held that although the goods had not been delivered to the consignees, and although there was no showing of notice to them from the carrier of the lapse of a reasonable time for the consignees to call for and accept delivery, or even if by the local law such notice was unnecessary, the interstate transportation ended when the goods were placed in the carrier's warehouse, and the carrier was thenceforward liable only as a warehouseman, and the goods ceased to be under the shelter of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. This conclusion was based upon the theory that the goods must be considered as having arrived, within the meaning of the Wilson Act (Act Aug. 8, 1890, c. 728, 26 Stat. 313 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3177]), when they were warehoused by the carrier. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment of the Supreme Court of Georgia, and announced its ruling as follows: "As the general principle is that goods moving in interstate commerce cease to be such commerce only after delivery and sale in the original package, and as the settled rule is that the Wilson law was not an abdication of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, since that law simply affects an incident of such commerce by allowing the state power to attach after delivery and before sale, we are not concerned with whether, under the law of any particular state, the liability of a railroad company as carrier ceases and becomes that of a warehouseman on the goods reaching their ultimate destination, before notice and before the expiration of a reasonable time for the consignee to receive the goods from the carrier. For, whatever may be the divergent legal rules in the several states concerning the precise time when the liability of a carrier, as such, in respect to the carriage of goods, ends, they cannot affect the general principle as to when an interstate shipment ceases to be under the protection of the commerce clause of the Constitution, and thereby comes under the control of the state authority." In the course of the opinion the court took occasion to say that it did not hold, and that the court was not called upon to decide, if the goods, after arrival at the point of destination, and after notice and full opportunity to receive them, are "designated left in the hands of the carrier for an unreasonable time, that such conduct on the part of the consignee might not justify, if affirmatively alleged and proven, the holding that goods so dealt with have come under the operation of the Wilson act, because constructively delivered."

A careful examination of the various decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the subject will conclusively show that the Wilson act did not affect the right of an importer to ship intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce, nor the right of the purchaser to receive them, and that the only effect of the Wilson act was to permit the state to which the goods were consigned to legislate under its police power upon the subject after the contract of carriage had ceased and the goods had been delivered to the person entitled to receive them. Some of the state courts have held that interstate commerce does not cease and transportation is not ended until the goods are actually delivered at the home of the person entitled to receive them in the state to which they are shipped. The Supreme Court of Maine announced this rule as being applicable in a case where a C. O. D. shipment was made by express, directed to the consignee, at his residence. In Oklahoma, however, the same rule was announced in the case of a shipment by freight without any direction to deliver at any particular address. Hugh v. State, 2 Okl. Cr. 161, 101 Pac. 115, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 162; Moreland v. State, 2 Okl. Cr. 237, 101 Pac. 138; Hudson v. State, 2 Okl. Cr. 176, 101 Pac. 275. In State v. Eighteen Casks of Beer, 24 Okl. 786, 104 Pac. 1093, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 492, the Supreme Court of Oklahoma held that, where a bill of lading had been surrendered by the consignee and the freight paid, intoxicating liquors were subject to the state law, notwithstanding the liquors were left on the premises of the carrier. It was accordingly ruled that, where it appeared that the consignee intended to sell such liquors contrary to the laws of the state, they were subject to seizure and confiscation under the state law, notwithstanding they had not been taken from the carrier's premises. In State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 102 Me. 206, 66 Atl. 393, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, it was held that the interstate commerce transportation was not ended, in the absence of a special contract to the contrary, until the freight was transported to the carrier's warehouse and there removed from the car. In McCord v. State, 2 Okl. Cr. 214, 101 Pac. 280, the accused was convicted of unlawfully having in his possession certain intoxicating liquors with the intention of selling the same in violation of the state prohibition law. It appeared that five barrels of beer were shipped in interstate commerce, consigned to the defendant, who sent a dray to the carrier's depot and had the beer unloaded from the car onto the dray. While on the dray they were seized by the sheriff, and the arrest of the defendant followed. The judgment of conviction was reversed, and it was held that the section of the statute which prohibited the having in possession of intoxicating liquors with the intention of violating any of the provisions of the section had no application to an interstate shipment, until there had been a delivery of the liquors at their destination.

[3] We are not prepared to go to the extent to which the Oklahoma court has gone, that an interstate shipment of intoxicating liquors will be protected against adverse state legislation until actual delivery at the home or place of business of the person entitled to receive it. It is protected until delivery to such person, but delivery may be consummated as well at the warehouse of the carrier as elsewhere. Certainly in a case where the bill of lading is surrendered and the freight paid, and an order issued for the delivery of the goods, and the liquors are thereafter held for the holder of the order, this would in law amount to delivery, and the interstate transportation would be ended, even though the goods be left in the actual custody of the carrier. In such a case the carrier would simply be the agent of the person entitled to receive the goods, holding them subject to his order. The general rule is that if goods be left in the hands of the carrier at the place of destination, after notice to the consignee of their arrival, and a sufficient length of time has elapsed after receipt of notice to enable him to take them from its possession, the relation of the carrier to the goods is that of warehouseman, and not that of carrier. 1 Wollen & Thornton, Law of Intoxicating Liquors, § 204; Hutchinson, Carriers (3d Ed.) § 789.

There can be no doubt that if the person to whom intoxicating liquors are shipped in this state in interstate commerce, by agreement with the carrier, stores them in the carrier's warehouse and keeps them there for the purpose of unlawful sale, he would be subject to conviction under an ordinance such as that involved in this case. Stradley v. Atlanta, 7 Ga. App. 441, 67 S. E. 107. Such is the distinct intimation of the Supreme Court of the United States in one of the cases above referred to. In such a case it is also clear that the agent of the carrier and every other person who colludes with the owner to violate the law would be equally guilty. In this connection the remarks of the Supreme Court of the United States in reference to the conduct of the carrier handling interstate commerce shipments of intoxicating liquors, in the case of Adams Express Co. v. Kentucky, 206 U. S. 129, 27 Sup. Ct. 606, 51 L. Ed. 987, are pertinent. We therefore conclude that the evidence in case No. 4,201 was sufficient to show that delivery was consummated, that the contract of carriage was ended, and that the agent of the carrier held the goods as agent for the true owner. The evidence was sufficient to authorize a finding that the plaintiff in error was the owner of the goods, and that Cogins had receipted for them as his agent, and the circumstances were sufficient to authorize the finding that the goods were being held for the purpose of unlawful sale.

[5] It is contended that, inasmuch as there was no proof as to the actual contents of the packages, the recorder was not authorized to find that they contained intoxicants. The bills of lading called for whisky, and packages corresponding to the description in the bills of lading were found in the carrier's warehouse, in a portion thereof called the "whisky pen," and set apart and used for the storage of intoxicating liquors. The packages all had marks on them indicating that the contents were intoxicating liquors. This was sufficient to authorize a finding that the packages did in fact contain intoxicating liquors, and to cast the burden on the accused to show that they did not. See Tompkins v. State, 2 Ga. App. 639, 58 S. E. 1111.

[1] The point that the ordinance is unconstitutional is entirely without merit. Courts are inclined to so construe a law as to uphold its constitutionality. There is nothing in the ordinance which on its face appears to interfere in any way with interstate commerce. It cannot, therefore, be held to be void on its face. The presumption is that the city authorities did not intend the ordinance to apply to interstate shipments until after the contract of carriage had ended. Where it appears that the goods are still under the shelter of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, it will be held that the city ordinance of Atlanta has no application. We therefore think that the conviction of the plaintiff in error in case No. 4,201 was authorized, and that the judge of the superior court did not abuse his discretion in overruling the certiorari.

[4] In case No. 4,200 a different conclusion must be reached. The liquors had never been actually or constructively delivered to the plaintiff in error. The general rule that delivery to the carrier is delivery to the person for whom they were intended has no application to this case. The goods were consigned to R. M. Rose, the shipper. Presumptively, therefore, delivery to the carrier was delivery to Rose. The title remained in Rose until an actual sale, consummated by delivery at destination. The order on the bill of lading to notify a named person does not change this presumption. The effect of this order was simply to ship goods to Atlanta for Rose, the consignor, and in care of the person to be notified. This person was the agent of Rose. See, in this connection, Raleigh Ry. Co. v. Lowe, 101 Ga. 320, 331; 28 S. E. 867; American Natl. Bank v. Lee, 124 Ga. 863, 53 S. E. 268; Fla. Central & P. R. Co. v. Berry, 116 Ga. 19, 42 S. E. 371; Hutchinson, Carriers (3d Ed.) § 187. If direction had been given to the carrier by Rose upon the back of the bill of lading to deliver the goods to a named person, the rule might be different; for such an indorsement would be valid and a sufficient assignment of the bill of lading to the person named. Allen v. Farmers Natl. Bank, 129 Ga. 748, 59 S. E. 813. Of course, there might be an actual agreement between the shipper and the carrier to deliver the goods to a named person, or there might be an understanding or arrangement under which delivery to the carrier would be held to be delivery to the person at destination, notwithstanding a form of bill of lading or receipt might be used such as was employed in the present case; but here there is no evidence of any agreement or arrangement different from that appearing from the bill of lading. The case, so far as appears from the evidence, is simply one where Rose shipped intoxicating liquors from Chattanooga to himself in Atlanta, in care of a person whose name appeared in the bill of lading, with direction to deliver the shipment to some person not named. This direction was not valid, and ought to have been ignored by the carrier. As between Rose and the carrier, delivery would be made at the peril of the carrier, and if the agent of the carrier did make such delivery, knowing that the goods were to be used for an unlawful purpose, or had reasonable grounds to suspect it, it is not at all certain that the agent would not be equally guilty with the person who received them and the person who ultimately intended to sell them.

Under the facts as disclosed by this record, the goods were still in the hands of the carrier, in interstate commerce, when delivered to the police officer. The contract of carriage had not been completed, and delivery was made to the officer without authority of law and without the knowledge or consent of the consignor, Rose, or of any person to whom delivery was intended. Even if possession of the bills of lading by Shaw was sufficient to authorize a finding that the liquors were intended for him, he did not consent for delivery to be made to the police officer; nor could he be said to have had the liquors in his possession at all, for any purpose. The carrier was not his agent, and until the contract of carriage had ended, and as long as the goods were in interstate commerce, the plaintiff in error could not be said to have had such dominion or control over them, either by himself or by his agent, as would authorize his conviction for keeping them on hand for unlawful sale. It may be that he intended to get possession of them for the purpose of selling them illegally; but mere preparation to commit a crime is no offense. He could no more be convicted than could one be said to be guilty of murder because he had a loaded gun and had indicated his intention to take human life.

It has been suggested that, while the interstate commerce clause of the federal Constitution will protect an interstate shipment of intoxicating liquors, and forbids the state's seizing them or doing any other act which would prevent or unduly hamper the interstate transportation of the goods, yet at the same time the state may penalize any person who orders such goods to use them for an unlawful purpose. In our opinion this is entirely too narrow a view of the interstate commerce clause of the federal Constitution, as construed and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States. If the state could say to one of its citizens, "You may order liquors to be shipped to you in interstate commerce as often and as freely as you please, because you are protected by the federal Constitution, but at the same time we will seize your person and thus prevent you from receiving the shipment," it is clear that interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors could be totally destroyed. The interstate commerce clause of the federal Constitution not only protects interstate shipments, but it protects the person to whom the goods are shipped, and it protects the carrier until the contract of carriage is ended and the person for whom they are intended gets possession of the goods, either himself or through an agent. The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly expressed sympathy with the efforts of the states to prevent traffic in intoxicating liquors, but at the same time it has uniformly held that, being a subject of interstate commerce, they are beyond the power of the state, except in so far as the right to legislate has been granted by Congress, under and in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States.

The records before us disclose a practice participated in by the carriers which is to be condemned, and which we may say, in passing, is a very dangerous one for the agents of the carriers who participate in it. It seems that it has been the practice among some of the carriers to effect a constructive delivery of intoxicating liquors to citizens of Atlanta who have ordered them, and to retain actual possession of the liquors for the benefit of such persons, permitting them to take possession of the liquors as they needed them from time to time. When a carrier ceases the legitimate business of transportation of intoxicating liquors, and goes into the business of a warehouseman in reference to the liquors, holding them for a long time for the benefit of persons who have not ordered them for a legitimate purpose, a grave suspicion arises that the agents of the carrier, if not in actual collusion with the persons to whom the liquors are shipped, are at least complacently acquiescent in the violation of the law. As said by the Supreme Court of the United States in one of the cases cited above, a carrier, though engaged in interstate commerce, may violate the law in reference to the sale and disposition of intoxicating liquors as well as any other person. In misdemeanors all are principals.

In case No. 4,201, a judgment of affirmance will be entered; and in case No. 4,200, the judgment overruling the certiorari will be reversed, upon the ground that the conviction was without evidence to sustain it.

Judgment affirmed in No. 4,201. Judgment reversed in No. 4,200.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 922)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Where, in the trial of a criminal case, the judge instructed the jury that in cases of circumstantial evidence, such as the case on trial, the evidence must be not only consistent with the guilt of the defendant, but such as to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than that of his guilt, it was not error demanding a new trial that the judge omitted from his instructions the definition of circumstantial evidence. Having expressly stated that the guilt of the defendant rested solely upon circumstantial evidence, it was immaterial that the court failed to definitely explain to the jury the meaning of the term "circumstantial evidence."

2. INSTRUCTIONS — RECENT POSSESSION OF STOLEN GOODS.

The evidence warranted the instruction to the jury to the following effect: "Recent possession of stolen goods, unexplained, may be sufficient to authorize a conviction of the person in possession of them of a larceny or of a burglary, if a burglary is shown, to the degree of proof required, to have been committed by some person."

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 828*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY FOR REQUEST.

The evidence touching the defense of alibi was not such as to show the impossibility of the defendant's presence at the time when and the place where the crime was committed, and it was consequently not error, in the absence of a written request to that effect to fail to charge the jury the law of alibi. *Coney v. (Syllabus by the Court.)1. PARTNERSHIP (§ 174) — LIABILITIES — TORTS.

"Partners are not responsible for torts committed by a copartner." If, however, all the partners join in the commission of a tort within the scope of the partnership business, the partnership, as well as the individual members of the firm, might be liable.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1173*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—REVERSAL—CODEFENDANTS.

Where a suit is brought against a partnership as master, to recover damages for the homicide of a servant, alleged to have been caused by the negligent conduct of a copartner, and the case is tried only upon the theory that the partnership is responsible as master for the tort committed by the copartner, and the evidence is not sufficient to show that the partnership is liable, the judgment against the firm will be reversed; and although the allegations of the petition are sufficient to show that the individual partner may be personally responsible for his individual act of negligence alleged to have caused the homicide, yet, it appearing that the case was tried solely on the theory that the partnership was liable, and the liability of the members of the firm was only incident to their relationship to the partnership, and the individual liability of the members was not otherwise considered or submitted as an issue, the judgment as to them will also be reversed. The liability of the individual member whose personal act is alleged to have caused the homicide should be tried under rules of law applicable to him as an individual, entirely disconnected from any liability arising against him by reason of his relationship to the firm.

Error from City Court of Moultrie; J. D. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Connor against Corbett & Taylor and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named brings error. Reversed.

W. F. Way and J. A. Wilkes, both of Moultrie, Colquitt & Conyers, of Atlanta, and Battle & Hollis, of Columbus, for plaintiff in error. J. T. Hill and J. W. Dennard, both of Cordele, W. A. Covington, of Moultrie, and Little & Powell, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. [1] 1. Mary E. Connor obtained a verdict and judgment against Corbett & Taylor, a partnership, and R. J. Corbett and G. F. Taylor, members of the partnership, for the negligent homicide of her husband. The defendants excepted to the overruling of a general demurrer to the petition, and the refusal of a new trial.

The material facts, briefly stated, are as follows: Corbett & Taylor were engaged in the sawmill and timber business, and in connection with this business operated locomotives and cars on and over the tracks of the Flint River & Northeastern Railroad by permission of the railroad company. The deceased husband of the plaintiff was employed by the firm of Corbett & Taylor as a locomotive engineer. On the day of his death he was operating a locomotive and two cars, and G. F. Taylor, a member of the firm of Corbett & Taylor, was riding with him on the locomotive. The deceased engineer was suffering from a scalded foot, and, a short time before the accident, he asked Taylor to take charge of the engine for him and run it while he took off his shoe and allowed his scalded foot to cool. Taylor did so, and Connor took off his shoe and sat down on the gangway between the tender and the engine. When the locomotive was approaching a trestle, Connor, from his seat, called Taylor's attention to the fact that the trestle was on fire. Taylor replied that there was no danger, and that they would run across the trestle and stop and put out the fire. Connor said nothing more, and Taylor attempted to run across the burning trestle. The heat of the fire caused the rails to "buck," and the engine ran off the track several feet beyond the trestle, and turned over on Connor, inflicting serious injuries, from which he died. The plaintiff charges that Taylor was negligent and reckless in attempting to cross the burning trestle; that he could and should have stopped the engine before reaching the trestle.

Taylor denied the allegations of negligence, claiming that he was very near the trestle when the fire was discovered, and that he was unable to stop the engine before reaching the trestle. The defendants charge that Connor was guilty of contributory negligence, in sitting in a dangerous place at the time of the casualty; that he assumed the risk of danger in crossing the trestle; that the firm of Corbett & Taylor was in no event liable, as the act of Taylor was a personal act, not for the firm or within the scope of its business; that Taylor, in running the engine, was voluntarily performing an act solely for the benefit and at the request of the deceased engineer; that this voluntary act was entirely outside of any duty which the firm owed Connor, was unknown, unauthorized, and unratified by the firm of Corbett & Taylor, and was entirely a personal matter between Connor and Taylor, for which, if there was any liability, Taylor was alone liable.

The view we take of the legal questions raised by the record as to the liability of the firm of Corbett & Taylor renders unnecessary any decision of the other features of the case. Conceding that the homicide was caused by Taylor's negligence, is the copartnership of Corbett & Taylor liable? "Partners are not responsible for torts committed by a copartner. For the negligence or torts of their agents or servants they are responsible under the like rules with individuals." Civil Code 1910, § 3187. The second paragraph of the section has no direct application to the question now under consideration, as this part of the section manifestly refers to "agents or servants" who are not members of the partnership, and not to the partners themselves. Ozborn v. Woolworth, 106 Ga. 460, 32 S. E. 581. The first part of the section, which applies to torts of the partners themselves, explicitly declares that "partners are not responsible for torts committed by a copartner." The words used are exclusive; they neither express nor imply any exception. The language is a statutory declaration that any tort committed by one partner is beyond the scope of the partnership business and does not bind the partnership. In some other jurisdictions partnerships are held liable for the acts of a partner in the commission of a tort; but the statute of this state does not even make the exception that the partnership would be liable if the tort of the partner was committed within the scope of the partnership business. "Some courts have held that the partnership is not liable for the willful torts of one of the partners, and others that the partnership is liable when such tort is within the scope of the partnership business. After a careful investigation of the text-books and decisions, we find that the great trend of modern authority is to make the partnership liable for all torts of its members which are within the scope of the partnership business. But whatever may be the law in other jurisdictions, the question has been settled in this state by the Civil Code, § 2658 [now § 3187]." * * * This is an act of the General Assembly and is binding upon the courts of this state, whatever the law may be elsewhere." Martin v. Simkins, 116 Ga. 256, 42 S. E. 483. We do not think that the Supreme Court has attempted by judicial construction to ingraft any exception upon the plain language of the statute, or has made any decision in conflict with the clear and emphatic utterance of Mr. Chief Justice Simmons in the Martin-Simkins Case, supra. There are several decisions to the effect that the partnership would be liable "when all the members joined in the commission of the tort." In Page v. Citizens' Banking Co., 111 Ga. 73, 36 S. E. 418, 51 L. R. A. 463, 78 Am. St. Rep. 144, "the tort was the joint act of all the partners." See explanation of the Page Case by Mr. Chief Justice Simmons in the Martin-Simkins Case, supra, 116 Ga. 256, 42 S. E. 484. In Alexander v. State, 56 Ga. 491, it was held that "one copartner is not responsible and liable * * * for the torts * * * of his copartner, unless he has participated therein." And in Ozborn v. Woolworth, supra, referring to the section of the Code now considered, it is said: "Since the Code expressly declares that a partnership is not liable for the torts of its members, the mere fact that all the partners approved of a tort committed by one of their number cannot make the partnership liable for that tort upon the idea of ratification." It would be profitless to extend the discussion. If the act of Taylor complained of constituted actionable negligence (which is not now determined), it was his personal tort, not within the legitimate scope of the partnership business, not an act "that he might be expected to do in the scope of his duty to the firm." His partner Corbett did not participate therein, and, under the statute quoted and the decisions of the Supreme Court cited, the verdict and judgment against the firm of Corbett & Taylor were unauthorized.

[2] 2. Learned counsel who represented the defendant in error in this court suggested that if the conclusion should be reached that the firm of Corbett & Taylor is not liable, and that the individual, G. F. Taylor, is liable, the ends of justice would be reached by molding the judgment in conformity to the law and the facts; that the judgment as to Corbett & Taylor should be reversed, and direction given that the suit as to the firm and as to Corbett individually be dismissed, and the judgment against Taylor individually be affirmed. In support of this proposition it is insisted that the suit was not only against the firm, but also against R. J. Corbett and G. F. Taylor as individuals; that process was issued against Taylor and served on him as an individual; and that the judgment was also against him individually. It is not clear that we have the right to do so. In Campbell v. Bowen, 49 Ga. 418, it is held that, in a suit against partners, the verdict should be against both, and not one alone. See, also, Howes v. Patterson, 76 Ga. 689. In Brownlee v. Abbott, 108 Ga. 761, 33 S. E. 44, in an action ex delicto against three defendants, with a verdict against all, it was ruled that, there being no evidence to support the verdict as to one of them, a new trial should have been granted.

The case of Austin v. Appling, 88 Ga. 54, 13 S. E. 955, was relied on as authority for the position that this court can reverse as to Corbett & Taylor and affirm as to Taylor. The cases are distinguishable on the facts. In that case Appling sued three persons as "a partnership doing business under the name of the Fulton Lumber & Manufacturing Company," for damages alleged to have been sustained by him in their service, arising out of the unsafe character of the place in which he was put to work. The gravamen of the suit was the failure to perform a nondelegable duty of master to servant. The evidence proved that the Fulton Lumber & Manufacturing Company was derelict in the performance of the alleged duty, and it also showed that one man composed the Fulton Lumber & Manufacturing Company. The verdict was not only against the manufacturing company, but was also against the three men as composing the firm. It was ruled that the verdict could be set aside as to the two men who the evidence showed were not members of the firm, and allowed to stand against the firm as master and against the one defendant who was the sole proprietor of the business. Here suit is brought by the servant against the master, and, under the evidence and the law applicable thereto, the servant is not authorized to recover against the master, and we are asked to reverse the judgment against the master, but allow it to stand against a third person, and against this third person as an individual not bearing any relation as master to the servant.

Under the allegations and the evidence, what duty did Taylor as an individual owe to Connor? It is alleged and proved that Connor was the servant of the firm of Corbett & Taylor, and that the firm was responsible for the negligence of Taylor as a member of the firm, not as an individual. In the suit he was found liable individually because of his relationship to the firm, and because of personal service on him as a member of the firm. This court is for the correction of errors. It has no original jurisdiction. Taylor's liability as an individual was never presented to the court or ruled on by the court or passed on by the jury disconnected from his liability as a member of the firm. The pleadings in the case show that it was treated as a case against the firm; the liability of the members resulting from that relationship alone.

The trial judge tried the case as one exclusively against the firm of Corbett & Taylor as the master of the deceased servant. In the beginning of the charge he states the case: "Gentlemen of the jury, this is a civil case in which Mrs. Mary E. Connor, who is the plaintiff in the case, brings suit against the partnership of Corbett & Taylor, who is the defendant in the case. The plaintiff in the case is suing the defendant for damages, or for the value of her husband, claiming that the death of her husband was caused by the negligent conduct of the defendant partnership. The defendant denies that it was negligent in the manner alleged and claimed." Nowhere in the charge was any suggestion made as to the individual liability of Taylor, but the instructions were confined to the question of the firm's liability. In the conclusion of the charge the judge says: "If you see fit to render a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, the form of your verdict will be, 'We, the jury, find for the plaintiff so many dollars.' If you find under these instructions in favor of the defendant, the form of your verdict will be, 'We, the jury, find for the defendant.'" The verdict was, "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff $5,500." On this verdict a judgment, it is true, was rendered not only against the firm as the defendant, but also against R. J. Corbett and

G. F. Taylor. But this judgment was based solely on the fact of the partnership relation and personal service. It seems to us that it would not be just to hold Taylor individually liable, when the entire record shows that the question of his individual liability was never considered by the trial court, and when it is raised for the first time in this court. The case as to him should be tried and determined under rules of law relating to his individual liability for his personal tort, and entirely free from any extraneous circumstance that might influence the jury against him.

We reverse the judgment of the court below, because the court erred in not dismissing on demurrer the action as against Corbett and Taylor as a partnership and Corbett individually; and a new trial is granted as to the remaining defendant, Taylor, individually.

Judgment reversed.

WADE v. STATE. (No. 4,261.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 564*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—VENUE.

The evidence was insufficient to prove the venue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 726, 1277-1284; Dec. Dig. § 564.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—OPINION AS TO FACTS.

On the trial of one indicted for the offense of assault with intent to rape, where the female assaulted was a child between the ages of 10 and 11 years, the trial judge did not commit a reversible error because, in referring to her in his instructions to the jury, he in one or two places called her "this child." His reference to her as "this child" did not tend to impress upon the minds of the jury that the court entertained an opinion that the female alleged to have been raped was of immature development, and therefore not capable in law of consenting to the sexual act. The case of Jordan v. State, 6 Ga. App. 571, 65 S. E. 299, is distinguished, on the facts, from the present case. In that case the charge was enticing away a child under the age of 18 years, and the issue was as to the age of the female, and this court held that it was error for the judge, in his instructions, to refer to her as "this child under the age of 18 years."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1731, 1750, 1754, 1758, 1759, 1769; Dec. Dig. § 762.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—OPINION AS TO FACTS.

The following excerpt from the charge is excepted to: "I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that although if the evidence shows that the girl assaulted was over 10 years old, yet if she was a child in stature, constitution, and physical and mental development, and you believe from her age and appearance that she was incapable of consenting, the defendant would be guilty, although she made no objection to the intercourse." This excerpt is not justly subject to the criticism that, in the use of the words "girl assaulted," the judge expressed an opinion that an assault was actually perpetrated on the female, or to the criticism that, in the use of the language "although she made no objection to the intercourse," the judge expressed an opinion that such intercourse actually took place.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1731, 1750, 1754, 1758, 1759, 1769; Dec. Dig. § 762.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—OPINION AS TO FACTS.

There was no error in the hypothetical instruction by the judge that the jury might take into consideration, in determining as to the weight and credit to be given to the evidence of the female alleged to have been assaulted, whether she was of good fame, whether she presently discovered the offense, whether she made pursuit after the offender, whether she showed circumstances and signs of the injury, whether the place where the alleged act was done was remote from people, inhabitants, or passengers, etc. The instruction to this effect was not the expression or intimation of any opinion by the court as to what had been shown by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1731, 1750, 1754, 1758, 1759, 1769; Dec. Dig. § 762.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

There was no error in omitting to charge the jury on the law of assault, or assault and battery, for these offenses were not involved. The accused denied that he committed any assault or assault and battery at all, and the evidence of the female, if it was the truth, proved the felonious assault as alleged in the indictment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1821, 1833, 1839, 1860, 1865, 1883, 1890, 1924, 1979-1985; Dec. Dig. § 814.*]

6. RAPE (§ 59*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—INSTRUCTION.

The following excerpt from the charge is objected to: "Upon the question as to whether or not the offense, if any, was committed against her will, or without her consent, it is proper for you to determine, first, as to whether or not Mamie Stanfill was of sufficient capacity, mentally, to give her consent to an act of this kind; and that is a question solely for your determination, taking into consideration the age of the child, her intelligence or want of intelligence, whether or not, under the evidence, she had or not arrived at a stage of maturity and development that would cause her to consent from sexual desire; and you may consider any other fact or facts which may have been made to appear to you upon the trial of this case, which may tend to illustrate that question." It is insisted that this charge eliminated from the jury the consideration of any motive for consent by the female to sexual intercourse except sexual desire, whereas, if she consented to sexual intercourse, there might be other reasons why she should have consented thereto, and this was an improper restriction in the charge to the one motive of sexual desire. The excerpt is not subject to the criticism made. The sexual desire of the female is only one of the tests suggested, but the judge leaves to the jury the right to consider any fact, whether it be immature age, lack of intelligence, or any other fact, which may tend to illustrate the question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 88-100; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

7. WITNESSES (§ 243*)—EXAMINATION—LEADING QUESTIONS.

Leading questions may be allowed by the trial judge in his discretion, and it is not an abuse of this discretion to permit leading questions to be asked of a young female child relating to delicate subjects of a sexual character.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 795, 847; Dec. Dig. § 243.*]

8. NO ERROR OF LAW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

No error of law appears, and another trial is granted solely because of the failure to satisfactorily prove the venue.

Error from Superior Court, Grady County; Frank Park, Judge.

Oble Wade was convicted of assault with intent to rape, and brings error. Reversed.

W. M. Harrell, of Bainbridge, Ira Carlisle and R. C. Bell, both of Cairo, and Little & Powell, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Wooten, Sol. Gen., of Albany, F. A. Hooper, of Atlanta, and Roscoe Luke, of Thomasville, for the State.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff in error was convicted of the offense of assault with intent to rape. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and he brings error. There are numerous assignments of error in the amended motion for a new trial, none of which need be dealt with more fully than in the headnotes, except the question as to proof of venue.

[1] It is insisted that the evidence is not sufficient to prove the venue, and, under repeated rulings of the Supreme Court on this subject, we are constrained to hold that this contention is well founded. The only evidence relating to venue was as follows: The victim of the assault testified: That she lived in Grady county, and that the courthouse where she was testifying was about 5 miles from her home. That on the occasion of the assault she and the accused were going to school together, and that the school was about 2½ miles from her home. That she saw the accused in December, 1910, in Grady county, "at my home, and at lots of other places. I went to school with him in December. I had to go by his boarding place, and we got together there. When we had gone a little piece from his boarding place, he made me stop. No one was with us. He picked me up and carried me out of sight of the road and laid me down," and then the assault was made. "It was near the Cairo and Thomasville road, and about two miles from the schoolhouse. We were about a half mile from home."

The Constitution of this state requires that all criminal cases shall be tried in the county where the crime is committed (Const. art. 6, § 16, par. 6), and numerous decisions of the Supreme Court have held that the venue must be clearly and distinctly proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Murphy v. State, 121 Ga. 143, 48 S. E. 909. The statement of the accused that she lived in Grady county was immaterial in the fixing of the venue. Tarver v. State, 123 Ga. 494, 51 S. E. 501; Pope v. State, 121 Ga. 801, 53 S. E. 384, 110 Am. St. Rep. 197, 4 Ann. Cas. 551. In Gosha v. State, 56 Ga. 38, it was held that evidence to prove the place where the crime was committed, to the effect that it was within 50 yards of a certain named residence in that county, was not sufficient. In Moye v. State, 65 Ga. 765, the only proof touching the venue was that the crime was committed in the lumber yard of a Mr. Sloan, in the city of Americus, and it was held that this was not sufficient to show that it was committed in the county of Sumter; that the court did not judicially know that the Americus referred to was in the state of Georgia. In Cooper v. State, 106 Ga. 119, 32 S. E. 23, the proof as to venue was that the difficulty occurred "in Lawrenceville, in front of Dan Rutledge's store," and it was decided that this did not show affirmatively that the offense was committed in Lawrenceville, Gwinnett county. If it were an open question for this court, we would be inclined to hold that the court would judicially recognize in the last two cases that the crime was committed in Sumter and Gwinnett counties and in the state of Georgia, as the court judicially knows that Americus is in Sumter county and Lawrenceville is in Gwinnett county, and it seems to us that the court could not by any possibility conjecture that a trial in these two counties might have been for offenses committed in Americus or Lawrenceville in some other state. But the question is not open, and the decisions cited are binding upon us as precedents, and have been followed in Smith v. State, 2 Ga. App. 413, 58 S. E. 549; Stringfield v. State, 4 Ga. App. 842, 62 S. E. 569; and Minter v. State, 7 Ga. App. 14, 65 S. E. 1079.

It is insisted by learned counsel for the state that the language of the witness, that she saw the defendant in December, 1910, in Grady county, at her home, and "at lots of other places," is sufficient to prove the venue; that the plain inference from this testimony is that all the "other places" at which she saw him in December, 1910, were in Grady county, and that one of these places in which she saw him was the place where they went to school together in December, and where the offense was committed. Proof of venue by inference is not sufficient, unless that is the only possible inference from the facts.

It is also insisted that the venue was not an issue in the case; that no question as to venue was made on the trial. Whether it was an issue on the trial or not, if the question is specifically raised by the motion for a new trial as provided by the act of 1911 (Acts 1911, p. 150), the brief of evidence in this court must disclose the fact that the venue was affirmatively and clearly proved. Here the question is properly made in the record.

It is further insisted that this court will judicially know that five miles from the county site of Grady county, where the trial took place, was in Grady county. Even if this were true, it would not show that the offense was committed in Grady county, for the witness testified that it was committed about a mile from her home, which was about five miles from the courthouse, on the side of the road where the defendant took her while on their way to school. But whatever may be the law in other jurisdictions, it is very clear, under the decisions above cited, that, while courts of this state may take judicial notice of the geographical divisions of the state and the location of the cities and towns thereof, they will not in a criminal prosecution supply by that means an omission to prove the venue. We reverse the judgment on this ground alone.

Judgment reversed.

SULLIVAN v. MOORE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 26, 1912.)

1. DEEDS (§ 129*)—INTEREST CONVEYED.

Under the common-law rule, a deed to G., not expressing in the premises or the habendum clause a conveyance to her and her heirs, conveys only a life estate; the legal title reverting to the grantor at G.'s death, though the warranty was to G. and her heirs and assigns.

2. DEEDS (§ 211*)—MISTAKE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to show that a fee-simple conveyance was intended, warranting reformation, though by a mistake the word "heirs" was left out of the deed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County.

Action by Mrs. Rosalie A. Sullivan against John Moore. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Grier, Park & Nicholson, of Greenwood, and Richey & Richey, of Laurens, for appellant. Simpson, Cooper & Babb, of Laurens, for respondent.

WOODS, J. [1] In this action to recover possession of a tract of land, the decree in a former appeal adjudged that on the trial of the issue of legal title the circuit judge should have directed a verdict for the plaintiff on these undisputed facts: On August 26, 1886, the plaintiff, being the owner of a tract of land containing 200 acres, conveyed the entire tract to Mrs. Alice P. Greer. On October 31, 1892, Mrs. Greer conveyed the 90 acres in dispute to Mrs. P. O. V. Martin; and on January 23, 1896, Mrs. Martin conveyed to the defendant, John Moore. The deed of conveyance from the plaintiff to Mrs. Greer did not express, either in the premises or the habendum clause, that it was a conveyance to her and her heirs, though the warranty was to her "her heirs and assigns." The court held that, under the common-law rule which still prevails in this state, Mrs. Greer took only a life estate, and upon her death in 1906 the legal title would revert to Mrs. Sullivan; and, further, that there was no evidence to support the defense of estoppel. 84 S. C. 426, 65 S. E. 108, 66 S. E. 561.

[2] The defendant set up, also, the defense of mistake, alleging that the parties to the deed from Mrs. Sullivan to Mrs. Greer intended that it should convey a fee simple, and demanded judgment that the deed be reformed accordingly. This last defense was not passed on by the circuit court at the first trial, and in disposing of the former appeal this court left that issue open. On this defense at the second trial, the following were the issues submitted by the court and the responses made by the jury:

"First. Did Rosalie Sullivan intend to convey only a life estate by the deed? No.

"Second. Was the word 'heirs' left out of the deed by mistake of both parties, and did the parties to the deed intend to convey a fee simple (absolute) estate? Yes.

"Third. What was the value of the land at the time of the execution of the deed? $2,000."

The circuit judge made an order refusing a motion for a new trial, and directed a reformation of the deed. The eight exceptions raise only the one question whether the circuit judge should have directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff on the issues submitted, or withdrawn the issues from the jury, and should have refused to reform the deed, on the ground that there was no evidence of such a character as would warrant the inference that there was mutual mistake, and that the intention was to convey and to take a fee-simple title.

The plaintiff can have no complaint of the view taken by the circuit judge of the degree of proof necessary to warrant a finding of mutual mistake and a judgment of reformation; for, in charging the jury, he expressed his conviction on the subject in this language: "But before a court of equity will reform a solemn instrument, it must be shown by evidence which is the most clear and convincing, not simply it was a mistake on the part of one of the parties, but that it was a mutual mistake; that both parties intended a certain thing; and that by mistake in the drafting of the paper did not get what both parties intended."

Mrs. Sullivan and her husband testified that she intended to convey only a life estate, and that it was so understood by all the parties to the transaction. But the circumstances, we think, negative that intention, and show clearly and convincingly that the intention was to convey a fee simple. According to the testimony of the plaintiff and her husband, the deed was made at the request of Hewlett Sullivan, the uncle of plaintiff's husband, and of Mrs. Greer, the grantee, in consideration of the satisfaction of a mortgage held by Hewlett Sullivan against the plaintiff. The testimony shows, and the jury found, that the land was worth at the time about $2,000. Although Mrs. Sullivan and her husband testified on this trial that the mortgage had been reduced by gift of Hewlett Sullivan to a little less than $1,000, on the former trial Mrs. Sullivan testified that there might have been $4,000 or $5,000 due; and, what was still more significant, there was nothing to show the gift of three-fourths of the mortgage debt, except the indefinite statement of the plaintiff and her husband. W. R. Osborne testified that he heard the negotiations between the plaintiff and Hewlett Sullivan, and that in speaking of the conveyance of the land nothing was said about conveying only a life estate. The plaintiff and her husband testified that from 1886, when the conveyance was made to Mrs. Greer, until 1907, after Mrs. Greer's death, they never spoke to each other, their children, or any one else of the fact that Mrs. Sullivan would get the land back on the death of Mrs. Greer. It is highly improbable, under the circumstances, that such a valuable interest in land so near by would not be mentioned, if the husband and wife supposed that it existed.

Mrs. Greer died in November, 1906, and even then not a word was said by the plaintiff in assertion of her claim until the defect was brought to her attention by Mr. Babb, who had discovered it in examining the title for a prospective purchaser, and she was asked to sign a paper perfecting the form of the title into a fee simple.

The deed of conveyance to Mrs. Greer was written by Jared D. Sullivan, plaintiff's husband. Unless the courts must look away from the obvious, they know that it is probable almost to the point of certainty that in writing a deed no layman would express the conveyance of a life estate by the mere omission of the word "heirs" in the premises and the habendum, when using it in the warranty, and that no lawyer would do so, except one wholly possessed with the spirit of priggishness.

These circumstances taken together make proof clear and convincing that it was the intention of Mrs. Sullivan and Mrs. Greer that the conveyance to the latter, for valuable consideration, should convey a fee-simple title, and under such proof the defendant was entitled to have the deed reformed. Austin v. Hunter, 85 S. C. 472, 67 S. E. 734, and cases cited.

Affirmed.

SPEARS et al. v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 20, 1912.)

1. DAMAGES (§ 143*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—COMPLAINT.

In an action against a railway company for injury to a traveler at a highway crossing, it is proper for plaintiff to allege that at the time she was enroute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 410, 433; Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 236*)—AMENDMENT—TIME—JUDICIAL DISCRETION.

In a personal injury action, it was not an abuse of discretion to permit plaintiff to withdraw the case from the jury, and to allow an amendment of the complaint so as to more clearly charge a claim for punitive, as well as actual, damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 601; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 313*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—FAILURE TO GIVE SIGNAL.

To render a railway company liable, under Civ. Code, § 2139, for injury resulting from failure to give required signals on approach of a train to a highway crossing, a collision at the crossing is unnecessary to entitle plaintiff to recover for injury caused by the mule she was driving taking fright at the train.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1002, 1004, 1005; Dec. Dig. § 313.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO FACTS.

In a highway crossing accident, it was not error to refuse to instruct that the action was based on Civ. Code, § 2139, which gives a right of action for injuries received in a "collision" resulting from failure to give locomotive signals, where that section was inapplicable to the facts, because there was no actual collision, and the court repeatedly instructed that contributory negligence was a defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 505, 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 350*)—HIGHWAY CROSSING ACCIDENTS—PROXIMATE CAUSE—JURY QUESTION.

In an action against a railway company for injury to a traveler in a highway crossing accident, held, under the evidence, a jury question whether any failure of the approaching locomotive to give the statutory signals caused the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1152-1192; Dec. Dig. § 350.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

Objections omitted from the argument on appeal are deemed withdrawn.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

7. DAMAGES (§ 161*)—PERSONAL INJURY—MENTAL SUFFERING—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action against a railway company for injury to plaintiff in a highway crossing accident while riding in a vehicle, she alleged mental suffering, it was not error to admit proof that two of her small children were with her at the time, since she must have suffered in apprehending harm to them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 446; Dec. Dig. § 161.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 501*)—OPINIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action against a railway company for injury received in a highway crossing accident, it was not error to permit a witness to express an opinion that the crossing was the most dangerous crossing of which he knew, where he stated fully the facts on which the opinion was based.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2292-2305; Dec. Dig. § 501.*]

9. RAILROADS (§ 350*)—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING—ACTION—PROVINCE OF JURY.

In an action against a railway company for injury to a traveler in a highway crossing accident, due to the company's failure to give statutory signals on approach of a train to the crossing, whether such failure was advertent was an inference to be drawn by the facts proved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1152-1192; Dec. Dig. § 350.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge. Action by Hannah J. Spears and another against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Knox Livingston, of Bennettsville, for appellant. Townsend & Rogers, of Bennettsville, for respondents.

FRASER, J. This was an action for damages. It seems that the plaintiff respondent, Mrs. Spears, was going home from Bennettsville and driving along a public highway that approached the track of the appellant railroad company. The public road and the railroad made a V, and were almost parallel. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant did not ring its bell or blow its whistle, as required by law, on approaching the crossing, and that the train was running at a dangerously high rate of speed, and that by reason of the conduct of the defendant she was injured; that she was not in a normal condition of health, and had with her two small children of her own and a child of a friend, who was traveling with her; that the mule she was driving became frightened by the train, and, in order to keep the mule from running into the train, she was obliged to turn it across a ditch; that there was a ditch on both sides of the road.

The defendant moved to strike out of the complaint all reference to the physical condition of the plaintiff, on the ground that the defendant was not responsible for her condition, and objected to all testimony in reference to the children, as they had an independent action for their injury. These objections were overruled. The action was for both actual and punitive damages. The case was called for trial, and during the progress of the trial a question arose as to whether the complaint alleged that the failure to give the statutory signals was willful or not. The presiding judge (Judge Shipp) held, over plaintiff's objection, that the complaint did not charge willfulness as to this allegation of negligence, but allowed the plaintiff to amend her complaint and withdraw the case from the jury. The case was subsequently tried before Judge Copes and a jury. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

[1] There are 19 pages of exceptions, but appellant has stated the questions in a more succinct form, and we will accept his consolidation and answer his questions.

"(1) Was it not error in his honor to refuse to strike out the words 'she being at the time enceinte?' Anyhow, was it not error in Judge Copes to hold that question res adjudicata, because Judge Shipp had refused a similar motion; but, the case having been withdrawn from the jury and an amendment allowed, setting up practically a new complaint, with a new cause of action, in which the same allegation is made, was it not error to admit testimony to support such allegation?"

The answer to this question is, it was not error. No one could suppose that the defendant was in any way responsible for the plaintiff's condition; and therefore there could be no confusion of issues by allowing the allegation to remain. The physical condition of the plaintiff might have determined the extent of the injuries, both mental and physical. It was entirely proper that the defendant should know facts upon which the plaintiff would base her estimate of her injury; and it was for the jury to say whether the injury to the plaintiff would be greater in the abnormal than in the normal condition, and, if so, to what extent.

[2] "(2) Was it not error, or an abuse of legal discretion, to withdraw the case from the jury, after the plaintiffs had practically closed their testimony, and allow an amendment of the complaint which made a 'substantial change' in the original cause of action, to change a claim for actual damages alone to one for both actual and punitive?"

The answer here is that there was no error. It was within his honor's discretion to allow the plaintiff to allege what she intended to allege and claimed that she had alleged. In order that no injustice be done the defendant, or that he might lose by reason of a surprise during the trial, the case was withdrawn from the jury. The amendments, therefore, upon which the case was finally tried were amendments before, and not amendments during, trial, within the meaning of the law. The action before amendment was for actual and punitive damages, and after amendment it was for actual and punitive damages.

[3, 4] "(3) Was it not error in refusing to hold, as the trial judge did in the first instance, that the cause of action set up in the complaint was based upon section 2139 of the Civil Code, regard being had to the language used in the complaint generally, as well as specific allegations, and especially to the order of Judge Shipp allowing the amendment, and the amendment allowed?

"(4) In that subsequently his honor charged the jury that the action brought 'for personal injuries and damages, or for injury to her property * * * at a public crossing,' and using other language, whereby he substantially told the jury that the action was brought under the statute, although there was no collision between plaintiff's person or property and defendant's locomotive or train?

"(5) In that, while he, in the first instance, construed the complaint, and subsequently the jury, as hereinbefore indicated, he refused to charge defendant's first, second, third, and fourth propositions, embodying well-established and unquestionable principles of law, showing the distinction between an action at common and an action under the statute for personal injuries—a distinction most material to the defense in this action? It being an admitted or undisputed fact that there was no collision between the person or property of the plaintiff, Hannah J. Spears, and the locomotive or cars of defendant, was it not error in his honor, especially in view of his refusal to charge defendant's first four requests to charge the jury?"

There was no error here. Section 2132 is the section that requires the signal, and it makes no reference whatever to a collision at the crossing. The only effect of section 2139 would have been to eliminate a contributory negligence as a defense. His honor charged the jury seven times that contributory negligence was a defense. His honor charged the jury that if they found that the plaintiff in any way, by her own negligence or want of proper care, brought about or contributed to the accident, whereby she was injured, she could not recover. It is hard to see how the defendant could have asked for more. The failure of the judge to charge that the plaintiff could not recover under a statute that did not apply was not only not harmful error, but it was not error at all.

[5] People traveling a public highway are entitled to fixed warnings of the approach of a train, not only in order to avoid going on the crossing, but in order that they may take such precautions as they may think best to prepare for the coming train; and they are entitled to the whole time in which to take precaution. Section 2139 does not limit the right of the traveler to a collision. It was for the jury to say whether the failure to give the signals, if there was a failure, did not produce the necessity for driving her mule across the ditch and produce the injury. Sometimes seconds count. Did they count here? That was for the jury, and it was left to them, with explicit instructions that if she was in any way negligent she could not recover. There was no error here.

[6] Questions 7 and 8, omitted from the argument, are deemed withdrawn.

"(6) Substantially, that the action was brought and could be sustained under the statute by use of the following language:

"(a) 'The negligence, wantonness, and recklessness and willfulness alleged is that the defendant ran its train down upon that crossing, without giving the statutory signal, at a high and reckless rate of speed.'

"(b) 'If the defendant failed to ring the bell or blow the whistle, and that failure caused the plaintiffs,' etc.

"(c) Again: 'Where a person is injured at a point where a railroad crosses a public highway and the statutory signals are not given, the burden is on the defendant company to show that the injured person knew, or ought to have known, of the approach of the train to have avoided.'

"(d) Again: 'No actual collision is alleged in this suit, and it is not necessary to prove a collision.'

"(d) Again: 'If the evidence in this case satisfies you by its preponderance that the defendant did not give the statutory signal' (after reading section 2132), 'then it was guilty of negligence, and, if that negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, then the defendant is liable.'"

These statements refer to 2132, and not to 2139. There is no error.

"(9) Was it not error, in charging the jury as to defendant's liability for its negligence, to ignore the plea of and testimony establishing plaintiff's contributory negligence?"

His honor twice charged the jury that they must take his charge as a whole. It is hard to see, with that statement thus emphasized, how contributory negligence could have been eliminated from any portion of it.

"(10) There being no allegation or claim set up in the complaint for damages to the property of the plaintiff, to wit, the buggy and harness, was it not error in his honor to charge the jury that the action was brought to recover damages 'for injury to her property, which she alleges she received through the negligence and willfulness and wantonness and recklessness of the defendant at a public crossing'?"

"(11) Was it not error to admit testimony, where there were no allegations to that effect in the complaint, as to the value of the property and the damage it sustained?"

Injury to the buggy was set up in the complaint. There was no error here.

[7] "(12) The action being brought by Hannah J. Spears alone (her husband being joined only as a nominal party), was it not error to admit testimony in regard to the children who were in the buggy with the plaintiff at the time she received the alleged injuries, and the injuries received by them, each of them having a right of action?"

Mental sufferings were alleged. If Mrs. Spears was a normal woman and mother, her greatest sufferings were her apprehensions of harm to her own children and her little kinswoman, committed to her care. That they may have a cause of action in no way diminished her own sufferings. There is no error here.

[8] "(13) Was it not error to allow a witness to express the opinion that the crossing in question in this action 'was the most dangerous place I knew of to cross,' said witness giving no facts showing he had a right to give an opinion?"

It does not appear from the case that his honor ruled on the question; but, if he did, the witness stated the facts fully upon which the opinion was based. There is no error here.

[9] "(14) In refusing defendant's motion for nonsuit as to exemplary or punitive damages on the grounds, in writing, taken on circuit and renewed in this court, said grounds constituting subdivision 1 of third section of grounds of appeal.

"(15) Did he not err in refusing to grant a nonsuit generally on the grounds, in writing, taken at the trial and renewed in this court as subdivision 2 of said third section?"

"(16) Did he not err in refusing to grant defendant's motion for direction of a verdict on same grounds?"

"(17) Did his honor not err in refusing to grant defendant's motion for a new trial upon the grounds submitted in writing and renewed in this court as grounds of appeal as the fourth section of said grounds of appeal?"

Whether a thing is done advertently or inadvertently is an inference from all the facts proved, and this inference is to be drawn by the jury. There is no error here.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

CRAFT v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 20, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 882*)—RIGHT TO COMPLAIN.

Where the complaint, in an action against a railroad company for injury received while crossing defendant's right of way, alleged that it was a place over which the public had a right to travel, and asked the trial judge to instruct as to the public's right over the path, plaintiff cannot complain that instructions defining that right were not germane to the issue.

2. RAILROADS (§ 356*)—INJURY TO PEDESTRIAN—INSTRUCTIONS—"TRAVELED PLACE."

In an action against a railway company for injury to a pedestrian who fell into an excavation on defendant's right of way, along a pathway, it was not error to instruct that, for a pathway or a "traveled place" to be characterized as such, it must be used by the public generally and not particular individuals, must be such as is common to all, etc.

3. RAILROADS (§ 398*)—PEDESTRIANS—LICENSE TO USE PATHWAY—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; John S. Wilson, Judge. Action by H. C. Craft against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Best & Cunningham and Porter McMaster, all of Columbia, for appellant. Lyles & Lyles, of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action brought by the appellant against the respondent for personal injury. The appellant's statement contains the following: "The plaintiff brings this action against respondent herein on account of injuries which he alleges to have received on the night of November 3, 1910, as he was returning to his home along a footway or pathway extending from Olympia avenue across the right of way of said defendant to a certain pasture and from thence to Congaree river. That while returning home along said pathway, and on account of a hole being dug therein some five feet deep and five feet wide, being open and unprotected, that plaintiff fell therein. That all the testimony shows that said pathway as alleged in the complaint extended from a certain point on Olympia avenue across the right of way of the Seaboard Air Line Railway to a pasture which was used by the mill employes and from there on to Congaree river, where the mill employes often resorted for the purpose of fishing, hunting, pleasure, and recreation. That the testimony shows that the pathway as alleged and described in the complaint had been used by the people of the mill neighborhood from eight to ten years without objection or protest on the part of the defendant and traveled frequently and continuously by the said mill people in going to the pasture and the Congaree river and in visiting each other in the community of the Olympia village, and that about 5,000 people resided in the mill village, and it is a suburb of Columbia."

While there is some conflict of testimony as to whether the path was made by the mill people or the railroad employes while some concrete and steel work was being done on the railroad, it is not important in the view we take of this case. It may be well to state further that the hole into which the plaintiff fell was in the pasture, and that at the entrance into and exit from the pasture the path was crossed by a barbed wire fence, and in order to cross the fence pedestrians pulled the strands of wire apart. There were gates to the pasture, but they were on the other side of the pasture. The testimony showed that the railroad company or its contractors (immaterial here) had made some improvements in the track near by, and afterwards the people walked nearer the track, and at the time of the accident the path was partly overgrown with grass. The plaintiff himself testified as follows: "Q. Now, Mr. Craft, you say the hole that night was grown up in grass? A. It was grown up and blown full of fine grass, grass all over it." Some months before the employees of the company had dug a hole directly in the path to put up a derrick, thus completely blocking the path. Plaintiff testified at folio 56 of the case: "I traveled this path the last time, before my leg was broke, was when they had the derrick up there placing the machinery about, and did not travel it any more until I got my leg broke."

There was a verdict for the defendant, and plaintiff appealed with six exceptions.

[1] Appellant thus states the questions, and we will adopt his statement: "The plaintiff raises six exceptions to his honor's rulings, and they allege error on the part of his honor in charging the defendant's seventh, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth requests, and for convenience these exceptions will here be treated together, as they more or less embody the same propositions of law relative to the issues of the case and to which the plaintiff excepts as being erroneous. The foregoing requests charged that, in order for a pathway or a 'traveled place' to be characterized as such, it must begin at a public place and end at a public place; must be used by the public generally, and not particular individuals; must be such a way as is common to all; that it must not be used by a limited community or class of people. It is respectfully submitted that under the law of this state (which will hereafter be set forth) a pathway, footway, or traveled place is not subject to those conditions incident to public roads." The complaint alleged that "it was a place over which the public had a right to travel." The appellant also asked the presiding judge to charge the jury as to right the public have over the path and cannot complain that the charge was not germane to the issue.

[2-4] The appellant complains that his honor applied to a public footpath the test of a public road. His honor did not apply the whole test. There has been no sufficient reason suggested for holding that "public" in the one case should have one meaning and another meaning in the other.

In the case of State v. Duncan, 1 McCord, 404, the court said that a way leading from a highway and terminating at a private house or a particular neighborhood is not a public but a private way. In State v. Randall, 1 Strob. 110, 47 Am. Dec. 548, the court said that the ending of a way at a river where country produce was shipped was not public, for the use was for a particular purpose.

The case of State v. Gregg, 2 Hill, 387, said a way to a church was not public but private. His honor charged more favorably to the plaintiff than he was entitled. These exceptions as to a public use and public place cannot be sustained.

The appellant, however, relies upon Matthews v. Railway, 67 S. C. 499, 46 S. E. 335, 65 L. R. A. 286, to show that he was entitled to a judgment. While this court is not required to do more than pass upon the exceptions, it will, in order that it may not decide the case upon a technicality, consider the case according to the rules laid down in the Matthew Case: "While a railroad company cannot lose its right of way by alienation or prescription, because of the public's interest in its holding it for public purposes, it may impose upon itself as a private corporation duties and obligations to the public or to individuals, by inviting the use of the right of way, or indicating its willingness that it should be used by the public or particular individuals. In such circumstances, the duty devolves on the railroad company to exercise ordinary care to avoid injury to those so using the right of way. This rule is not peculiar to railroads, but is of general application. The invitation need not be expressed in words, but may be implied in a number of ways; such, for instance, as the actual construction or repairing by the railroad company of a road or a bridge along the right of way, which would not be suggestive of any other use except travel on foot or in the ordinary vehicles of the country."

It would be impossible for the writer of this opinion to make a clearer statement than that. Had the company done anything from which an invitation or permission could have been inferred? On both sides of the hole and across the path there was a fence, and on the path no provision for crossing. The plaintiff said it was a barbed wire fence, and he lifted it to get through. We see no evidence from which an invitation or even a willingness could be inferred.

Besides this, the company, not being able to surrender its right of way could reclaim the exclusive use at any time its public business required. It did reclaim it and erected obstructions in the path itself, and of this obstruction the plaintiff knew. Plaintiff himself said: "I traveled this path the last time, before my leg was broke, was when they had the derrick up there placing the machinery about, and did not travel it any more until I got my leg broke." The plaintiff knew that the invitation was at least temporarily withdrawn. If the invitation was ever renewed, there is no evidence of it in the case. One of the plaintiff's witnesses said the path is not there now and most of the people walk by the fill and not by the path. It really does not make any difference whether this path was used by the public, or by a particular class of people, or by one person.

The defendant asks this court to sustain the judgment appealed from on the ground that there is no evidence to sustain a judgment for the plaintiff. We find that there is no evidence that the defendant invited or showed any willingness that the plaintiff should use this path. Those who use the right of way without invitation or willingness are trespassers, and the railroad company owes them no duty except not to harm them willfully or wantonly. The allegations of willfulness and wantonness were withdrawn.

The deed to the Southbound Railway Company, referred to in plaintiff's argument, was introduced in evidence in the circuit court, but is not a part of the case before this court, so that we have no means of making any finding as to what rights plaintiff had under that deed.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

(92 S. C. 312)

DOVE v. KIRKLAND et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1912.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 91*)—BONDS—ELECTIONS FOR ISSUANCE—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

There is no provision of the Constitution requiring the making of a survey of a school district, or the filing of a plat thereof, before the district can hold an election on the question of issuance of bonds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 210; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 91*)—BONDS—ELECTION FOR ISSUANCE—CURATIVE ACT.

Though it be a condition precedent, under Acts 1907, p. 522, to the holding of an election on the question of issues of bonds by a school district that a survey of the district be made and a plat thereof filed, omission thereof, being a thing the Legislature could have previously authorized, is cured by Acts 1912, p. 1062, validating the election.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 210; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

3. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 99*)—BONDS—TAXES FOR PAYMENT—"COUNTY OFFICERS."

"County officers," in Acts 1907, p. 523, § 4, declaring it the duty of the county officers, charged with assessment and collection of taxes, to levy and collect from the property within a school district a sum to pay interest on bonds issued by the district, and to create a sinking fund to pay the bonds, has reference to those officers in the county who are authorized to levy and collect the taxes in such cases, and so does not contravene Const. art. 10, § 5, if vesting in the board of trustees of the district the power to levy and collect such taxes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 233, 234; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1663-1666.]

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 91*)—BONDS—ISSUANCE—GROUNDS FOR INJUNCTION.

Were Acts 1907, p. 523, § 4, unconstitutional as attempting to authorize the wrong officers to assess and collect taxes to pay bonds issued by a school district, it having nothing to do with the issuance of the bonds, would not be ground for enjoining their issue, as, even in the absence of a provision for levying a special assessment for their payment, a remedy for their enforcement will be found.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 210; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

5. STATUTES (§ 122*)—TITLE AND SUBJECT.

Acts 1912, p. 1062, entitled "An act to validate, ratify and confirm all proceedings of the trustees of a school district, * * * calling and holding an election * * * on the question of issuing of bonds, * * * and authorizing the issuing of bonds pursuant to the vote at such election," does not contravene Const. art. 3, § 17, providing that every act shall have but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title, because declaring all proceedings in connection with the election validated, providing that bonds are to be $500 each, declaring that they shall be valid and have the qualities of negotiable paper, and, when issued and paid for, shall be noncontestible in the hands of bona fide purchasers, and that they shall be exempt from taxation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 175; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

6. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 91*)—BONDS—ELECTION FOR ISSUANCE—CURATIVE ACT.

The irregularities of holding an election on the question of issuance of bonds, by a school district, without the trustees having ascertained whether the petition for the election contained the necessary number of signatures, or having had the district surveyed and a plat thereof filed, though not expressly mentioned, are cured by Acts 1912, p. 1062, providing that all acts and proceedings of the trustees in calling and holding the election, including the notice thereof, the designation of the time and place of voting, the appointment of managers of the election and all proceedings in the conduct of it, and receiving the returns and declaring the result, are validated with like effect as if all steps taken by the trustees had been authorized by law, notwithstanding any irregularity or omission which may have occurred in the conduct and management of the election and the giving of said notice and the other proceedings of the trustees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 210; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

7. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 53*)—OFFICERS—DE FACTO OFFICERS—HOLDING OTHER OFFICE.

Though when one was appointed a trustee of a school district he was a member of a township board of assessors, and thereafter continued to act as such, he was a de facto trustee of the school district, notwithstanding Const. art. 2, § 2, declaring no person shall hold two offices of honor or profit at the same time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 127-135; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

8. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 53*)— OFFICERS—DE FACTO OFFICERS.

One appointed a trustee of a school district, though, under Civ. Code 1902, § 1210, not qualified to act as such, because not a qualified elector of the district, is a de facto trustee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 127-135; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

"To be officially reported."

Original proceedings by W. Banks Dove against B. B. Kirkland and others, as the Board of Trustees of School District No. 13, Richland County and others. Petition dismissed.

The petition is as follows:

"The petitioner herein, through his attorneys, Clarkson & Clarkson, respectfully presents:

"(1) That the said petitioner is a resident taxpayer and freeholder residing within the limits of school district No. 13, Richland county, the state of South Carolina.

"(2) That the respondents B. B. Kirkland, J. B. Duke, and Geo. W. Taylor are exercising the duties of the board of trustees of the above-mentioned district. That the respondents B. C. Du Pre and P. B. Spigener are the auditor and treasurer, respectively, of the said county, and that the respondents William Stork, S. W. Dent, and William Platt are the board of assessors of Columbia township, in said county. That the respondents Geo. W. Taylor, C. S. Lever, and W. H. Sondley are the board of assessors for Upper township, in said county, and that the respondents J. B. Duke, G. S. Pooser, and Geo. W. Newman are the county board of assessors for Eau Claire, a tax district in said county. That the said school district No. 13 is composed of parts of Columbia township, Upper township, and all of Eau Claire, and that the said auditor, treasurer, and boards of assessors are the county officers charged with the assessment and collection of taxes within the said district.

"(3) That on information and belief, on or about the — day of —, 1900, the county board of education for Richland county, acting by and under the authority vested in them by law, created school district No. 13, with certain boundaries, and thereafter, on the 31st day of March, 1911, the said board enlarged the boundaries of the said district and established them as follows, to wit: 'From where the C. C. & A. Railroad leaves limits of Columbia, and up the said road to the five-mile post of said road, then extending in a northwesternly direction to the intersection of the Winnsboro road and Crane creek; thence up said Winnsboro road to the seven-mile post; thence in a westernly direction parallel with Crane creek to Broad river and down Broad river to the city limits; thence along city limits to the intersection of the limits of the city of Columbia and C. C. & A. R. R.' That thereafter, on the 20th day of June, 1912, after the election hereinafter set forth, the board of trustees of the said district caused a survey of the said district to be made by a competent surveyor by and in accordance with and upon the boundaries as fixed by the county board of education, as set out above, and a plat thereof to be filed in the office of the clerk of court for Richland county; and the size and extent of the said district were correctly ascertained by the said surveyor to be thirteen and 76/100 (13.76) square miles. That your petitioner alleges that the said survey as made was not sufficient, in that the northern boundaries of the said district were not actually run out upon the ground, but were fixed by the location of the extremities thereof.

"(4) That the respondent Geo. W. Taylor was appointed a member of the township board of assessors for Upper township on or about the — day of February, 1911, and has been since that day exercising the duties thereof. That the said respondent was appointed a member of the board of trustees for school district No. 13 on or about the 18th day of August, 1911, and has been since that day exercising the duties thereof. That the respondent J. B. Duke was appointed a member of the board of trustees of the said district on the 5th day of July, 1910, and a member of the county board of assessors for Eau Claire on the — day of February, 1911, and has been, since the respective dates of his appointment, exercising the duties of both offices. That the respondent B. B. Kirkland is not a qualified elector of Richland county.

"(5) That on the 15th day of August, 1911, an election was held within the said district on the question of issuing bonds under the act of 1907, p. 522, which provides as follows, to wit: 'That the trustees of any public school district in the state of South Carolina are hereby authorized and empowered to issue and sell coupon bonds of the said school district, payable to bearer, in such denominations and amounts as they may deem necessary, not to exceed four per cent. of the assessed valuation of the property of such school district, for taxation, and bearing a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, payable annually or semi-annually, and at such times as they may deem best: Provided, that the question of issuing the bonds authorized in this section shall be first submitted to the qualified voters of such school district, at an election to be held upon the written petition or request of at least one-third of the resident electors and a like proportion of the resident freeholders of the age of twenty-one years to determine whether said bonds shall be issued or not, as herein provided: Provided further, that before any election is held under this act, it shall be the duty of the trustees of the school district to have a survey of said school district made by some competent surveyor, and a plat thereof made and filed in the office of clerk of court.' That the amount of the bonds to be issued were not to exceed $20,000, and were for the purpose of providing funds with which to build a schoolhouse, and that the said election resulted in favor of the issuance of the said bonds by a vote of twelve for and three against.

"(6) That on information and belief the said election was illegal, null and void, for the reason that the provisions of the act of 1907, p. 522, authorizing the issuance of bonds by school districts, was not carried out in the following points, to wit:

"(a) That there has been no ascertainment as to whether the petition filed with the board of trustees contained the signatures of the necessary one-third (1/3) of the resident electors, etc.

"(b) That at the time of the said election no survey of the said district had been made; nor had a plat thereof been filed in the office of the clerk of the court.

"(7) That thereafter, on the _____ day of February, 1912, the General Assembly attempted to validate the said election by the passage of the following act, to wit:

"An act to validate, ratify and confirm all proceedings of the trustees of school district No. 13, of Richland county, calling and holding an election on the 15th day of August, 1911, on the question of issuing bonds of said school district in an amount not exceeding $20,000.00, and authorizing the issuing of bonds pursuant to the vote at such election.

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of South Carolina, that all acts and proceedings had and taken by the trustees of school district No. 13, of Richland county, in calling and holding a special election in the said school district on the 15th day of August, 1911, on the question of issuing bonds of said school district to an amount not exceeding $20,000.00, bearing interest from January 1, 1912, at the rate of five per cent. interest, payable semi-annually, and principal payable twenty years after date, for the purpose of erecting a school building for maintaining a public school in said district, including the notice of such election, given by said trustees, the designation of the time and place of voting, the appointment of the managers of such election and all proceedings in the conduct of said election, and in receiving the returns of the managers and declaration of the result thereof, be, and the same are hereby, validated, ratified and confirmed with like effect, as if all the steps taken by said trustees had been duly authorized by law, notwithstanding any irregularity or omission which may have occurred in the conduct and management of the said election, and the giving of said notice, and the other proceedings of the said trustees. The said bonds are to be in denominations of $500.00 each, and bonds of said school district to be issued by virtue of said election are hereby declared to be valid bonds of the said school district and shall have all the qualities of negotiable paper, under the law merchant, and when sold and paid for in the manner prescribed by law shall be incontestible in the hands of bona fide purchasers for value. The bonds so issued are hereby exempted from all taxes, state, county and municipal.

"Sec. 2. This act shall take effect immediately upon its approval by the Governor.' Acts 1912, p. 1062.

"(8) That on or about the 27th day of April 1912, the said B. B. Kirkland, J. B. Duke, and Geo. W. Taylor, acting as the board of trustees of the said district, sold the said bonds, above mentioned, to the Palmetto National Bank, and are now about to issue and deliver the same to the said purchasers as a valid debt of the said district.

"(9) That on information and belief said bond issue is illegal, null and void, for the following reasons, to wit:

"(a) That article 11, § 5, Const. 1895, which provides, among other things, that 'the General Assembly shall provide * * * for the division of counties in suitable school districts, as compact in form as practicable, having regard to natural boundaries and not to exceed forty-nine nor less than nine square miles,' contemplates an actual survey and location of the boundaries of a school district upon the ground; whereas the northern boundaries of school district No. 13 have never been actually laid out on the ground, and in consequence thereof the said school district has never been properly formed.

"(b) That the method provided by the act of 1907, p. 522, for the assessment and collection of taxes, to wit: 'Section 4. * * * It shall be the duty of the county officers charged with the assessment and collection of taxes to levy and collect annually from all the property, real and personal, within the limits of such school district, a sum sufficient to pay interest on such bonds, and also a sum sufficient to provide a sinking fund for the payment of such bonds when due'—is unconstitutional, for the reason that the corporate authorities of school districts, to wit, the board of trustees, are vested with this power by the Constitution of 1895, art. 10, § 5, to wit: 'The corporate authorities of counties, townships, school districts, * * * may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes.'

"(c) That the validating act of 1912, p. 1062, is unconstitutional, in that it relates to more than one subject, to wit, to the validation of the proceedings taken in the election of August 15, 1911, to the investment of the bonds to be issued thereunder with the qualities of negotiable paper, to the fixing of their denominations, to the rendering of them noncontestible in the hands of bona fide purchasers for value, and to the exemption of them from all taxes, all of which is contrary to article 3, § 17, Const. 1895, which provides as follows, to wit: 'Every act or resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title.'

"(d) That the validating act of 1912, p. 1062, does not cure the failure of the board of trustees to ascertain as to whether or not the petition filed with them, calling for the election held on the 15th day of August, 1911, contained the necessary number of signatures, or their failure to have the school district surveyed and a plat thereof filed with the clerk of court, for the reason that those defects are not set out in the act.

"(e) That the survey of the — day of June, 1912, and the subsequent filing of the plat is not sufficient, for the reason that the making of a survey and the filing of a plat is a condition antecedent to the holding of an election upon the question of issuing bonds.

"(f) That the trustees Geo. W. Taylor and J. B. Duke are not qualified to hold the positions of school trustees, for the reason that they are now holding positions on the boards of assessors in the tax districts included in school district No. 13, contrary to article 2, § 2, Constitution 1895, which provides as follows, to wit: 'Sec. 2. * * * But no person shall hold two offices of honor or profit at the same time.'

"(g) That the respondent B. B. Kirkland is not a qualified elector, and therefore not qualified to act as trustee, as appears by reference to section 1210, Code 1902, vol. 1, which provides: 'Each county board of education * * * shall appoint from each school district in their county, three school trustees from the qualified electors and taxpayers, residing within the district. * * *'

Clarkson & Clarkson, for petitioner. Thomas & Lumpkin, for respondents.

GARY, C. J. This is an application to the court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, for an order enjoining the respondents from issuing bonds not exceeding $20,000 in amount, to be used in building a schoolhouse; the result of an election held under the act of 1907 being in favor of issuing said bonds.

In order to understand clearly the questions involved, it will be necessary to set out the petition in the report of the case. The facts alleged in the petition are not denied by the defendants in their return to the rule to show cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted. The grounds upon which the petitioner relies are lettered as follows: (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), and (g), and will be considered in regular order.

[1, 2] (a) This ground cannot be sustained for the reason that there is no provision of the Constitution requiring that a survey should be made, or a plat filed, before an election could be held; and, even conceding that such requirement, under the case of McLaurin v. Tatum, 85 S. C. 444, 67 S. E. 560, is a condition precedent, it was rendered ineffectual by the validating act of 1912.

"The pivotal point in a healing or validating statute is that it must be confined to acts which the Legislature could previously have authorized." State v. Whitesides, 30 S. C. 579, 9 S. E. 661, 3 L. R. A. 777; State v. Neely, 30 S. C. 587, 9 S. E. 664, 3 L. R. A. 672.

"Although necessarily retroactive, curative acts are not, for that reason, invalid; for the general rule is that the Legislature can validate any act which it might originally have authorized." 28 Enc. of Law, 698, 699.

"A retrospective statute, curing defects in legal proceedings, where they are in their nature irregularities only, and do not extend to matters of jurisdiction, is not void on unconstitutional grounds, unless expressly forbidden. Of this class, are the statutes to cure irregularities in the assessment of property for taxation and the levy of taxes thereon, irregularities in the organization or election of corporations, irregularities in the votes or other action by municipal corporations, or the like, where a statutory power has failed of due and regular execution through the carelessness of officers or other cause, irregular proceedings in courts, etc. The rule applicable to cases of this description is substantially the following: If the thing wanting, or which failed to be done, and which constitutes the defect in the proceedings, is something, the necessity for which the Legislature might have dispensed with by prior statute, then it is not beyond the power of the Legislature to dispense with it by subsequent statute. And if the irregularity consists in doing some act which the Legislature might have made immaterial by prior law it is equally competent to make the same immaterial by a subsequent law." Cooley's Con. Lim. 456, 457.

These authorities are quoted with approval in the case of Hodge v. School District, 80 S. C. 518, 61 S. E. 1009, and are conclusive of this question.

[3, 4] (b) There are two reasons why this ground cannot be sustained: (1) Because the provision in section 4 of the act of 1907, that "it shall be the duty of the county officers charged with the assessment and collection of taxes to levy and collect annually from all the property, real and personal, within the limits of such school district, a sum sufficient to pay the interest on such bonds, and also a sum sufficient to provide a sinking fund for the payment of such bonds when due," has reference to those officers in the county who are authorized to levy and collect the taxes in such cases; and (2) because the provisions of the section just quoted have reference to future action, and are not a condition precedent to the holding of an election for the purpose of determining whether the bonds should be issued. That section does not relate to the issuing of the bonds, but to their payment after they have been issued. A similar question arose in the case of Welch v. Getzen, 85 S. C. 156, 67 S. E. 294, and was thus disposed of by the court: "Conceding 'that there is no provision of the law allowing the levy of a special tax in the high school district for the purpose of paying off coupon bonds, issued to raise funds for high school purposes in such district,' we fail to see why that should be a ground for enjoining the issue of such bonds, as it is not a condition precedent. When bonds are issued, there arises a contract between the purchaser and seller, the obligation of which cannot be impaired, as it would be in violation of article 1, § 10, of the United States Constitution, and of article 1, § 8, of the Constitution of South Carolina. All parties having entered into a valid contract, a remedy for its enforcement will always be found."

[6] (c) It is only necessary to cite the following cases to show that this ground cannot be sustained: Connor v. Railway, 23 S. C. 427; Floyd v. Perrin, 30 S. C. 1, 8 S. E. 14, 2 L. R. A. 242; Riley v. Union Station Co., 71 S. C. 457, 51 S. E. 485, 110 Am. St. Rep. 579; State v. O'Day, 74 S. C. 448, 54 S. E. 607; Park v. Cotton Mills, 75 S. C. 560, 56 S. E. 234; Aycock-Little Co. v. Railway, 76 S. C. 331, 57 S. E. 27; Buist v. Charleston, 77 S. C. 260, 57 S. E. 862; State v. Hunter, 79 S. C. 91, 60 S. E. 226; Jellico v. Commissioners, 83 S. C. 481, 65 S. E. 725; Power Co. v. Walker, 89 S. C. 84, 71 S. E. 356; State v. Fant, 88 S. C. 493, 70 S. E. 1027.

[6] (d) This ground cannot be sustained for the reason that the validating act of 1912 cures such irregularities.

(e) What has already been said disposes of this question.

[7] (f) The case of Welch v. Getzen, 85 S. C. 156, 67 S. E. 294, shows that this ground cannot be sustained, as Geo. W. Taylor and J. B. Duke were de facto trustees.

[6] (g) What has already been said disposes of this ground.

Petition dismissed.

(11 Ga. App. 407)

HARRELL v. STATE. (No. 4,254.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 34*)—FORMAL REQUISITES—INDORSEMENT.

Where an indictment or special presentment is returned into court as a "true bill," containing the names of as many as 18 persons, written in the face thereof, as constituting the members of the grand jury who acted on it, and the minutes of the court show that these persons were the regularly impaneled grand jurors for the term, a manifest clerical error made by the foreman in failing to write his full name on the back of the indictment, following the indorsement "a true bill," is immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 138-143; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

2. JURY (§ 116*)—CHALLENGES—GROUNDS.

It is not a good ground for challenge to the array that the jurors heard the evidence relating to the commission of the offense on the trial of a special plea in abatement. The objection, if good at all, should be made to the poll.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 542, 543; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 586*)—CONTINUANCE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Continuances are in the sound discretion of the trial judge. No abuse of discretion in refusing a continuance appears in the present case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1311; Dec. Dig. § 586.*]

4. NO ERROR—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

No error of law appears, and the evidence supports the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Berrien County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Dan Harrell was convicted of the statutory offense of stabbing, and brings error. Affirmed.

Hendricks & Christian and J. P. Knight, all of Nashville, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Wilkes, Sol. Gen., of Moultrie, for the State.

HILL, C. J. [1] This was an indictment for assault with intent to murder, and a conviction of the statutory offense of stabbing. When the case was called for trial, and before arraignment, the accused filed a plea in abatement, based upon the allegation that there was no valid indictment returned against him. The evidence introduced in support of this plea showed that the indictment, as returned into court by the grand jury, had the name "A. W. Patter," or "A. W. Patten," written on the back as the foreman of the grand jury, when in fact there was no such grand juror; the real name of the foreman being A. W. Patterson—the last syllable of the name having been omitted. The solicitor general, deeming this defect sufficient to make the indictment void, attempted to secure another indictment at a subsequent term of the court; but for some reason the bill was not found true by the grand jury, and he put the accused on trial on the first indictment. The minutes of the court showed that A. W. Patterson was regularly drawn and sworn as a grand juror, and that he was the foreman of the grand jury that found the bill. Besides, his name was properly written in the face of the indictment as a member of the grand jury. Patterson himself testified that he signed the bill in question as foreman, and intended to sign his full name on the back as foreman, and thought that he had done so; that in signing his name he usually failed to write out the last syllable in full, indicating it by a line. The indictment appeared to have been found true by the requisite number of grand jurors, all of whose names were written in the indictment.

We think the alleged error in the signature of the foreman was immaterial. In the absence of a mandatory statute, the doctrine best sustained by reason and authority is that the words "true bill" and the signature of the foreman may be dispensed with altogether, if the fact of the jury's finding appears in any other form in the record; and, even where the words "true bill" are required by statute, the foreman's signature thereon is not necessary. 1 Bishop's New Criminal Procedure, § 700. In Commonwealth v. Smyth, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 473, it is held that this omission in the indictment is simply the omission of a form which, if oftentimes found convenient and useful, is in reality unimportant, and that the lack of the indorsement was not necessarily fatal to the indictment. And see Frisbie v. U. S., 157 U. S. 160, 15 Sup. Ct. 586, 39 L. Ed. 657. In McGuffie v. State, 17 Ga. 510, it is held that there is no positive law requiring that the foreman of a grand jury should sign the finding at all; that this seems not to have been the practice at common law; and that our statute made no change in this respect. The court said, however, that the practice of the foreman signing his name to the true bill as foreman was advisable. In that case the court further held, in effect, that the minutes of the court would show who in fact was the foreman of the grand jury that found the bill. Section 812 of the Penal Code of 1910 requires that "a grand jury shall consist of not less than eighteen and not more than twenty three persons." We therefore think that if the bill of indictment or special presentment contains the names of as many as 18 persons written therein, and these persons are shown by the minutes to have been the regular qualified grand jurors by whom the indictment or presentment was returned, this would be sufficient, although the indictment was not signed by any one of them as foreman. In the present case the minutes of the court showed that A. W. Patterson was in fact a grand juror. He testified that he was the foreman of the grand jury, and that he had signed his name as foreman to the true bill; and it appeared that his name was written in the face of the bill as foreman of the grand jury, and his explanation was entirely satisfactory as to the apparent error in writing out the last syllable of his name. The irregularity was trivial, and the trial judge very properly held that it was immaterial. A merely clerical misprision in writing a name of the grand jurors will not avoid the indictment. State ex rel. Dunn v. Noyes, 87 Wis. 340, 58 N. W. 386, 27 L. R. A. 783, 41 Am. St. Rep. 45, and notes. The fact that the solicitor general attempted to get another bill, and failed to do so, did not invalidate the one that had already been properly found and returned into court.

[2] 2. The challenge to the array of jurors was made on the alleged ground that they had heard the testimony relating to the offense on the trial of the special plea in abatement. The record does not show that this was true; but, if so, it was not a good ground for challenge to the array. If any one of the jurors heard the testimony on the trial of the special plea in abatement, and was thereby disqualified, the disqualification would doubtless have appeared in the examination on the voir dire, and, if good at all, could then have been made by challenge to the poll.

[3] 3. There was no abuse of discretion in overruling the motion to continue on the ground of the absence of witnesses.

[4] 4. No error of law prejudicial to the accused appears to have been committed on the trial of the case, and the verdict of stabbing was supported by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

MANGHAM et al. v. STATE. (No. 4,063.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1178*)—WRIT OF ERROR—ABANDONMENT OF ERROR.

Assignments of error, not relied upon in the argument or referred to in the briefs, will be treated as having been abandoned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3011-3013; Dec. Dig. § 1178.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 152*)—DIVIDENDS—"NET EARNINGS."

Dividends can lawfully be declared and distributed only out of the actual, legitimate net earnings of the corporation; and the difference between the present value of all the corporate assets and the amount of all losses, expenses, and liabilities, including the capital stock, constitutes "net earnings" for the purpose of dividends. It follows that an insolvent corporation cannot have net earnings out of which dividends can be lawfully declared and paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 564-567; Dec. Dig. § 152.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4777-4779.]

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 152*)—OFFICERS—CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Where a corporation declares and pays a dividend, not from its actual, legitimate net earnings, but from cash which should be applied to the payment of current expenses, and from borrowed money, the payment of such dividend "necessarily increases its debts."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 564-567; Dec. Dig. § 152.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 369*)—OFFICERS—CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Where the evidence showed that the business of the corporation was largely, if not entirely, intrusted to the control and management of the accused, and that, as officers of the corporation in actual charge of its current business, they had full opportunity to acquire detailed knowledge of its financial condition, such knowledge will be presumed; and where it is also shown that they prepared and presented to the directors a statement purporting to give a true exhibit of the financial status of the corporation, and, based on this statement, they joined with the directors in the declaration and distribution of the dividend, and it subsequently appeared that this statement was in fact not a true presentation of the financial condition of the corporation, the jury was authorized to infer that the accused, with knowledge of the true financial condition of the business of the corporation, made and presented the false and fictitious statement for the purpose of deceiving the directors as to its true financial status.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1510; Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

5. FORMER DECISION CONTROLLING.

All other propositions of law raised by the record are fully controlled by the decision of this court in Cabaniss v. State, 8 Ga. App. 129, 68 S. E. 849.

Error from Superior Court, Spalding County; Robt. T. Daniel, Judge.

J. J. Mangham and another were convicted of unlawfully declaring and distributing a dividend of a corporation, and bring error. Affirmed.

R. R. Arnold, W. A. Fuller, and Dodd & Dodd, all of Atlanta, and Frank Flynt and Charles Mills, both of Griffin, for plaintiffs in error. J. W. Wise, Sol. Gen., of Fayetteville, and Wm. H. Beck and T. E. Patterson, both of Griffin, for the State.

HILL, C. J. J. J. Mangham, as treasurer and director, and J. W. Mangham, as secretary and director, were jointly indicted and convicted for a violation of section 740 of the Penal Code of 1910, which declares: "No joint-stock company, corporation, or other association shall declare any dividend, or distribute any money among its members as profits, when such dividend, or money, is not declared or distributed from the actual legitimate net earnings of its investments, and does in any manner increase its debts. Any president, director, or other officer or agent of any joint-stock company, corporation, or other association, violating the provisions of this section, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

[1] The accused filed a demurrer to the indictment, based on numerous grounds, and excepted to the overruling of the demurrer; but in the argument and brief in this court their counsel do not refer to these exceptions, and we will therefore consider them as having been abandoned. It may be stated, however, that the decision of this court in Cabaniss v. State, 8 Ga. App. 129, 68 S. E. 849, fully controls the questions raised by the demurrer.

[2] Before this court learned counsel for the plaintiffs in error insist that the verdict of guilty is contrary to law and without evidence to support it. In other words, they present for determination squarely the merits of the case against the accused. The law applicable to the facts, they insist, was correctly charged by the court, as follows: "The state, in making out its case against these defendants, must satisfy your minds beyond a reasonable doubt, first, that a dividend was declared and paid to the stockholders; second, that these defendants participated in the act of declaring and paying and distributing that dividend; third, that the declaration and payment of the dividend in question was made out of funds of the corporation other than those arising out of the net earnings of its legitimate investments; fourth, that the declaration and payment of the dividend increased in some way the debts of the corporation; fifth, that unless the defendants knew that this dividend, declared and distributed from funds of the corporation, was other than actual net earnings, there could be no conviction."

We thoroughly agree with the statement of learned counsel that these instructions correctly stated the provisions of law involved and cast the burden upon the state. It is conceded that a dividend was declared by the directors of the corporation as charged in the indictment, and that there is positive evidence of the fact that the accused participated in the declaration and payment and distribution of this dividend. But it is insisted that the state has failed to establish at least three of the essential elements of the offense: (1) That the state failed to prove that the company did not earn any profits for the year ending May 28, 1910, out of which the dividend was declared and paid; (2) that the state did not prove that the debts of the company were increased by the declaration and payment of dividends, or that the payment of the dividend in question bore any relation to the debts of the company; and (3) that the evidence fails to show knowledge on the part of either of the defendants that the dividend in question was not declared and paid and distributed in fact from the net earnings of the investments of the corporation. In the able and exhaustive argument and briefs presented to us relating to these propositions, it is justly contended that, if either one of the three propositions is not proved, the conviction of the accused is contrary to law. We will take up the propositions in their order and discuss them in the light of the evidence.

Does the evidence show that the corporation declared and distributed dividends for the year ending May 28, 1910, from the actual, legitimate net earnings of its investments? If it did, the law was not violated; if it did not, the statute was violated, and all of the directors and officers who participated in the declaration and distribution of the dividends were guilty of a misdemeanor. Under the express terms of the statute, no joint-stock company, corporation, or other association can lawfully declare any dividend or distribute any money among its members as profits when such dividend or money is not declared or distributed from "the actual legitimate net earnings of its investments." This prohibition of the statute is but the declaration of the general rule that dividends can be declared and paid only out of the profits or surplus earnings of the company. What is meant by the term "net earnings?" This term is simply a synonym for the profits of the business, and, popularly speaking, the net receipts of a business are its profits, and the surplus over and above the capital stock and debts constitutes profits. We give several clear and comprehensive definitions of "profits." As defined by the New Jersey Chancery Court, "net profits" mean what shall remain as the clear gains of any business venture, after deducting the capital invested in the business, the expenses incurred in its conduct, and the losses sustained in its prosecution." Park v. Grant Locomotive Works, 40 N. J. Eq. 114, 3 Atl. 162. "The surplus over and above the capital and debts constitutes profits." Barry v. Merchants' Exchange, 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 280, 307. And the Supreme Court of the United States said that the term "profits," out of which dividends alone can be declared, denotes what remains after defraying every expense, including loans falling due, as well as interest on such loans. Eyster v. Centennial Board, 94 U. S. 500, 24 L. Ed. 188. Comprehensively speaking, the net earnings are the amount of earnings left after deducting the indebtedness of the company from its gross earnings; and it therefore follows that there can be no actual, legitimate net earnings as long as the outstanding indebtedness of the company is greater than its income. In other words, a valid dividend can only be declared out of the surplus, after paying all liabilities. The purpose of this law is twofold: First, to preserve the assets or property of the corporation for its creditors; and, secondly, to prevent the obtaining of money, to be invested in the stock of the corporation, by false declarations of profitable business.

[5] The learned trial judge in the present case instructed the jury that "a corporation which is insolvent may, from its actual, legitimate earnings on its investment for a particular and definite period, pay a dividend, and an insolvent corporation may, for a particular period, have legitimate earnings." This view of the law was very favorable to the accused. We do not think it is sound. We think that dividends may be paid from the surplus which may have accumulated from the profits of previous years, although there may have been no actual profits during the year in which such dividends are declared and paid; but we think it absolutely a condition precedent to the declaration and distribution of dividends that there must be a surplus previously accumulated or made during the current year; for it is not possible for an insolvent corporation to lawfully declare and distribute a dividend, for the very simple reason that it cannot have any surplus or net earnings as long as it is unable to pay its indebtedness. 5 Thompson on Corporations, § 5311. As dividends can only be declared and paid out of profits, it is clear that they cannot be declared unless there are profits; and, even if there are profits, still they cannot be declared and paid where the corporation is clearly insolvent. 5 Thompson on Corporations, § 5383. See, also, Cabaniss v. State, 8 Ga. App. 129, 68 S. E. 849, where it is held by this court that no declaration of a dividend is lawful in a condition of insolvency or impairment of capital stock; for any profits that may be made must first be applied to the payment of the debts of the corporation and to the restoration of the capital stock.

We now make a brief application of these general principles, which are well settled, to the evidence in the present case. The dividend declared May 31, 1910, which, it is alleged in the indictment, was an unlawful dividend, was declared by the board of directors upon faith in the correctness of a financial statement which was prepared principally by J. J. Mangham and partly by J. W. Mangham, and presented to the board of directors as a true exhibit of the financial status of the corporation. The expert accountant testified that this statement was not a true presentation of the financial condition of the corporation, but that, on the contrary, it was made up of many false entries taken from the books, such as juggling with the cash accounts, false representations as to the actual amount of cash on hand, many worthless accounts which had been carried for years as live assets, failing to charge up expenses, increasing and diminishing the cash at will by fictitious entries, and many other fraudulent manipulations of the books, for the purpose of showing a fictitious net earning; that, as a matter of fact, at the time this financial statement was submitted to the directors, instead of there being a profit, there was a loss of money and a condition of insolvency; that, instead of there being a profit of $97,000, there was a loss of over $7,000, making a difference of over $104,000, even without deducting doubtful accounts; and that in less than 10 months thereafter an audit of the affairs of the company showed it to be insolvent to the amount of $111,332, and the capital stock had been impaired or reduced from $150,000 to $38,000. The bookkeeper of the corporation testified that at this very time when the corporation claimed to have made net earnings it was borrowing money to meet its pay rolls and maturing obligations, and for the purpose of paying these dividends. The jury had a right to believe the testimony of this expert and the bookkeeper. The fact that the mill failed so soon afterwards by such a large amount, without there being any unusual financial depression affecting mill industries, clearly indicated that the financial statement was not a truthful presentation of the financial status of the corporation when the dividends were declared and distributed. It is insisted by counsel for plaintiffs in error that there was sufficient cash on hand to pay these dividends. This fact is not at all significant of a condition of solvency, and it is not by any means proof of the existence of profits or net earnings. Even an insolvent corporation can frequently have cash on hand without net earnings; but whatever cash is on hand should be applied to the payment of its debts or the restoration of its capital, and not be distributed as dividends to stockholders.

[3] It is said, in the next place, that there was no evidence showing that the debts of the company had been increased by the declaration of the dividend in question, and that under the statute this fact is an essential element of the offense. The language of the statute is, "does in any manner increase its debt." Does the declaration and payment of the dividend in any manner increase the debts of the corporation? We think learned counsel give to this language a too restricted meaning. We think it necessarily follows that an unlawful appropriation of the assets of an insolvent corporation for the payment of dividends necessarily increases its debts, in that it takes away from its creditors the assets which lawfully belong to them and gives them to the stockholders. The declaration of a dividend itself increases the debt of a corporation; for, when the dividend has been declared, it becomes a debt due the stockholders by the corporation. In other words, to the extent of the dividend, the stockholders become the creditors. This would probably not be the case, unless the dividend was lawfully declared; but in any event it is an appropriation of the money of the corporation otherwise than to the payment of its debts, and to this extent constitutes a diminution of its assets and a consequent increase of its liabilities. The testimony of the bookkeeper is that at this very time, instead of using the cash on hand to meet its pay rolls and its maturing obligations, the company actually borrowed money to pay these debts. Certainly the appropriation of the cash to pay these dividends made it necessary to borrow this money, and this certainly was increasing in some manner the debts of the corporation.

[4] It is next insisted that the state failed to show knowledge on the part of either of the defendants that the dividends were not paid from the net earnings of the investments of the company. The evidence clearly shows that, if any one connected with the company knew of its financial condition, it was J. J. Mangham. The entire management of the business of the corporation, it seems, was intrusted to him, and had been intrusted to him for years. All the contracts of the corporation were made by him; all the collections of money for the output of the mills were made by him. He bought all the cotton for the mill. He contracted all the debts for the mill. He prepared the annual statements from which the directors declared dividends. The bookkeeper testified that J. J. Mangham kept the inventory book of the mills; that, while he (the bookkeeper) kept the books of the company, they were made up from data furnished to him by J. J. Mangham; and that J. J. Mangham himself made up the financial statements presented to the directors. "I got every item that I put on the books from Mr. Mangham. He gave me the information from which I made the trial balance. They were made from the books, and he gave me the information that went into the books." If the books, therefore, were improperly manipulated, if they contained false entries, according to the testimony of the bookkeeper, Mr. Mangham was responsible for them. It is inconceivable that an officer who had entire charge of the business of the corporation for its entire life, and who made up the annual financial statements for the directors, could have been ignorant of its real financial condition. The very fact that he furnished untrue data to be put on the books shows that he did have knowledge of such condition, and was endeavoring to hide the true condition of affairs from the stockholders and creditors. Unquestionably the opportunity and ability to know the facts was, as correctly stated by the trial judge, equivalent to a knowledge of the facts.

The only evidence especially relating to the knowledge of J. W. Mangham was the statement of the bookkeeper that he assisted J. J. Mangham in the preparation of the financial statements made to the directors. But we think the law charges directors and officers with the duty of knowing the financial condition of the corporation intrusted to their management. We do not think that an officer or director can participate in an unlawful declaration and distribution of dividends, the unlawful appropriation of money which belongs to the creditors of the corporation, the improper use of the assets of the corporation, and, when called upon to account for such unlawful conduct, protect himself by the statement that he was ignorant of the affairs of the corporation. If present, participating in the declaration of the dividend, the law presumes that he did so with knowledge of the affairs of the corporation, and holds him to a strict accountability for his official act. The burden is on him to show that, although he did participate in the unlawful distribution of the property of the corporation, he did so without any knowledge of its financial condition. In the present case both of the accused, in their statements to the jury, insisted that they had protested against the declaration of the dividend in question; that while, in their opinion, there were sufficient net earnings from which to declare a dividend, yet, in their judgment, the profits earned should have been used for the benefit of the corporation in the protection of its business and the improvement of its plant, and should not have been distributed among the stockholders; and the court told the jury that, if they believed this statement to be the truth, the defendants would not be guilty. But some of the directors testified that they were present, and that neither one of the accused made any objection to the declaration of the dividend, but both of them voted for it. This was a matter for the jury. After giving the record a most careful investigation, and considering the very fair and most favorable charge of the trial judge, we have been unable to find any reason why another trial should be had.

Judgment affirmed.

MANGHAM v. STATE. (No. 4,062.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 5*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—INTENT.

To constitute the offense of embezzlement, there must be both a wrongful conversion and a fraudulent intent; but where the money of the principal is knowingly used by the agent for his own private benefit, and in violation of his duty to the principal, it is none the less embezzlement because, at the time of the unlawful use, the agent intended subsequently to restore the money. An officer or agent of a corporation cannot take money of the corporation which is intrusted to him, or which comes into his possession by virtue of his official connection or agency, and use it temporarily for his private benefit and avoid criminal responsibility by calling it a loan. The law calls such a transaction a wrongful conversion, from which a fraudulent intent can be inferred.

Applying the foregoing principle of law to the proved facts of this case and the inferences fairly and reasonably deducible therefrom, the verdict of guilty was authorized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 112*)—VENUE—PLACE OF OFFENSE.

Where the evidence shows that the treasurer of a corporation took possession of notes executed by the corporation, by virtue of his official position, and subsequently discounted them and deposited the proceeds to his personal account in banks in a different county from that in which the corporation was located and transacted business, and failed thereafter to account for the funds, or to pay them into the treasury of the corporation in the county where the corporation was located, the venue of the offense of embezzlement, growing out of this wrongful conversion of these funds of the corporation by the treasurer, was properly laid in the county where the corporation was located and had its principal office and place of business, and where the treasurer obtained possession of the notes and presumptively formed the criminal intent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 220-226, 230; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 371*)—INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 67*)—LIMITATION OF PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE—OTHER OFFENSES.

An indictment charged the embezzlement of an aggregate sum of money; the aggregate embezzlement being made up of a series of specific criminal conversions extending through a continuous series of years, some without and some within the statute of limitations as to criminal prosecutions. As to the former, the indictment contained an allegation of a statutory exception to the application of the statute. Held: (a) The question as to the bar of the statute of limitations is fully controlled by the decision of this court in Cohen v. State, 2 Ga. App. 689, 59 S. E. 4. (b) Evidence of all acts of embezzlement, whether without or within the bar of the statute of limitations, was admissible for the purpose of showing fraudulent intent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 830-832; Dec. Dig. § 371.* Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 189; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

4. CHARGE OF COURT—SUFFICIENCY.

The charge of the court, considered as a whole, was a full, fair, clear, and accurate presentation of the law as to all the material issues. It was most favorable to the contentions of the accused, and, if any error was committed, it was not against, but in favor of, the accused.

5. ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR WITHOUT MERIT—NEW TRIAL REFUSED.

The numerous assignments of error are without merit, and no reason appears that would warrant the grant of another trial.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—OPINION AS TO FACTS.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, a charge that the intention to fraudulently appropriate may be inferred from the facts and circumstances, and may be inferred from falsified accounts, or from making false statements, is not objectionable as an expression of opinion upon the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1731, 1750, 1754, 1758, 1759, 1769; Dec. Dig. § 762.*]

Error from Superior Court, Spalding County; Robt. T. Daniel, Judge.

J. J. Mangham was convicted of embezzlement, and brings error. Affirmed.

R. R. Arnold, W. A. Fuller, Dodd & Dodd, and Walter R. Brown, all of Atlanta, and Frank Flynt and Charles Mills, both of Griffin, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Wise, Sol. Gen., of Fayetteville, and Wm. H. Beck and T. E. Patterson, both of Griffin, for the State.

HILL, C. J. [1] J. J. Mangham was convicted of the offense of embezzlement, as defined by section 186 of the Penal Code of 1910. His motion for a new trial being overruled, the case is here for review. The record is exceeding voluminous, containing a demurrer to the indictment, based on numerous grounds; and the motion for a new trial, besides the general grounds, contains 35 special grounds. The grounds of the demurrer are substantially repeated in the motion for a new trial, and any consideration of these grounds which we deem of sufficient importance to require special elaboration will be treated without reference to where they are made, whether in the demurrer or in the motion for a new trial. For the purpose of illustrating the questions raised by the record which we deem material to be decided, we will make a general preliminary statement of the facts.

The Boyd-Mangham Manufacturing Company was a corporation, created under the laws of Georgia, for the purpose of manufacturing and selling cotton goods, having its principal place of business and location in Spalding county. Its capital stock was $150,000. J. J. Mangham was officially the treasurer of the company, and, in addition to his duties as treasurer, during all the time in which the corporation was carried on, the entire management of its affairs was intrusted to him by the stockholders and the board of directors. The mills manufactured annually 2,500 bales of cotton; the output amounting to about $200,000 a year. Mangham bought all the cotton, whether "spot" or for future delivery, and sold all the manufactured goods, principally through A. D. Smith & Co. of New York City, collected for the sale of these goods, borrowed money, whenever he deemed it necessary, on the notes of the corporation, furnished to the bookkeepers and clerks under him the data to be entered on the books, and furnished annually to the stockholders and the board of directors a financial statement, made up under his personal and direct supervision. The board of directors gave very little attention to the management of the affairs of the corporation, but seemed to be contented with an annual declaration of dividends, based upon the statement furnished to it by Mangham, the treasurer. During this period, Mangham's management of the mills was apparently successful and profitable to the stockholders; they having received in dividends nearly $200,000. In 1911 the corporation was declared insolvent, and bankruptcy proceedings were instituted against it. An examination of its books by expert accountants developed many and serious irregularities and numerous false entries, evidently designed to conceal its true financial condition. It would be profitless and a useless consumption of space to note all of these false entries and irregularities; and it is impossible to say whether they were made for the purpose of concealing the true condition of the company from the directors and stockholders and creditors, or for the purpose of enabling the defendant, as treasurer, and as the exclusive manager of the affairs of the company, to carry on, undiscovered, an improper individual use of the funds of the corporation. The writer of this opinion, after a careful consideration of the evidence, believes the first hypothesis to be correct. The jury, however, were authorized to accept as the truth the latter hypothesis.

It is interesting to note some of the more prominent false entries shown by the books, according to the testimony of the experts. In 1911, the difference in round numbers in the condition of the Boyd-Mangham Manufacturing Company as shown by its books, and its true condition as shown by the audit, was $200,000. The books showed $200,000 more assets than the company really had. The books also showed that the company had $150,000 of unimpaired capital and $80,000 of surplus. The audit showed that it actually had no surplus, and that its capital stock was greatly impaired, if not entirely eliminated. The amount carried on the books as cash by statement made April 30, 1910, was $27,954.11, while the actual cash was only $7,388.40. On September 18 and 19, 1908, the book entries showed cash at that time amounting to $33,457.72, while the actual cash was only $1,717.44. On February 4, 1911, the actual cash on hand was $43.15, and the book entries representing cash showed $44,757.95. The expert accountant who made the examination and audit of the books in 1911 testified that, although these book entries contained a cash item of $40,000, there was in fact no cash on hand. He also testified that, while the ledger and the financial statement made by the treasurer on May 8, 1910, showed a surplus of $97,295.69, there was in fact at that time a deficit of $111,372.34, or over $200,000 difference between the amount shown by the ledger and the statement and the amount discovered by the examination.

The difference between the apparent situation shown by the entries on the books and the real situation shown by expert examination is comprehensively summed up in a full statement made by one of the experts: First. The real estate and the machinery were carried on the books at a much greater valuation than they were really worth. Second. The mill supplies represented to be on hand were a great deal more than were actually on hand. Third. The statements showing money, assets, and interest were incorrect. Fourth. The value of coal on hand was stated to be $5,451, when in fact there was no coal on hand. Fifth. The books showed as assets $100,771.80, accounts receivable, the vast majority of which were valueless. And the conclusion is that when these items, which were valueless, and which were carried as valuable assets, were eliminated, the value of the stock and overplus were all wiped out. Entries on the books showed that Smith & Co. of New York, who, as before stated, sold the products of the mill, owed the company $40,000. In other words, the books showed that they had sold goods for the mill for which they had not paid. The examination made by the expert in connection with the examination of the books of Smith & Co., showed, as a matter of fact, that Smith & Co. did not owe the mill anything, but, on the contrary, the mill owed Smith & Co. about $40,000, a difference of $80,000. This one entry alone from the books made it appear that the mills possessed a valuable asset of $40,000 more than it really did possess. There are many other discrepancies between the apparent condition of the mills as shown by the books and the real condition of the mills as proved by the expert examination and audit; and, while, as before stated, these discrepancies and irregularities may be consistent with the personal honesty of Mangham, they cannot be reconciled with official integrity, and were sufficient to permit the jury to deduce the theory that they were made for fraudulent purposes, and unquestionably this theory of the many false entries and discrepancies largely influenced the verdict.

Coming down to the specific charges of embezzlement against Mangham. The indictment alleges that, as treasurer, at divers times, continuously during the years of 1905, 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909, and 1910, he embezzled of the funds of the company the sum of $23,412.50; and it further alleges that during these years he made fraudulent entries on the books of the corporation, for the purpose of concealing from the corporation the embezzlement of this amount of money; that he converted this amount of money to his private use by illegal speculation, and by otherwise disposing of it, not for the benefit of the corporation. The evidence in support of these allegations as to the false entries has already been partially discussed. As to the allegation that he fraudulently appropriated the sum specified to his own personal use, several specific instances are shown, a few of which we will note. The president of the Fulton National Bank, located in the city of Atlanta, testified that his bank discounted notes in the year 1910, made by the Boyd-Mangham Manufacturing Company, for $11,500; that the company did not have an account at his bank, and that the proceeds arising from the discounting of these notes were placed by Mangham to his individual account at the bank; and that subsequently, from time to time, all the proceeds so deposited were checked out by him. The president of this bank stated that there was nothing in the transaction that indicated to his mind any irregularity or impropriety; that he knew that Mangham was the financial man of the mill, and Mangham said at the time that he had authority to discount the papers, and the witness supposed that Mangham used it legitimately, or he would not have discounted the notes; that he extended the credit to Mangham, Mangham having indorsed the notes; that these notes had not been paid by the mill or Mangham, and were now an outstanding obligation against both. The note teller of the Atlanta National Bank testified that on January 11th his bank discounted a note of the mill for $2,000, which was presented to the bank by Mangham, and that the proceeds were deposited by Mangham in the bank to his individual credit; that the note in question was indorsed by J. J. and J. W. Mangham and that $1,000 of this note was never paid. The discount clerk of the Central Bank & Trust Corporation of Atlanta testified that during the years 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909, and 1910, his bank discounted notes of the Boyd-Mangham Manufacturing Company ranging from $5,000 to $15,000, which were presented to the bank for discount by J. J. Mangham; that some of the proceeds of these notes were placed in the bank to the individual credit of Mangham. All of these notes, however, were paid a year before the insolvency of the manufacturing company.

There are other specific instances given in the evidence which, it is claimed by the state, tend to prove the allegation of embezzlement made in the indictment. Without going specifically into this evidence of alleged technical embezzlement at least, it may be stated generally that Mangham apparently treated the funds of the corporation as his own. To use the language of the bookkeeper, "He continually put in money and drew it out." In this connection, he says again: "The situation was that J. J. Mangham would put in a certain amount of money, and possibly the same day he would get the money from the mill. He loaned the mill money, then executed a note to himself for it and discounted it, and debited himself with the proceeds of it. While the mill was borrowing money from Mr. Mangham, he was borrowing money during the same period from the mill. The amount of his notes from July, 1907, to the present time [1911] aggregated $13,949.80, and all his notes were paid by being charged to his personal account." The bookkeeper testified further, that at the time of the failure the books showed that the mills owed Mangham $10,000. The expert accountant testified that in fact at this time Mangham owed the mills $8,582.99. It was for the jury to settle this conflict in the evidence.

The accused did not deny this method of dealing with the trust funds, nor the discounting of the notes of the corporation, and the deposit of the proceeds thereof to his credit. He claimed that he was entitled to do so, because the corporation owed him more than the amount of these notes at the time the discounts were made, and that he was fully authorized by his position in the corporation, and by his uniform transaction of its business in this manner, to reimburse himself for the use of his individual funds by the corporation. As to these matters, it may be remarked here that the learned trial judge charged the jury in substance as follows: That if the evidence showed that the accused was an executive officer of the corporation, having in charge the business and the investing of the funds of the corporation, and generally financed the business of the company, the deposit of the funds of the corporation to his own individual account in the bank would not constitute the offense of embezzlement, but the presumption would be that he was using the money of the corporation for the business of the corporation; and the state would have to go further and show that he did not use the money for the corporation, but that in taking such money he intended not to apply it to the business of the corporation.

This must be recognized as a statement of the law most favorable to the accused; but we cannot concur in the view of the trial judge that this is a correct statement of the law with reference to the crime of embezzlement. On the contrary, we think that an official of a corporation, whatever may be his duty in reference to the funds of the corporation, whether or not the entire matter of financing the affairs of the corporation was intrusted to him, would in no event be legally authorized to discount the paper of the corporation and deposit the proceeds thereof to his individual credit; and, if he did so, it would amount to a wrongful conversion of the funds of the corporation, and would cast upon him the burden of proving that the money thus deposited to his individual credit was used for the benefit of the corporation, and not for himself. The law relating to official duties and official trusts is plain and inflexible on this subject. It does not fix a period of time during which an official intrusted with the funds of a corporation could make individual use of these funds before it would amount to a wrongful conversion, but fixes the existence of the wrongful conversion as contemporaneous with the individual deposit of the funds to his own credit, and puts upon him the burden of showing that, notwithstanding an apparent wrongful conversion, there was in reality no such conversion by him, by compelling him to show that, although he deposited the funds to his individual credit, it was then done for the benefit of the corporation of which he was the trusted official. It is true an official to whom the corporation is indebted at the time of this apparent conversion might relieve himself of the charge of embezzlement by showing that, as a matter of fact, the funds so deposited were used for the benefit of the corporation, and in payment of its debt due him, yet the burden would certainly be upon the accused official to make it very clear that at that time the corporation did in fact owe him the amount of the proceeds of the deposit arising from the notes made by the company which he had discounted; and, unless he did so, the jury would be authorized to infer that the use of the funds by him was for his individual benefit, and not for that of the corporation.

Right here it may be stated, in justice to the accused, that the evidence is very clear that he frequently indorsed notes for the purpose of raising money for the corporation; indeed, that he went to the limit of his own personal credit for this purpose, and that there was rarely a time during his connection with the corporation (which amounted to the life of the corporation) that the corporation did not owe him, and he did not owe the corporation; and when the corporation's failure came the evidence was in conflict as to which was the creditor or debtor, the corporation or the accused official. The jury were authorized to accept the statement of the expert accountant that at the time of this failure the accused was indebted to the corporation, and to discredit the statement of the accused, made to them that at that time, as well as the testimony of the bookkeeper, that the corporation was indebted to him. But we will not extend this discussion of the evidence any further. It is sufficient to say that there were transactions, extending through a period of five or six years, from which the jury were authorized to infer that the accused had used the funds of the corporation, certainly in an unwarranted manner. Coupled with this fact were the untrue entries made during this period of time on the books of the company, apparently for the purpose of concealing the true condition of the corporation; and the jury were authorized to infer that these entries, which were made from data furnished by the accused, were made for the purpose of concealing his individual indebtedness to the corporation and his wrongful dealing with its funds, rather than for the purpose of concealing the condition of the corporation, in order that it might be continued as a growing concern.

We confess that we are very greatly impressed with the clear, detailed statement which the accused made in his own defense. This statement was a very lucid explanation of the specific acts of alleged fraudulent conversion apparently proved against him, and we may state, also, that the record discloses that the management of this corporation by the accused had been for many years very successful; that its eventual failure was not due to his mismanagement, or to his dishonesty, but to other causes, such as business conditions of the country which were beyond his control, and it is well-nigh incredible that a career of honesty and efficiency should have ended in the crime of embezzlement. It is difficult to find a motive for the commission of such a crime by a trusted official who had for years carried on the business of his trust, not only honestly, but most successfully, and whose financial success depended upon the continued successful existence of the corporation in his charge. The failure of this corporation meant his personal, individual failure; it meant his financial ruin; it meant the end of his business career; it meant individual bankruptcy for him and his brother, for the evidence discloses that they were indorsers on the paper of the corporation, at the time of its failure, for a very large amount. All these questions, however, were for the decision of the jury; and this court cannot say that the conclusion at which they arrived, while it may not be entirely satisfactory to the members of the court as individuals, was not supported by the evidence.

This court lays down the rule of law to be, under the statute defining embezzlement, that there can be no legal individual use, however temporary, of trust funds. The trusted official may not intend, at the time of such wrongful temporary use, a permanent misapplication or the funds entrusted to him; but if he uses for a short time, for his individual benefit, the funds of the corporation entrusted to him as an official and coming into his hands as an official, it is none the less the crime of embezzlement, even though he may have at the time intended subsequently to make restitution. The fraudulent intent will be inferred from a temporary individual use of the trust funds, and the act, prima facie at least, will be branded as embezzlement. Orr v. State, 6 Ga. App. 628, 65 S. E. 582; Jackson v. State, 76 Ga. 551. An officer or agent of a corporation cannot take the money of the corporation which is entrusted to him, or which comes into his possession by virtue of his office or agency, and use it even temporarily for his personal benefit and avoid criminal responsibility by calling it a loan. The law calls such a transaction a wrongful conversion, from which a fraudulent intent can be inferred. It may be that Mangham, as treasurer, could lawfully loan his own money to the mills and subsequently repay these loans by taking the money of the mills, and by discounting its notes; but the practice is not to be approved. It is of doubtful propriety and dangerous, and certainly placed upon him the burden of showing that the balance was at all times in his favor.

We conclude this discussion of the general grounds of the motion for a new trial by the statement that, while, in our opinion, the evidence did not demand the verdict of guilty, yet there were circumstances from which the jury, in the exercise of their exclusive prerogative to weigh motive and conduct and to draw inferences from facts, were authorized to find a verdict of guilty.

We will now take up and consider, in so far as deemed material, the special assignments of error made in the amended motion for a new trial.

[2] 2. It is insisted that the venue was not shown by the evidence; that, as to the specific acts of the accused in discounting the notes of the corporation in the city of Atlanta, and in depositing the proceeds of such notes thus discounted to his individual credit in the banks of Atlanta, the fraudulent conversion took place in Fulton county, and not in the county of Spalding. Even as to the acts which took place in the county of Fulton, we think the venue was properly laid in the county of Spalding. The corporation of which the accused was an official was located in Spalding county. There was its principal office and place of business. The books of the company were all located in Spalding county. In contemplation of law, the funds of the company were received by its treasurer in Spalding county. The notes of the company which he discounted in Fulton county were presumptively made in Spalding county by the corporation. These notes came into his possession by virtue of his official connection with the corporation in Spalding county. It was his duty as an official to account to the corporation for these funds which thus came into his hands in Spalding county. The company may have had many deposits elsewhere than in Spalding county; but, in contemplation of law, all of these deposits were in the possession of the accused as treasurer of this corporation in Spalding county. If he went out of Spalding county, and by reason of his position as treasurer of the corporation got actual possession of these funds in some other county, this would make no difference. The embezzlement—that is, the taking and carrying away with intent to steal—would be where his duty as an official called upon him to make an official accounting, and to pay into the treasury of the company the money which came into his possession as such official.

It would be absurd to hold that, if a president of a bank located in the city of Atlanta, in the county of Fulton, should go to York City, where his bank keeps an account, and draw from that bank the funds of the bank of which he is the official head, and in New York City deposit the funds thus drawn to his individual credit, the embezzlement of the money of the bank would take place in the city of New York. To so hold would put it in the power of an official of a bank or other corporation, either to avoid altogether criminal responsibility for his offense, or to make very difficult the prosecution and proof of such offense. In other words, wherever the money of the corporation may be deposited, subject to the check of its treasurer, whether in this state or in another state, if the treasurer checks the money out of the bank where deposited, and uses it for his own benefit, with a fraudulent intent to deprive the corporation of it, his prosecution for the offense of embezzlement can be properly and legally had in the county where the corporation is located and transacts its business, and where the official in the discharge of his duties should account to the corporation for its funds which have come into his possession by reason of such official position, and where presumptively the fraudulent intent was formed. Irrespective of this, however, there are specific acts which the jury were authorized to believe constituted wrongful conversions of the funds of the corporation, which were consummated within the county of Spalding.

[3] 3. It is further insisted that some of the acts alleged by the state to have been criminal occurred four years prior to the filing of the indictment, and were therefore barred by the statute of limitations, and that the testimony relating to these alleged criminal acts should have been excluded from evidence. The allegation in the indictment is that an aggregate sum was embezzled, but that this aggregate sum was made up of repeated and continuous acts, of a series of embezzlements extending through a period of six years prior to the filing of the indictment. Conceding that some of the alleged criminal acts were barred by the statute of limitations, evidence relating to them was nevertheless admissible for the purpose of showing fraudulent intent as to those which were not barred. Jackson v. State, 76 Ga. 551. This point in the opinion covers many of the exceptions made to rulings on testimony, and to excerpts from the charge of the court. Again, in addition to what has been said on this subject, the indictment alleged that the offense, as described therein, was "unknown until on or about the 1st day of January, 1911," and this allegation was sufficient to make an issue, and evidence relating to this issue was submitted to the jury, and there was sufficient evidence to show that the offense was not known until 1911, when an audit of the books of the mills was made. Besides, this was a special presentment by the grand jury, and the allegation that the offense charged thereon was unknown was sufficient to cast upon the defendant the burden of showing that it was not true. Cohen v. State, 2 Ga. App. 689, 59

S. E. 4. The evidence also shows that the accused had entire control and management of the mill during its entire existence; that he frequently loaned money to the mill and borrowed money from it during the period of his management. Many of these loans were subsequently repaid by the accused; and it might be well said that the crime of embezzlement was not complete until it was definitely determined as to the amount of the funds of the mill which he had wrongfully converted to his own use by a failure to replace the funds in the treasury of the company. But irrespective of this, the statute of limitations is not a material question in the case, in view of the fact that some of the acts of alleged criminality were proved to have been committed, if at all, within the statutory period.

[8] 4. The following excerpt from the charge is assigned as error: "I charge you that the intention to fraudulently appropriate may be inferred from the facts and circumstances; that is, by direct or circumstantial evidence. It may be inferred from falsified accounts, from making false statements and attempting to conceal the true state of the financial condition of a corporation. And when these things are shown, it is sufficient to require the defendant to explain such facts and circumstances; and, if not satisfactorily explained, a conviction will be authorized, if the fraudulent taking has been proved." This extract from the charge is objected to on the ground that it was an expression of an opinion by the judge upon the facts, and was equivalent to telling the jury that an intent to steal in this case could be inferred from falsified accounts, or from making false statements, or from attempting to conceal the true state or financial condition of the corporation, and this was entirely a question for the jury.

The excerpt is not justly subject to this criticism. There was much evidence relating to irregularities in keeping the books. Many false entries were proved. Whether this juggling with the books was for the purpose of concealing the existence of embezzlement or improper use of the funds of the corporation by the accused, or was for the purpose of keeping the corporation a growing concern and preventing its bankruptcy and failure, was one of the material issues to be decided by the jury. The jury could reasonably infer that an official who had had almost the exclusive control and management of the corporation during its existence, and who had proved that he was very efficient in the management of its affairs, should be able to give a clear account of every dollar of the corporation which had been expended in its behalf by him, or which had come into his hands as its treasurer and general manager; and they could also well infer that the books which were kept under his direct supervision were improperly kept for the purpose of covering up improper appropriations and use of the company's money. The judge did not tell the jury, as a matter of law, that these facts would show a fraudulent intent, but he simply told them that they might consider these facts in arriving at a conclusion as to the existence of a fraudulent intent; and that the fraudulent intent might be inferred from such false entries or irregularities. This unquestionably was a correct statement of the law applicable to the evidence. Jackson v. State, supra, and citations.

[4] 5. Some exceptions are made to other excerpts from the charge. We have examined them carefully in connection with the entire charge and the evidence, and find that these exceptions are without merit. In fact, we do not hesitate to say that the instructions of the trial judge contain a full, fair, and accurate statement of the issues made by the evidence. The truth of this statement is shown by the fact that many of the exceptions contained in the amended motion are based upon the allegation that the verdict was contrary to the charge on the various issues involved. The learned judge gave the accused the benefit of a favorable charge on every contention insisted upon by him. In many instances the criticism might be justly made that the instructions were much more favorable to the accused than he was entitled to expect or to receive under the law. The record clearly demonstrates that the accused has had a fair trial; that no error of law was committed against him, but that, on the contrary, if any errors were committed, they were in his favor.

[5] An exhaustive and careful examination of the record fails to disclose any reason why another trial should be granted.

Judgment affirmed.

HILL v. HARRIS. (No. 4,202.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 23, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 58*)—PLEADING (§§ 207, 433*)—GROUNDS FOR DISMISSAL—BILL OF PARTICULARS—CURE BY VERDICT.

A failure to attach a bill of particulars, where required, does not authorize a dismissal, on the ground that the petition did not, without such a bill of particulars, set forth a good cause of action. The defect is amendable, must be taken advantage of by special demurrer, and is cured by the verdict. Gonackey v. General Accident Assur. Corp., 6 Ga. App. 381, 384, 65 S. E. 53.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 134-139; Dec. Dig. § 58;* Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 511, 512, 1451-1477; Dec. Dig. §§ 207, 433.*]

2. CONTINUANCE (§ 30*)—GROUNDS—SURPRISE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Motions for continuance on the ground of surprise, occasioned by an amendment to the opposite party's petition, are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial judge. It will never be held to be an abuse of discretion to overrule a motion for continuance based on this ground, unless the movant or his counsel shall state how and wherein he is less prepared to go on with the trial, so as to give the court an opportunity to exercise a sound legal discretion. Civil Code 1910, § 5714; G. F. & A. Ry. Co. v. Sasser, 4 Ga. App. 276, 61 S. E. 505.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. §§ 99-112; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO ISSUES.

In view of the fact that in his general charge the trial judge fully and distinctly instructed the jury with reference to all of the issues raised by the pleadings, it will not be held to be prejudicial error that in one portion of the charge he instructed them as follows: "You will find that the disagreement in this suit arises with reference to the amount of lumber that was cut." Under the pleadings and the evidence, and the law applicable thereto, the issue thus referred to by the trial judge was the main and controlling question in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-713, 715, 716, 718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 91*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—SCOPE.

The following instruction was not erroneous: "The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff in this case to prove to your minds, by a preponderance of evidence, the material allegations set forth in the petition."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 113; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 259*)—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY FOR REQUEST.

Where the trial judge sets forth in his charge the contentions of the parties, and instructs the jury that, if the defendant sustains by proof a contention set forth in his pleadings, he will be entitled to prevail, and, under his plea of recoupment, recover against the plaintiff such amount as the jury might find in his favor, if fuller and more explicit instructions upon the issue as thus set forth are desired, they should be duly requested in writing. Under the rule just announced, there is no error requiring a new trial in the instructions set out in the fifth ground of the amended motion for a new trial.

6. NEW TRIAL (§ 41*)—GROUNDS—ERROR IN INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

The jury having found in favor of the plaintiff the full amount sued for, and against the plea of recoupment filed by the defendant, any inaccuracy in the charge, with reference to the amount which should have been found for the defendant in the event his plea of recoupment was sustained, is not cause for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 67-71; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

7. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 21*)—MANUFACTURING LOGS—CONTRACTS.

The parties having entered into a written contract, under the terms of which the plaintiff was to cut into lumber certain pine timber at an agreed price to be paid upon delivery of the lumber, it was not erroneous to charge the jury that, if the defendant failed and refused to pay for the lumber upon delivery, as provided for in the written contract, after demand for payment by the plaintiff, the latter would have been authorized, under the contract, to suspend operations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. § 53; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

While, under the terms of the contract between the parties, the question as to where the lumber was to be checked, and where it was in fact checked and measured, was immaterial, an instruction to the jury that the parties were at issue in reference to this question, and it should be determined from the evidence, was not prejudicial under the facts of this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

9. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 21*)—MANUFACTURING LOGS—CONTRACTS.

The written contract between the parties provided that the lumber was to be delivered to the defendant at the plaintiff's sawmill, and that the defendant was to pay for the lumber as soon as such delivery was made. There was no provision in the contract in reference to the quality of lumber to be delivered; but the law will imply that the parties intended the lumber to be merchantable and suitable for the uses to which it was to be put by the defendant. If lumber was delivered to the defendant at the plaintiff's sawmill and accepted, the defendant was bound to pay the agreed price for the lumber. It was therefore not error to charge the jury as follows: "I charge you that the defendant in this case would be responsible for all lumber that was cut and delivered at the plaintiff's sawmill."

10. EVIDENCE (§ 596*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—CROSS-PETITION.

The following instruction contained an accurate statement of the law: "I charge you that it is the duty of the defendant, upon his cross-petition or plea of recoupment, as it is on the plaintiff on his part, in law, to make out his case by a preponderance of evidence; and, unless this is done, you are authorized to find against his contentions."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2446-2448; Dec. Dig. § 596.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 273*)—PRESENTING QUESTIONS IN TRIAL COURT—EXCEPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

An exception to the charge as a whole, upon the ground that it does not present in a clear and lucid manner the issues involved in the case, and is misleading, and omits to refer to some of the issues, magnifying the contentions of one of the parties, presents no assignment of error for consideration by the reviewing court.

12. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 21*)—MANUFACTURING LOGS—CONTRACTS—ACTIONS.

The written contract between the parties containing simply an obligation on the part of the plaintiff to cut and deliver certain lumber to the defendant, and binding the latter to take and pay for the lumber, evidence that the defendant relied upon the contract with the plaintiff to keep a planing mill supplied with lumber was irrelevant and immaterial in the trial of an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the agreed price of certain lumber which had been delivered to the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. § 53; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

13. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NO ERROR.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and there was no error requiring a new trial.

Error from City Court of Oglethorpe; E. Wall, Judge.

Action by C. P. Harris against Youncey Hill. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

OWENS v. STATE. (No. 4,286.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 218*)—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATIONS.

The evidence offered upon the subject of alleged dying declarations was sufficient to authorize the submission to the jury of the question whether or not, at the time the declarations were made, the declarant was in the article of death and conscious of his condition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 458, 459; Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 215*)—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATIONS.

A statement, made by one who had received a mortal wound, that a named person had "assassinated" him, is a statement of fact and not a mere conclusion or expression of opinion, and, upon the trial for murder of the person who fired the shot, is admissible in evidence as a dying declaration, if sufficient foundation for its admission is first laid.

3. WITNESSES (§ 246*)—EXAMINATION BY COURT.

While a trial judge should not so interrogate a witness as to intimate or express any opinion in reference to the weight of the evidence, or as to the guilt or innocence of the person on trial, still it is the right and duty of a trial judge, in a proper case, to assist in the elucidation of the truth of the transaction under investigation, and it is not error for him, for this purpose, to ask a witness questions pertinent to the issue and couched in appropriate language. The questions propounded by the trial judge in the present case were not subject to the criticism that they tended to impress the jury with the idea that in the opinion of the trial judge the accused should be convicted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 852-857; Dec. Dig. § 246.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 203*)—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATION.

The charge upon the subject of dying declarations, which is copied in the opinion herewith filed, is in exact accordance with previous decisions of the Supreme Court and of this court, and is sufficiently full and explicit, especially in the absence of any written request for more particular instructions.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 655*)—TRIAL—CONTROL BY COURT.

To the end that the trial should be fair and impartial and conducted in an orderly way, it is the duty of the trial judge to regulate the conduct of counsel, parties, and witnesses, provided that in so doing he does not take away or abridge any right of a party under the law.

6. HOMICIDE (§ 255*) — EVIDENCE — WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no abuse of discretion in overruling the motion for new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

J. D. Owens was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

Edwin L. Bryan, of Moultrie, and D. B. Nicholson, of Rochelle, for plaintiff in error. J. D. McKenzie and J. A. Wilkes, Sol. Gen., both of Moultrie, for the State.

POTTLE, J. [1] Owens was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and his motion for new trial was overruled. The point mainly insisted on is that the court erred in admitting in evidence certain alleged dying declarations of the person killed. In order for dying declarations to be admitted in evidence, four things must appear: (1) The statements must have been made by the person killed; (2) he must have been in a dying condition at the time the statements were made; (3) he must have been conscious of his condition; and (4) they must have been of such character as to make them admissible under the Penal Code 1910, § 1026, that is, the statements must relate to the cause of the death of the declarant and to the person who killed him. In the present case the fact that the deceased made the statements admitted in evidence is undisputed; that he was in a dying condition cannot be questioned, because he died a few hours after having made the statements, from a mortal wound which had been inflicted upon him by the accused. The objection mainly urged by counsel for the accused is that it does not appear, from the evidence, that at the time the statements were made the accused was conscious of his condition, and that the nature of the statements was such as to render them inadmissible as dying declarations.

The question whether sufficient foundation has been laid for the admission of dying declarations is one primarily for the court. Assuming that the statement made is one which would be admissible as a dying declaration, if there is any evidence to support the inference that at the time the statement was made the accused was in articulo mortis and conscious of his condition, it is the duty of the court to admit the evidence and submit to the jury the question whether or not they believe the evidence is sufficient to show that the deceased was in extremis and conscious of his condition at the time the statement was made. They should be instructed to first ascertain whether these things were true, and, if they so find, then to consider evidence of the dying statement and give it such weight as they think it entitled to, and that if they find that the person who was shot was not conscious that he was in a dying condition, then they should reject the evidence in relation to the alleged dying statement altogether. In passing upon the question whether or not one in extremis is conscious of his condition, all of the facts and circumstances must be considered. Statements made by the wounded man himself, statements made to him by his physician or others, the nature and character of the wound, and any other facts or circumstances which throw light on this question, should be considered. The fact that the accused shot and killed the deceased is shown by the testimony of eyewitnesses, and is not denied by the accused. His theory was that the killing was done in self-defense, in order to prevent the commission of a felony upon him, or at least that at the time he shot he was acting under the fears of a reasonable man that his life was in danger. The wounded man lived some 16 hours after he received the mortal wound. He made five statements to his physician. On direct examination the physician who had attended the deceased testified that statements in reference to the shooting were made to him by the deceased several times; that the first statement was made about an hour after the shooting, and the last statement from six to eight hours before the death of the deceased. With reference to this last statement, the physician testified that the deceased was conscious that he was in a dying condition, because his pulse began to fail, and the witness informed him that his pulse did not respond to a stimulant, and that the deceased was in extremis and was conscious of this fact. The witness testified that while in this condition the wounded man said "they assassinated him"; that in addition to this he told the witness to take his sister some message, but never did finish the latter statement. The witness further stated that the deceased said that old man Owens had assassinated him; that he never did call the name of the person who shot him other than in this way. In view of the fact that it was not disputed that Owens, the accused, did the shooting, and that Owens and the deceased were in a difficulty at the time the shooting took place, there could be no question, of course, that the deceased intended to refer to the accused when he used the expression "old man Owens." On cross-examination the witness who testified as to the dying statements was examined at great length and in detail in reference to each of the five statements which he claimed the deceased had made to him in reference to the shooting. In reference to the first statement, the witness testified that in his opinion the wounded man was not conscious of his condition at the time the statement was made. As to the second statement, the witness testified that the deceased had not abandoned hope of recovery, because he stated, "I may get over this and some day come back here." The same was true of the third statement. The last two statements were made under the following circumstances: The fourth statement was on the train between Moultrie and Tifton, about seven or eight hours after the shooting and about eight hours before death ensued. At that time the physician tried to persuade the wounded man to drink some ginger ale as a stimulant. He refused to take any, stating that he did not believe it would do him any good, "because he did not believe he was going to get well." The last statement was made on the train between Fitzgerald and Manchester. The physician again tried to get the wounded man to take a stimulant, stating that his pulse was falling, and he replied, declining the stimulant and endeavoring to send some message to his sister, but was never able to complete the message before his death. He said at that time he was going to die. He made no other statement. The following question was asked the witness: "That is all he said to you the last time he spoke to you about it?" Answer: "The last time he said anything intelligent."

It is argued by counsel for the accused that it is apparent from the physician's testimony on cross-examination that in the last conversation all that the wounded man said was, in effect, something about a message to his sister, and that he made no statement at that time in reference to the accused. We do not think this a fair construction of the statement of the deceased. The witness having testified positively, on direct examination, that when the last statement was made on the train the deceased stated that Owens had assassinated him, the manifest inference from the cross-examination is that the witness meant to say that, besides making this statement in reference to the shooting, the deceased endeavored to send a message to his sister, and the effort to do so involved the last statement made before his death. The same construction is to be placed upon the testimony of the witness in reference to the fourth statement, made on the train between Moultrie and Tifton. The evidence perhaps did not require a finding that at the time these statements were made the wounded man was conscious of the fact that he was about to die, but it certainly authorized such a finding and warranted the jury, in considering the dying statements and in giving such weight to them as the jury believed they were entitled to receive. See, in this connection, Smith v. State, 9 Ga. App. 403, 71 S. E. 606; Campbell v. State, 11 Ga. 353; Walton v. State, 79 Ga. 446, 5 S. E. 203; Wheeler v. State, 112 Ga. 43, 37 S. E. 126; Young v. State, 114 Ga. 849, 40 S. E. 1000.

[2] 2. It is also insisted that evidence as to the dying declarations should have been excluded because the statement of the deceased was a mere conclusion and opinion, and not admissible as a statement in reference to the cause of death and the person who killed the deceased. The decisions in reference to the admissibility of this class of evidence have not been confined strictly to the terms of the section of the Code, and great liberality has been allowed in the admission of evidence of this character. No fixed, definite rule can be announced which would be applicable in all cases and to all statements; but, generally speaking, any statement made by one in the article of death and conscious of his condition, in reference to the cause of his death, the manner in which he was killed, and as to the person who killed him, is admissible if it would have been admissible as evidence had the person wounded not died, and had he been testifying under oath as a witness on the stand. The solemnity of the occasion, the consciousness of approaching death, the common belief that one in that condition, knowing that he is about to appear before his Maker and give an account "of the deeds done in the body," is supposed to take the place of the sanctity of an oath and to justify an inference that one in that condition would not deliberately falsify for the purpose of wreaking vengeance upon one who had inflicted upon him a mortal wound. Whether this supposition is well founded or not is purely speculative. It is doubtless true that it is well founded in many cases, and it is also probable that, under color of dying declarations, false statements have been sometimes admitted in evidence and used against one on trial for murder. This fact makes it a question peculiarly for the jury to determine, under all the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction, together with any knowledge which they may properly have of the character of the declarant and the character of the assailant, the proximity of death, the nature of the statement, and other pertinent facts or circumstances, whether the statement ought to be accepted as true. In making the statement the declarant cannot make a statement of a bare conclusion or expression of opinion, but he must state facts. The statement that the accused assassinated him, as used by the deceased in the present case, simply means that the accused shot him without provocation. This being so, the statement was one of fact, and was not objectionable as stating a mere conclusion or opinion of the declarant. It has been held that a statement by one in the article of death and conscious of his condition, that the accused shot him down like a dog, was admissible. So, also, with reference to the statement that the killing was done without any provocation on the part of the person killed, and also the statement that the deceased was "butchered" by the accused. See White v. State, 100 Ga. 659, 28 S. E. 423; Underhill, Criminal Evidence (2d Ed.) § 108, p. 202. Tested by these authorities, as well as upon the principles announced above, the declaration of the deceased in this case was admissible as a statement of fact, and was not objectionable as a statement of a mere conclusion or expression of opinion.

[3] 3. Further complaint with reference to the admission of the dying statement is that the trial judge committed prejudicial error in interrogating the state's witness, in that he thereby intimated an opinion as to the guilt of the accused, and intended to impress the jury with the idea that the court thought that the accused should be convicted. We do not think the examination of the trial judge was subject to this criticism. Indeed, a careful examination of the questions propounded by the court and of the answers of the witness seems to indicate that the witness rather lessened the force of his former testimony on the question as to whether the wounded man was rational at the time the statements were made and conscious that he was in a dying condition. In this examination the court simply required the witness to explain to the jury whether or not the declarant was rational when the statements were made and what the witness meant by the use of the term "rational." It seems to have required several questions to make the witness understand just exactly what the court meant to bring out. The questions were carefully guarded, and do not contain any intimation on the part of the court that the accused was guilty.

[4] 4. The court charged the jury as follows: "Now, then, the court instructs you that dying declarations made by any person in the article of death who is conscious of his condition, as to the cause of his death, and the person who killed him, are admissible in evidence in a prosecution for homicide. The court instructs you further that, as to testimony touching what are claimed to be dying declarations, the court instructs you that, in order to make this evidence at all for your consideration, you must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the declarations, if any, were made while the person making them was in a dying condition, and that he knew at the time the declarations were made that he was in such condition; and, if either one of these conditions does not exist, the alleged declarations would not be testimony to be considered by you at all; but, if both exist, they would become what the law terms dying declarations, and, if made under such conditions, would be testimony to be considered with all the other testimony in the case." The criticism on this charge is that it is not sufficiently full and explicit. The charge is in exact accordance with numerous decisions, both of the Supreme Court and this court; and, if for any reason it was not sufficiently full and explicit, counsel for the accused should have requested the court, in writing, to charge with more particularity upon the subject.

[5] 5. In another ground of the motion for a new trial complaint is made that while counsel for the accused on cross-examination had one of the state's witnesses on the floor before the jury, demonstrating by gestures and signs the respective positions and conduct of both the accused and the deceased, the court remarked: "Nobody can understand that. I can't, and the jury can't. Let him come back to the stand, and ask the question. Let him answer anything you want to ask him about it." It is complained that this action of the court unduly restricted the right of cross-examination; particularly in view of the fact that the court had permitted the Solicitor General to examine the witness in the same way counsel for the accused desired to. In regard to this the court certified: "I was sure that neither the court nor the jury could get the evidence of the witness in the manner in which the examination was conducted at the time I called the witness back to the stand in order that the jury and court might understand what counsel was trying to prove." In light of this explanation, there was clearly no error in the action of the judge. It is the right of the trial judge to police the trial, and it would take a very strong case of abuse of discretion in such a matter to authorize the reviewing court to interfere. The trial judge understands the situation much better than this court can possibly do from the printed record, and we are quite sure that so able and impartial a magistrate as was the judge who presided at the trial of this case would not consciously unduly hamper or interfere with counsel in the defense of his client. There is nothing in the record of the occurrence as it is presented to us which calls for interference by this court.

[6] 6. The evidence warranted the verdict. The deceased was shot by the accused during the progress of a personal difficulty between them. The circumstances indicate that the deceased first, without cause, made an assault upon the accused, and that at the time the assault was made he had a knife in his hand and indicated a purpose to use it. The theory of the defense was that, at the time the fatal shot was fired, the deceased was making a felonious assault upon the accused with a knife; that the accused had retreated as far as he could with safety; and that it was necessary for him to shoot in order to save his own life. There was, however, evidence to authorize the theory of the state that the deceased had dropped the knife before the shooting took place, and that at the time the shot was fired the deceased was not attempting to commit a felony upon the person of the accused, and that there was no necessity for the accused to take his life. It appears, from the testimony of one witness, that after the shot was fired the accused walked about 15 feet and picked up the knife which had previously fallen from the hands of the deceased. It was argued in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error that there was no evidence to show that at the time the shot was fired the accused knew that the deceased had dropped the knife. From the nature of the case there could be no positive direct evidence that the accused knew this, but the fact that the knife was a long butcher knife, the fact that the parties were very close together, with their hands touching each other, and other circumstances surrounding the transaction, all indicate that the accused must have known that the deceased did not have the knife, and that the killing was the result of that passion, supposed to be irresistible, which had been engendered by the assault made by the deceased and the language which he used at the time. The trial judge having reviewed the evidence upon the motion for a new trial, and having signified his approval of the verdict, and there being evidence to warrant the finding, and no error of law having been committed, this court has no power to set aside the conviction.

Judgment affirmed.

HAYES v. STATE. (No. 4,233.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 23, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 68*)—MANSLAUGHTER—"UNLAWFUL."

An act is not "unlawful," within the purview of the statute of this state defining involuntary manslaughter, unless it is prohibited by some valid law of this state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 91, 92; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7186, 7187.]

2. STATUTES (§ 47*)—VALIDITY—DEFINITENESS.

A penal law which is of doubtful construction, and in which the act denominated as a crime is described in terms so general and indefinite as to make the question of criminality dependent upon the idiosyncrasies of the men who may happen to constitute the court and jury, and is of such a nature that honest and intelligent men are unable to ascertain what particular act it seeks to condemn, is incapable of enforcement, and will be held to be null and void. So much of the act of 1910, approved August 13, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 92, § 5), regulating the use of automobiles, as undertakes to make penal the operation of an automobile on one of the highways of this state "at a rate of speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of such highway, or so as to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property," is too uncertain and indefinite in its terms to be capable of enforcement.

3. STATUTES (§ 47*)—VALIDITY—DEFINITENESS.

So much of the act of 1910 (Laws 1910, p. 90), regulating the use of automobiles, as makes it a misdemeanor to operate an automobile at a rate of speed greater than six miles per hour upon approaching a crossing of intersecting highways, is sufficiently definite and certain in its terms to be capable of enforcement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 594*)—ORDINANCES—VALIDITY—DEFINITENESS.

A city ordinance which undertakes to make punishable the operation of an automobile upon one of the streets of the city "in a careless or reckless manner" is null and void, because it fails to sufficiently define the prohibited act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1316-1318, 1320, 1327-1329; Dec. Dig. § 594.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1144*)—TRIAL—VERDICT—SEPARATE COUNT.

Where there are two counts in an indictment, each charging the same offense, but varying the manner in which the criminal act is alleged to have been committed, and one count is bad and the other good, it will be presumed, where a general verdict of guilty was rendered, that the verdict was founded upon the good count, and that the jury disregarded the bad count.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2736-2781, 2901, 3016-3037; Dec. Dig. § 1144.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 703*)—STREETS—USE FOR TRAVEL—"CROSSES AND INTERSECTS."

A street or highway which extends to, but not beyond, another highway, "crosses and intersects" such highway, within the meaning of section 5 of the act approved August 13, 1910 (Laws 1910, p. 92), regulating the use of automobiles.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1509-1513; Dec. Dig. § 703.*]

7. HOMICIDE (§ 129*)—INDICTMENT—MALICE.

An indictment, which charges the offense of involuntary manslaughter, in that the homicide was committed without any intention to do so on the part of the slayer, but while he was engaged in the commission of an unlawful act, is sufficient, although it does not expressly allege that the homicide was without malice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 197, 198; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 885*)—INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER—PUNISHMENT—RECOMMENDATION OF JURY.

Involutary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act is not one of the felonies which can be punished as for a misdemeanor, upon the recommendation of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2108; Dec. Dig. § 885.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1187*)—WRIT OF ERROR—HARMLESS ERROR—RULING ON INDICTMENT.

Failure of the judge to quash the second count in the indictment, and to charge the jury that the accused could not be convicted upon the theory that he had violated the city ordinance of Atlanta set forth in the indictment, will not, under the facts of this case, demand that the judgment of conviction be set aside.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3101, 3103-3106; Dec. Dig. § 1187.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Robt. T. Daniel, Judge.

Ed. Hayes was convicted of involuntary manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

The defendant was indicted for the offense of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act; it being charged that he unlawfully ran over and killed the person named in the indictment, with an automobile, at a point in the city of Atlanta where Gordon street and Holderness street intersect and cross. It was alleged that the unlawful act consisted in a violation of the act of the General Assembly (Laws 1910, p. 90) approved August 13, 1910, entitled "An act to regulate the running of automobiles," etc., in that at the time of the homicide the defendant was driving his machine "at a rate of speed greater than was reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of said street or highway," and that he "did run and operate said automobile so as to endanger the lives and limbs of persons using said street, and that he [the defendant], upon approaching the crossing and intersection of said streets, did not so run and operate said automobile as to have the same under control, but did run and operate the same at a greater rate of speed than six miles per hour, to wit, at a speed between 15 and 20 miles per hour." It was further alleged in the indictment that the defendant was guilty of an unlawful act, in that at the time of the homicide he was driving the automobile at such a rate of speed and in such a manner as was prohibited by an ordinance of the city of Atlanta, which provides that "it shall be unlawful for any driver or person in charge of an automobile to run or operate the same in a careless or reckless manner, whether said automobile is running under or over the speed limits herein provided. Said automobiles must be operated with due regard to the safety of persons and vehicles upon the streets and public places, and in such a manner as to avoid collisions therewith."

The accused demurred to the indictment, upon the following grounds: (1, 2) Because no offense was set forth in the indictment. (3) Because the indictment failed to allege that the homicide was without malice and without any mixture of deliberation. (4) Because it was not alleged that the unlawful act charged was such an act as in its consequences naturally tended to destroy human life. (5) Because the allegation that the machine was being driven "at a rate of speed greater than was reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of said street or highway," was a mere conclusion of the pleader. (6) Because the allegation that the machine was operated in such a way as to endanger the lives and limbs of persons using the street is a mere conclusion of the pleader. (7) Because the allegation that the machine was being run at a greater rate of speed than six miles per hour upon approaching the crossing and intersection of two streets is not an averment of an act prohibited by law. (8) Because the ordinance of the city of Atlanta set forth in the indictment is null and void, as being in conflict with the act of the General Assembly regulating automobiles, and is void for uncertainty and indefiniteness, and because the entire ordinance is not set out in the indictment. (9) Because the indictment is duplicitous, in that it charges the accused with the commission of a homicide committed in violation of an act of the General Assembly and in violation of an ordinance of the city of Atlanta. (10) Because so much of the act of the General Assembly of Georgia referred to in the indictment as provides that no person shall operate an automobile on any of the highways of the state at a rate of speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of such highway, or so as to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property, is null and void for want of certainty, definiteness, and clearness and fails to sufficiently define the acts and things which it undertakes to make unlawful and penal. (11) Because section 5 of the act of the General Assembly referred to in the indictment, and the ordinance of the city of Atlanta therein set forth, are both void, for lack of certainty and definiteness in defining the acts thereby prohibited and declared unlawful. The demurrer was overruled, and exception was duly taken to this judgment. The accused was convicted, and assigns error upon the overruling of his motion for new trial, and also upon the judgment refusing to sustain his demurrer.

Evans & Evans, of Sandersville, and Hines & Jordan, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Hugh M. Dorsey, Sol. Gen., of Atlanta, for the State.

POTTLE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. In this state "involuntary manslaughter" is thus defined: "Involuntary manslaughter shall consist in the killing of a human being without any intention to do so, but in the commission of an unlawful act, or a lawful act, which probably might produce such a consequence, in an unlawful manner: Provided, that where such involuntary killing shall happen in the commission of an unlawful act which, in its consequences, naturally tends to destroy the life of a human being, or is committed in the prosecution of a riotous intent, or of a crime punishable by death or confinement in the penitentiary, the offense shall be deemed and adjudged to be murder." Punishment for involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act is from one to three years in the penitentiary, and involuntary manslaughter in the commission or performance of a lawful act, where there has not been observed necessary discretion and caution, is punished as for a misdemeanor. Penal Code 1910, §§ 68, 69. At common law manslaughter was defined to be "the unlawful killing of another without malice, either express or implied; which may be either voluntarily, upon a sudden heat; or involuntarily, but in the commission of some unlawful act." 4 Blackstone, 191. It has been held that a lawful act done in an unlawful or negligent manner is in law an unlawful act. Commonwealth v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111, 38 Am. Dec. 346. In Indiana the definition of "involuntary manslaughter" is the same as it was at common law, and the Supreme Court of that state has held that an act might be unlawful within the meaning of the definition of involuntary manslaughter, although not subjecting the actor to criminal prosecution, and upon this principle a judgment of conviction of involuntary manslaughter was affirmed in a case where a railroad engineer carelessly and negligently ran his locomotive into a passenger coach standing on the track, and thereby caused the death of one of its passengers. State v. Dorsey, 118 Ind. 187, 20 N. E. 777, 10 Am. St. Rep. 111. The statute of this state, however, draws a clear distinction between an unlawful act and a lawful act committed without the observance of due caution and circumspection. In this state it could not be held that a lawful act, however negligently or recklessly committed, is an unlawful act, within the purview of the statute defining and punishing involuntary manslaughter. An unlawful act within the meaning of our statute is an act prohibited by law; that is to say, an act condemned by some statute or valid municipal ordinance of this state. In order, therefore, to support an indictment for involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act, some act must be alleged which is prohibited by a valid law.

[2] 2. It is contended that the act of the General Assembly of Georgia regulating the use of automobiles and the ordinance of the city of Atlanta, both of which it is alleged in the indictment the defendant was violating at the time of the homicide, are so indefinite and uncertain as to be incapable of enforcement. It is the duty of the judicial department, wherever possible, to construe an act of the legislative department so as to make it valid and binding and give due effect to all of its terms. Hence a statute ought not to be held void for uncertainty if it is possible to give a reasonably particular construction to its terms, so as to make them capable of enforcement. But while this is true, the state cannot make an act penal without defining the act in terms sufficiently clear for any person to understand that in performing the act he is guilty of a violation of the statute. The maxim that "ignorance of the law is no excuse for crime" is founded upon the theory that the citizen may ascertain the law and know that the act which he is performing has been condemned. If it is impossible for him to ascertain that a given act has been made penal, it would be manifestly unfair for the state to punish him for a commission of the act. If the law is of such doubtful construction, and describes the act denominated as a crime in terms so general and indeterminate as to make the question of criminality dependent upon the idiosyncrasies of individuals who may happen to constitute the court and jury, and of such a nature that honest and intelligent men are unable to ascertain what particular act is condemned by the state, the law is incapable of enforcement and will be held to be null and void.

The foregoing proposition is supported by the authorities with practical unanimity. Reference to a few of the adjudicated cases will serve to illustrate the application of the rule above stated. In Ex parte Jackson, 45 Ark. 158, it was held that a statute making it a misdemeanor to "commit any act injurious to the public health or public morals, or the perversion or obstruction of public justice, or the due administration of the law," is void for uncertainty. A statute making it a crime for a railway corporation to charge, collect, or receive more than a just or reasonable rate of toll as a compensation for the transportation of passengers has been held to be unconstitutional. L. & N. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 99 Ky. 132, 35 S. W. 129, 33 L. R. A. 209, 59 Am. St. Rep. 457. The same rule has been announced with reference to a statute which undertook to make penal the combining of two or more persons for the purpose of "mob violence"; the statute not undertaking to define or designate what acts should be deemed or considered mob violence. Augustine v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 59, 73, 52 S. W. 77, 96 Am. St. Rep. 765. The Supreme Court of the United States has said that: "Laws which create crime ought to be so explicit that all men subject to their penalties may know what acts it is their duty to avoid. Before a man can be punished, his case must be plainly and unmistakably within the statute." United States v. Brewer, 139 U. S. 278-288, 11 Sup. Ct. 538, 541, 35 L. Ed. 190-193. A statute of Indiana undertook to make it unlawful for any person to haul over any of the turnpikes or gravel roads during certain conditions of the weather on a narrow tired wagon a load of more than 2,000 pounds, or on a broad tired wagon a load of more than 2,500 pounds. This statute was held to be too uncertain and too indefinite, for the reason that the statute did not sufficiently describe a narrow tired wagon and a broad tired wagon. Cook v. State, 26 Ind. App. 278, 59 N. E. 489. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin has thus announced the rule: "A law which takes one's property or liberty as a penalty for an offense must so clearly define the acts on which the penalty is denounced that no ordinary person can fail to understand his duty and the departure therefrom which the law attempts to make criminal, since one cannot be said to willfully violate a statute which is so contradictory or blind that he must guess what his duty is thereunder." Brown v. State, 137 Wis. 543, 119 N. W. 338. See, also, to the same effect: State v. Partlow, 91 N. C. 550, 49 Am. Rep. 652; Czarra v. Medical Supervisors, 25 App. Cas. D. C. 443; State v. Ashbrook, 154 Mo. 379, 55 S. W. 627, 48 L. R. A. 265, 77 Am. St. Rep. 765; L. & N. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission (C. C.) 19 Fed. 679; Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 83. In James v. Bowman, 190 U. S. 141, 23 Sup. Ct. 680, 47 L. Ed. 979, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "It would certainly be dangerous if the Legislature could set a net large enough to catch all possible offenders, and leave it to the courts to step inside and say who could be rightfully detained, and who should be set at large. This would, to some extent, substitute the judicial for the legislative department of the government." The following language of the Supreme Court in Savannah, F. & W. Ry. Co. v. Daniels, 90 Ga. 610, 17 S. E. 648 [20 L. R. A. 416] is pertinent: "The opinion of the court is supposed to be consistent in the construction of laws, and the interpretation adopted by the trial judge is subject to review by a court of last resort, whose construction is controlling in all similar cases; but the opinions of juries may vary, and there may be different verdicts on exactly the same state of facts. It is highly important, to the public in general as well as to the railroad companies, that the duty imposed by this statute should be clearly defined and understood; but if the jury in each case could construe the law for itself, there would be no means of arriving at a construction which could be regarded as final, and the limits of the duty imposed must remain unsettled."

Let these principles be applied to the laws involved in the present case. It must be apparent that so much of section 5 of the act of 1910, regulating the use of automobiles (Acts 1910, p. 92), as undertakes to make penal the operation of an automobile upon one of the highways of this state "at a rate of speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of such highway, or so as to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property," is too uncertain and indefinite in its terms to be capable of enforcement. What rate of speed is reasonable and proper? Who should determine this question? What is this test as to the rate of speed which can be employed, and how is the driver of an automobile to know when he is driving at a rate of speed prohibited by the act? Manifestly this question cannot be determined by the consequences which ensue from driving a machine. The law must so definitely and certainly define the offense that a person of reasonable understanding can know at the time of the commission of the act that the law is being violated. One jury might say that a certain rate of speed was reasonable and proper. Another jury might reach exactly the opposite conclusion from exactly the same state of facts and the same circumstances. One court might hold, upon a review of the facts, that the rate of speed used was in violation of the act, and another court might rule otherwise. We appreciate thoroughly the difficulty in prescribing the maximum rate of speed which can be employed in all cases; but this furnishes no reason why, in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Legislature should be permitted to set a dragnet and leave the courts to determine who shall be detained in the net and who should be set at liberty.

[3] 3. We do not, however, think that the first count in the indictment was subject to demurrer. It is averred that the accused was approaching the intersection of two streets; that he did not have his machine under control; and that he was operating the same at a greater rate of speed than six miles per hour, to wit, at a speed of between 15 and 20 miles per hour. Section 5 of the act of 1910 expressly prohibits the operation of an automobile at a rate of speed greater than 6 miles per hour upon approaching a "crossing of intersecting highways." This part of section 5 is certainly sufficiently definite to enable any person coming within the operation of the act to know that it is a violation of the law, and a misdemeanor under the statute, to operate an automobile at such a point on one of the highways of the state at a greater rate of speed than 6 miles per hour. Here the statute is clear and definite in its terms. It says, in effect, that under all circumstances and in all cases it shall be a misdemeanor to drive an automobile when approaching a crossing of highways at a rate of speed greater than 6 miles per hour.

It is insisted that, under a proper construction of section 5 of the act, a greater rate of speed than 6 miles an hour is unlawful only when approaching a railroad crossing along one of the highways of the state. But we do not think a proper construction of the act limits the section to a railroad crossing. It says when approaching a "crossing of intersecting highways and railroad crossings." We construe this to mean that it is unlawful to approach either a crossing of intersecting highways or a railroad crossing upon a highway at a greater rate of speed than that fixed by the act. Since, in the first count of the indictment, it is alleged that the accused approached a crossing where two streets intersected, at a rate of speed between 15 and 20 miles per hour, it alleged the commission of an unlawful act, in violation of the automobile law of 1910, and was sufficiently definite in its terms.

[4] 4. It is quite clear to our minds, however, that the second count in the indictment should have been stricken on demurrer. The provisions of the ordinance of the city of Atlanta, set forth in the indictment, were altogether too uncertain and indefinite to be capable of enforcement. Manifestly it will not do to denounce as a crime the operation of an automobile in a careless and reckless manner without undertaking to define in any way what shall constitute carelessness and recklessness in the manner in which the machine is being operated. The case would vary with circumstances. Sometimes 6 miles an hour would be a reckless rate of speed. Sometimes 15 or 20 would not be. A very careful driver might think that 10 miles an hour was reckless, and another driver might be of a different opinion. One accustomed to the use of automobiles would think that he could safely employ a certain rate of speed, while one unaccustomed to them would think a very much less rate of speed would be gross recklessness. When put on trial the question of guilt or innocence would depend upon the particular views held by the jury trying the case, or by the judge who presided at the trial. The terms of the ordinance are entirely too loose and vague and indefinite to be enforceable. This being so, no unlawful act is set forth and alleged in the second count of the indictment, and this count will be held to state no offense.

[5] 5. It does not follow, however, that the judgment must be reversed and the conviction set aside. The first count in the indictment was good. The evidence abundantly authorized a finding that at the time of the homicide the accused was driving his machine at a greater rate of speed than that permitted by the automobile act of 1910. There was a general verdict of guilty. There was one good count and one bad count. Each charged the same offense, growing out of the same transaction, and the presumption is that the verdict was founded upon the good count and that the jury disregarded the bad count. Bulloch v. State, 10 Ga. 47 (3), 54 Am. Dec. 369; Frain v. State, 40 Ga. 529; 1 Bishop, New Crim. Procedure, § 1015.

[6] 6. The further point is made that the charge contained in the first count in the indictment was not sustained, for the reason that the two streets named in the indictment did not cross or intersect each other as alleged in the indictment, but that one of the streets ended at the point where it touched the other. It is contended that this is not a "crossing or intersecting of highways," within the meaning of the act of 1910, and does not support the allegation in the indictment that the homicide occurred at the point where Gordon and Holderness streets cross and intersect. We cannot assent to this view. On the contrary, we think that the two streets did intersect each other; within the meaning and purpose of the law. Manifestly the object of section 5 of the act was to protect persons who might be upon a highway which approached another highway along which an automobile was being driven. There would be just as much reason for holding that one of the streets ended at the farther margin of the other street as there would be in saying that it ended when it touched the first margin of the street. The highway was in a condition to be used by pedestrians and others entirely across the other highway upon which the automobile was being driven. The latter highway extended across the margin of the former highway, and the case is plainly within the spirit and reason of the law.

[7] 7. We do not think the indictment was defective because it failed to charge expressly that the homicide was without malice. It did allege that the defendant was accused of the offense of involuntary manslaughter. This offense does not involve malice, and is expressly defined in the statute to be the killing of a human being without any intention to do so. The indictment expressly charged that the killing was unintentional, but was done in the commission of an unlawful act. This was sufficient.

[8] 8. The presiding judge held that involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act was not such a felony as that the court could in its discretion, upon the recommendation of the jury, impose a punishment as for a misdemeanor. Section 1062 of the Penal Code of 1910 provides that "all felonies, except treason, insurrection, murder, manslaughter," and several other felonies named in the statute, may, upon the recommendation of the jury, in the discretion of the presiding judge, be punished as misdemeanors. The question raised depends upon the construction of the word "manslaughter" in the statute. Manslaughter is defined in our Code as follows: "Manslaughter is the unlawful killing of a human creature, without malice, either express or implied, and without any mixture of deliberation whatever, which may be voluntary, upon a sudden heat of passion, or involuntary, in the commission of an unlawful act, or a lawful act without due caution and circumspection." Penal Code 1910, § 64. From this definition it is apparent that manslaughter is of two kinds, and that involuntary manslaughter is as much manslaughter, within the meaning of the statute, as voluntary manslaughter. Of course, the word "manslaughter," as used in section 1062, would not embrace involuntary manslaughter in the commission of a lawful act, because that is made a misdemeanor by statute. But we see no reason for holding that the statute does not embrace both voluntary and involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act. It is argued that the Legislature would not reasonably be presumed to have intended to put involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act in the same class as treason, murder, and other felonies mentioned in the section. It is to be noticed that perjury, false swearing, and subornation of perjury and false swearing are likewise not reducible. What the Legislature may have intended we have no means of knowing, save as the intention may be gathered from the language employed, and we see no reason why the term "manslaughter," as used in section 1062 of the Code, was intended to have any other meaning than that given to it in section 64 of the Code, which had long been in force as the statutory definition of manslaughter when the act of the Legislature from which section 1062 was codified was passed.

[§] 9. The court refused to charge the jury that the ordinance of the city of Atlanta, referred to in the indictment, was void for uncertainty, and did charge that it was an unlawful act for any person in charge of an automobile to operate the same in a careless and reckless manner upon any of the streets of the city of Atlanta. If the evidence were doubtful as to the guilt of the accused, the judgment of conviction would be set aside and a new trial ordered upon the first count in this indictment, with direction that the second count be stricken; but the evidence practically demands a finding that the accused was violating section 5 of the automobile act of 1910, and that he was at the time of the homicide operating his machine at a rate of speed greatly in excess of the maximum speed prescribed by that act. He was therefore plainly and unmistakably committing an unlawful act when he ran over and killed the person named in the indictment. There is no room for doubt on this question. No honest or impartial jury could reach any other conclusion from the evidence in the case. We do not see, therefore, how the accused could justly complain of the charge of the court that if he was operating his machine in a reckless or careless manner, in violation of the city ordinance, he would be guilty. It is utterly immaterial whether the ordinance was valid or not, or whether he was violating it or not. He was clearly acting in violation of the state law, and we will not set aside the conviction because the judge erroneously held that the city ordinance was valid and capable of enforcement, and submitted to the jury the question as to whether the accused was at the time of the homicide violating the ordinance. The same observations apply to the instructions of the court upon that part of section 5 of the act of 1910 which we have held to be too uncertain and indefinite to be enforced as a penal law. In view of the evidence, these instructions could not have been prejudicial.

Upon an examination of the whole record we are satisfied that no error was committed of sufficient materiality to require us to direct a new trial in the case. The accused was properly convicted. Indeed, under some of the evidence his conduct might well have been held to have amounted to such criminal negligence and disregard of consequences as to justify his conviction of a higher grade of homicide.

Judgment affirmed.

BROWN et al. v. KOLB.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 26, 1912.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 160*)—APPEAL—NOTICE—SERVICE—SUFFICIENCY.

Service of notice of appeal from a magistrate's judgment in an action for claim and delivery was complete when he received the notice and, in writing, acknowledged service within five days.

2. REPLEVIN (§ 11*)—DEMAND—SUFFICIENCY.

Where demand for possession of property is made before bringing suit for claim and delivery, no new demand is necessary on discontinuance of that action and commencement of another.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1186*)—HARMLESS ERROR—APPEAL FROM INTERMEDIATE COURT—REFUSAL TO CHANGE VENUE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 368, which authorizes the Supreme Court to give judgment on the merits of a case without regard to technical errors and defects, a magistrate's error in refusing to send a case to another magistrate does not necessarily require the Supreme Court to grant a new trial on appeal from a judgment of the circuit court affirming the magistrate's judgment.

4. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 290*)—ATTORNEY'S FEES—RIGHT TO.

Under a chattel mortgage providing that on default the mortgagee might seize and sell the property and apply the proceeds, after deducting all expenses and charges, including attorney's fees, to the payment of the indebtedness, etc., he is not entitled to an attorney's fee in foreclosure by action.

Gary, C. J., and Fraser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; H. F. Rice, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by W. T. Brown and another, partners as Brown & Parler, against J. R. Kolb. From a judgment of the circuit court affirming a magistrate's judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Modified.

A. B. Stuckey, of Sumter, for appellant.
L. D. Jennings, of Sumter, for respondents.

WOODS, J. In this action for claim and delivery for the recovery of a lot of produce under a crop mortgage, the jury in the magistrate's court found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the property in dispute, which they valued at $100, and found a special verdict that the defendant owed the plaintiffs $100. Upon appeal the circuit court affirmed the judgment of the magistrate.

[1] There is nothing in the point made by respondents that the notice of appeal from the magistrate was not personally served.

Sending by mail would not have been a good service, but the service was complete when the magistrate received the notice and, in writing, acknowledged service within five days.

[2] The position that there was no demand before the action was brought is not tenable. The evidence shows that a demand was made and refused; that an action was then brought and the property taken, but, on account of some irregularity, this first action was discontinued and the property released. It seems obvious that a second demand was not necessary.

[3] The court is of opinion that the magistrate erred in refusing to send the case to another magistrate on the facts stated in defendant's affidavit; but it does not follow that there should be a new trial. This is not a case like Wren v. Johnson, 62 S. C. 583, 40 S. E. 937, and Riley v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 68 S. C. 383, 47 S. E. 708, where all the proceedings were absolutely void, because the court had never acquired jurisdiction. On the contrary, the magistrate did acquire jurisdiction of this case, and his refusal to send the case to another magistrate was like any other error of law, and should not result in a new trial if this court can "give judgment according to the merits of the case without regard to technical errors and defects," as required by section 368 of the Code of Procedure.

[4] The plaintiff having proved his account for $77.55, and the defendant having offered no testimony upon which the jury could have found a less amount, the plaintiff, beyond doubt, was entitled to a verdict for that sum. As that was the entire debt, the verdict for $100 must have included attorney's fees to the amount of $22.45, which were not recoverable in this action. The mortgage provided that on default the mortgagee might seize and sell the property, and that upon the sale "he shall apply the proceeds of such sale, after deducting all expenses and charges, including attorney's fees, toward the payment and discharge of the indebtedness," etc. Under a similar contract, it was held, in Walker v. Killian, 62 S. C. 482, 40 S. E. 887; that the mortgagee could not claim the fees if he foreclosed by action, and not by seizure under the power.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be modified by a reduction of $22.45.

HYDRICK and WATTS, JJ., concur.

GARY, C. J. (dissenting). This is an action in claim and delivery, and was tried by a jury in a magistrate's court, where a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs.

The defendant made a motion before the magistrate for a change of venue, "because the defendant is apprehensive that the magistrate may not give him a fair and impartial trial, for the reason that W. T. Brown [one of the plaintiffs] stated some time during the summer of 1911, in the presence of this defendant and others, that Magistrate Reese will not decide a case against him for anybody, and that said magistrate may be so under the influence of the plaintiffs as not to render a fair and impartial trial herein." There were also other grounds.

The magistrate refused the motion, and such refusal was made the basis of one of the appellant's grounds of appeal to the circuit court, which dismissed the appeal; whereupon the defendant appealed to this court upon this and other grounds.

Section 88, subd. 19, of the Code, provides: "Whenever either party to a civil case, * * * which is to be tried before a magistrate, shall file with the magistrate issuing the paper an affidavit to the effect that he does not believe he can obtain a fair trial before the magistrate, the papers shall be turned over to the nearest magistrate, not disqualified from hearing said cause in the county, who shall proceed to try the case as if he had issued the papers: Provided, such affidavit shall set forth the grounds of such belief."

When the affidavit complies with the requirements of the Code, it is mandatory upon the magistrate to change the venue; and it is reversible error for him to proceed with the trial of the case. State v. Conkle, 64 S. C. 371, 42 S. E. 173.

In construing said section of the Code, the court used this language, in the case of Bacot v. Deas, 67 S. C. 245, 45 S. E. 171: "The law does not provide that the grounds should be such as would convince the magistrate, and the reason, we think, for requiring them to be stated is to prevent arbitrary and capricious charges of prejudice; and to this end, it seems to us, the law contemplates that the affidavit shall contain such statements as would form the basis of an indictment for perjury." This principle is affirmed in the cases of Witte v. Cave, 73 S. C. 15, 52 S. E. 736, and Mayes v. Evans, 80 S. C. 362, 61 S. E. 216, 657. These authorities show that the affidavit herein complied with the requirements of the Code, and that the magistrate erred in refusing to change the venue.

As the magistrate did not have the right to try the case, the other questions involved were not properly before him for consideration; nor can they be considered by this court until they have been properly tried in the court below. Wren v. Johnson, 62 S. C. 535, 40 S. E. 937; Riley v. Insurance Co., 68 S. C. 383, 47 S. E. 708.

I think the judgment of this court should be that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a change of venue and a new trial.

STEPHENS et al. v. LONG et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 17, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1039*)—HARMLESS ERROR—COMPLAINT.

In an action to recover land, a clerical error in the complaint, in that it described one of the lots in controversy as "52," instead of "54," was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4075-4088; Dec. Dig. § 1039.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 341*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—CERTIFIED COPY.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 882 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 669), providing that certified copies of certain instruments shall be admitted in evidence equally with the originals thereof, a certified copy of a certificate given by the tax commissioners to the party under whom plaintiffs claimed was admissible in an action to recover land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1289-1292; Dec. Dig. § 341.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTION.

Where the undisputed evidence showed that defendants' only claim to the land sought to be recovered was under a deed to one defendant by plaintiffs, an instruction which limited defendants' right to acquire title to the land by limitations under a paper title, being more favorable to defendants than the evidence warranted, was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4052-4062; Dec. Dig. § 1033.*]

4. DEEDS (§ 119*)—QUESTION FOR JURY—AMBIGUOUS DEED.

Where, in an action to recover land, the description in the deed upon which one defendant relied was ambiguous, the question as to what land was intended to be conveyed thereby, being one of intention, was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 342, 343; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUEST.

Where, in an action to recover land, the court charged by implication that plaintiffs were not entitled to recover if they conveyed the land in question to one of the defendants, failure to give a more specific charge was not error, in the absence of a request therefor.

6. DEEDS (§ 120*)—CONSTRUCTION—EXTRINSIC FACTS.

The land intended to be conveyed by an ambiguous description will be ascertained by reading the deed in the light of the circumstances under which it was executed, and of the subsequent conduct of the parties relative to it.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Beaufort County; Thos. S. Sease, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Lula V. Stephens and others against R. A. Long and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

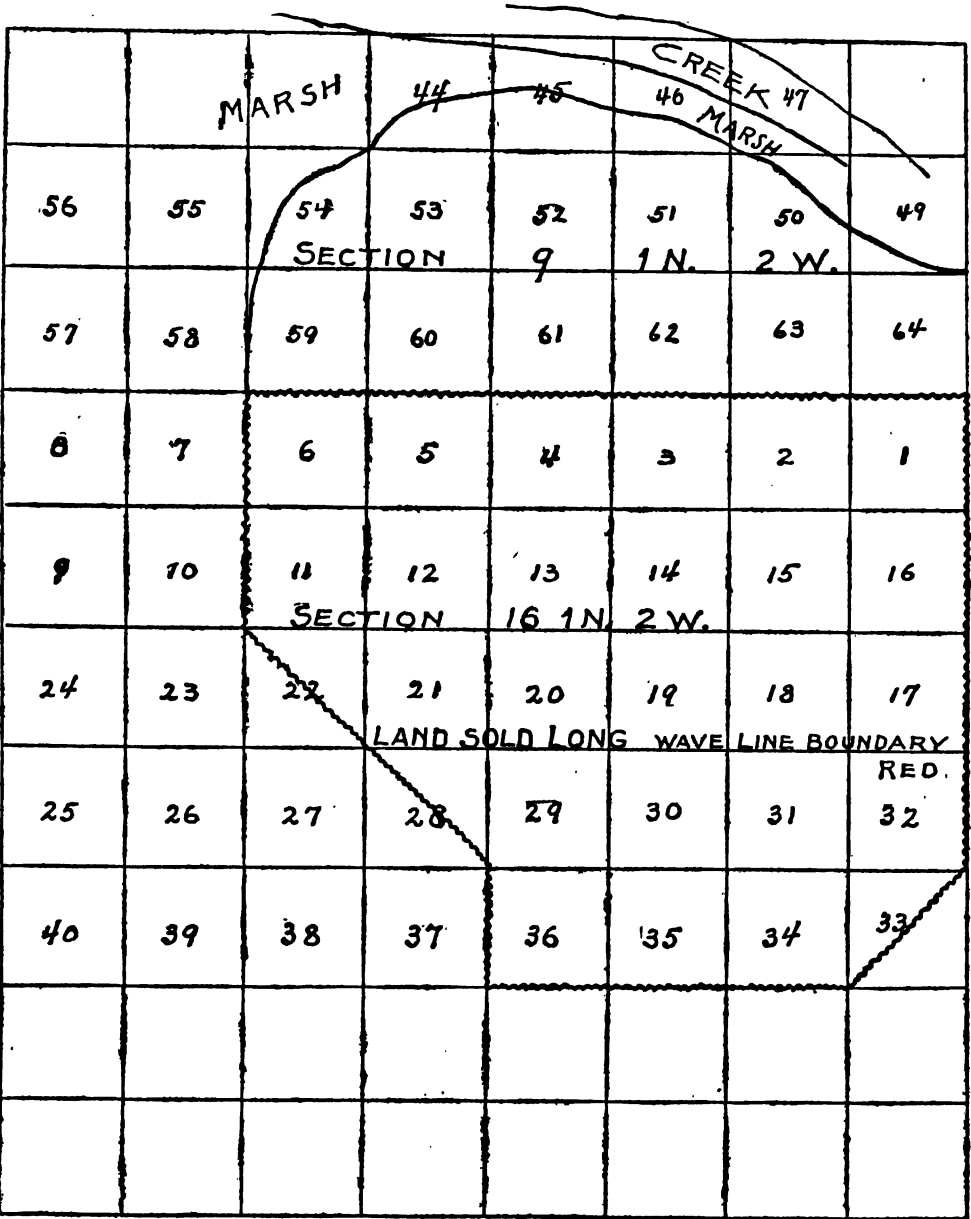

Appellants complain of the following part of the charge: "I charge you that if the defendants went into possession of this property under paper title, or rather this property described in the complaint, under paper title, or either one of them went into possession under a paper title and held for an uninterrupted period of 10 years, then the rights of the plaintiffs would be barred by what is known as the statute of adverse possession."

Thos. Talbird and Tillinghast & Tillinghast, all of Beaufort, for appellants. W. J. Thomas, of Beaufort, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. The plaintiffs, who are the heirs or the representatives of heirs of W.

J. Verdier, brought this action to recover a tract of land which is described in the complaint as follows: "All that land situate, lying, and being on Port Royal Island, Beaufort county, South Carolina, containing one hundred and ten acres, more or less, described as lots Nos. 51, 52, 53, 60, 61, 62, 63, and 64, and fractional lots 44, 45, 46, 49, 50, 52 and 59, all in section nine, township one north of the Beaufort base line, and range two west of St. Helena meridian, according to the plat of the United States direct tax commissioners for the district of South Carolina."

To understand clearly the questions presented for decision, it will be necessary to refer to the plat in evidence. Each lot on the plat contains 10 acres. W. J. Verdier bought the tract in section 9, which is described in the complaint, at a sale made by the United States direct tax commissioners in 1876. About the same time, he bought, also, the tract in section 16, which is particularly described in the deed made by certain of his heirs to the defendant Long. It is probable that the two tracts were conveyed to Mr. Verdier by separate deeds. At any rate, the certificate of the tax commissioners, in evidence, covers only the tract in section 9; and his daughter testified that he bought the two tracts at different times. It is not clear from the evidence whether the two tracts were, before the sale by the commissioners, parts of the same plantation; but there is evidence that, after they were purchased by Mr. Verdier, they were known together as "Spring Hill" plantation. Mr. Verdier had possession of both tracts, except 30 acres, which he conveyed to Moses Fields, and which is described in the deed to the defendant Long, from the date of his purchase until his death in 1902.

In 1903 six of his heirs conveyed to the defendant Long their undivided six-sevenths interest in a tract described in their deed as follows: "All of that certain piece, parcel, or lot of land situate, lying, and being on Port Royal Island, in the county of Beaufort and state of South Carolina, and known and described as lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34, 35, and 36, and fraction of lots 22, 28, 33, comprising two hundred and fifty acres, more or less, in section 16, township 1 north, range 2 west, according to the survey of the United States direct tax commissioners for the district of South Carolina, reserving the public right of way, and located on Port Royal Island, Beaufort county, South Carolina, and known as Spring Hill plantation, save and except that portion thereof which is included in the following lines, to wit: A line starting at the point where the western boundary line of said plantation strikes the north side of the road leading from the Shell road to 'Old House' plantation, running thence northerly along the western boundary line of said 'Spring Hill' plantation 628 $\frac{1}{4}$ feet; thence easterly and parallel to said road running to 'Old House' 2,087 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet; thence southerly to said road leading to 'Old House' 626 $\frac{1}{4}$ feet; thence along said 'Old House' road westerly 2,087 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet to the point of departure, having its northern and southern lines parallel and coextensive, and its eastern and western lines parallel and coextensive, measuring and containing thirty acres, more or less, being the portion of said plantation conveyed to Moses Fields by deed bearing date the 31st day of March, 1891, by W. J. Verdier, deceased, the father of grantors."

It will be noticed that the tract last above described is designated as "Spring Hill" plantation; and that is the principal fact which caused and characterized this litigation.

[1] A certified copy of the certificate of the purchase of the tract in section 9, which was given to Mr. Verdier by the tax commissioners, describes that tract precisely as it is described in the complaint, except that "54" is given as one of the lots of which a fractional part was included, instead of "52," which is given in the complaint. This is evidently a clerical error in the complaint; for it appears from both the certificate and the plat that the whole of lot 52 was included in the sale, and that only a part of lot 54 was included.

It seems that after the death of Mr. Verdier his heirs moved away from Beaufort, and appointed Dr. White their agent to rent and sell their lands; and it was through him that defendant Long purchased. He testified that while he was negotiating with Dr. White for the purchase of the Verdier tract, and before he concluded the agreement, he went to look at the land, and that Dr. White referred him to Moses Fields to show him the lines, and that Fields showed him the boundaries of both the tracts in sections 9 and 16 as included in the Verdier tract. In this he is corroborated by Fields, except that Fields says that when Mr. Long came to look at the land he told him he had bought it. He says, also, that Dr. White told him he sold Mr. Long all the land.

After his purchase, the defendant Long took possession of all the Verdier lands in both sections 9 and 16; and he and his codefendant, claiming under that purchase, are still in possession of both tracts. He says that, on account of the absence from Beaufort of the Verdier heirs, he did not receive his deed from Dr. White until three months after he had bought the land, paid for it, and gone into possession; and that when the deed was delivered to him by Dr. White, he, supposing that it covered the land he had bought, put it into his safe, without examining it, and knew nothing to the contrary until he was notified by plaintiffs' attorney of their claim.

Besides the description of the tract conveyed as "Spring Hill" plantation, there were some circumstances tending to show that the Verdier heirs intended to convey to the defendant Long, by their deed of 1903, their interest in all the lands on the island which they had inherited from their father.

It appears from the evidence that the tract conveyed to Moses Fields by Mr. Verdier lies almost entirely in section 16. It may extend as far as 30 feet into section 9.

The answer of the defendants was a general denial. Notwithstanding they did not plead mistake or misrepresentation, the jury were instructed that, "when there is a mutual mistake as to the property sold, the law will relieve against it." They were also charged, in substance, that, if the plaintiffs had established title to the lands described in the complaint in themselves, and if they had not conveyed it to the defendant Long, they were entitled to recover. The jury found for plaintiffs the land in dispute.

There is no merit in the first and second exceptions, which are based on the clerical error in the complaint herein before mentioned.

[2] There was no error in admitting in evidence a certified copy of the certificate given to Mr. Verdier by the tax commissioners. The act of Congress (section 882 of the Revised Statutes of the United States [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 669]) provides that such copies "shall be admitted in evidence equally with the originals thereof."

[3] As the undisputed evidence showed that the defendants' only claim to the land was under the deed made to the defendant Long by the heirs of W. J. Verdier, in 1906, no question of title by adverse possession in the defendants could have arisen; and, for the same reason, the statute of limitations cannot aid the appellants, because charging that, if defendants had held the land uninterruptedly for 10 years, the plaintiffs would be barred was more favorable to the defendants than the evidence warranted, as defendants had not been in possession 10 years.

[4, 5] Appellants contend that the court should have construed the deed of the Verdier heirs to defendant Long, and have charged the jury that it conveyed the entire "Spring Hill" plantation. The court could not have done so without invading the province of the jury. The question was one of intention. It would have been more satisfactory if the issue whether the Verdier heirs, by their deed of 1903, intended to convey to defendant Long their interest in all the land in both sections, which they had inherited from their father, had been more clearly and specifically submitted to the jury. But, while the court did not charge directly upon the question of intention, he did charge, by implication, if they conveyed the land to Long, they were not entitled to recover. But appellants made no request for a more specific charge upon that subject, and we find no error in what was charged.

[6] In ascertaining the limits or boundaries of land which a grantor intended to convey, the courts will read his deed in the light of all the circumstances surrounding the parties when the deed was executed, and also of their subsequent conduct relative to it; and when the description involves a latent ambiguity, what the parties intended it to cover becomes a question of fact for the jury, and not one of construction for the court.

HORSFORD v. CAROLINA GLASS CO.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 231*)—PRESENTATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW IN COURT BELOW—NECESSITY.

Where defendant objected to testimony on the ground that it tended to show an effort to compromise, and plaintiff disclaimed any such purpose, and defendant's further objections failed to state the grounds thereof, its exceptions to the admission of such testimony cannot be reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1299, 1352; Dec. Dig. § 231.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1062*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—WITHDRAWAL OF ISSUES FROM JURY.

In a personal injury action, where, at the close of the entire case, plaintiff withdrew the question of punitive damages, defendant, in the absence of a showing of prejudice, cannot complain that its motion to withdraw that issue from the jury was refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4212-4218; Dec. Dig. § 1062.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 264*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for personal injuries received while attempting to place a belt on a pulley, where the servant alleged the defendant's negligence in failing to furnish him a safe place to work, testimony that the defendant had no loose or shifting pulleys on the shaft, and that these appliances would have avoided the injury, was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 861-876; Dec. Dig. § 264.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—WAIVER OF ERRORS.

Exceptions not argued on appeal are waived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

5. JURY (§ 80*)—SUMMONING OF JURY—POSTPONEMENT.

It was not error for the trial court to refuse a postponement until the extra venire had been summoned and had answered, when 24 of the veniremen were present.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 380-387; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 127*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—EVIDENCE—INSURANCE.

In a personal injury action by a servant, it is improper to introduce evidence tending to show that the master was protected by employer's liability insurance, and argument presenting that fact to the jury is improper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 275; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

Gary, C. J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; John S. Wilson, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by W. E. G. Horsford against the Carolina Glass Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The exceptions were as follows:

"(1) That his honor erred in admitting in evidence, over the objection of the defendant, certain declarations or admissions claimed to have been made by certain officers of the defendant company to the plaintiff, W. E. G. Horsford, as follows, to wit: 'Mr. Nelson: State whether or not the company ever said anything to you about paying your wages? A. They paid me my salary for a while. Q. Why did they stop? Mr. Lyles: I object. Mr. Nelson: If they told you why they stopped, and if you had any conversation with Mr. Brewer, the manager, or Mr. Seibels, who was president, it is competent. A. I went to the Glass Works to get my pay. I thought I was still receiving it. When I got there, I saw Mr. Brewer. He told me he had a conversation with Mr. Seibels and that he had said the insurance companies— Mr. Lyles: I object, and ask that that be stricken out. If there is anything objectionable under our law, it is anything in the nature of a compromise; not competent. Mr. Nelson: We are not seeking to show a compromise. Just want to give the reason Mr. Seibels assigned to him for not paying him. The Court: Go ahead. Mr. Nelson: What did he say to you? Mr. Lyles: I object. The Court: Note exception. Mr. Lyles: This was long after the accident, and I don't know whether Mr. Brewer was then an officer of the company, but Mr. Brewer had no right or authority by admission of a statement at a late date, not anywise connected with this accident, to bind the company. Mr. Norton, I think, was the manager of the company at that time. This was long after the accident. Mr. Nelson: Instead of this being a compromise, it seeks to shirk liability; the answer will show no liability attached to them, and will give the reason. Q. How long after you got out before you went down there? A. I had been down there several times before. Q. How soon after Mr. Brewer had this conversation with you—how long after you were hurt? A. Some time. Q. Was Mr. Brewer still down there? Was he in the office doing what he had been doing when you were there? A. That is what I suppose he was doing—that is what he was doing. Q. What did he tell you? Mr. Lyles: I object. A. Mr. Brewer said that Mr. Seibels said to him under liability of the insurance company weren't due me anything and would not pay me anything else, but Mr. Brewer said he was going to Mr. Seibels' office, and that he would bring Mr. Seibels back and let me talk to him myself. Mr. Nelson: He said the insurance company— Mr. Lyles: I object. The Court: (He has already stated what he said. Mr. Nelson: State what he said. A. Mr. Brewer told me Mr. Seibels had said something about the insurance company, liability insurance, not paying any sum; said not due me anything and would not pay me anything, but Mr. Brewer said, "I am going to Mr. Seibels' office now, and I will bring Mr. Seibels back in a few minutes' time," and told me to wait, and I waited at the factory until Mr. Seibels came, and he came, and he told me— Q. You had a talk with Mr. Seibels, the president of the company? A. Yes, sir. He told me the insurance company claimed they were not due me anything and would not pay me any more time, and the company would not advance me anything, and that is when my pay stopped. Q. That conversation was with which Mr. Seibels? A. Mr. John G. Seibels, the president of the company.' Whereas, his honor should have excluded the testimony for the reasons: (a) That such declarations or admissions by officers of the company a long time after the injury to plaintiff were not competent evidence to bind the defendant company; and the further reason (b) that they were declarations tending to establish an attempted compromise; and the further reason (c) that they were evidently attempted to be introduced for the purpose of establishing (as contended by plaintiff) that the defendant carried accident insurance covering the injury to plaintiff, so that the jury would conclude that any verdict they might render would be paid by the accident insurance company and not by the defendant.

"(2) That his honor erred in refusing the defendant's motion for a new trial made upon the twelfth ground, as follows, to wit: 'That his honor erred in allowing plaintiff to testify to an admission of Mr. Brewer to the effect that the defendant would pay all expenses and everything plaintiff wanted, after the defendant had objected for the reason that Mr. Brewer had no authority to bind the defendant by an admission made after the accident.' Whereas, his honor should have set aside the verdict and granted a new trial for the reasons therein stated.

"(3) That his honor erred in refusing the defendant's motion for a new trial made upon the eighth ground, as follows, to wit: 'That his honor erred in allowing, over defendant's objection, plaintiff to testify to an admission alleged to have been made by Mr. Brewer long after the injury to plaintiff, and also in allowing plaintiff to testify, over defendant's objection, to an alleged admission by Mr. Seibels long after the accident, both of which had reference to the accident liability insurance company, to which plaintiff's counsel referred in his argument, for the reasons: (a) That it appeared that the admissions were made long after the injury to plaintiff, and for that reason were not binding upon the defendant, as neither Mr. Brewer nor Mr. Seibels had authority to make an admission under such circumstances; and (b) that the plaintiff's counsel thereby sought to bring before the jury the fact that he claims to exist that the defendant had liability insurance, in order to prejudice the jury by a subsequent argument that the verdict would not fall upon the defendant, but upon the liability insurance company.' Whereas, his honor should have set aside the verdict and granted a new trial for the reasons therein stated.

"(4) That his honor erred in refusing the defendant's motion for a new trial made upon the ninth ground, as follows, to wit: 'That the counsel for the plaintiff, in his closing argument to the jury, made remarks and drew inferences from the testimony, not based upon the evidence or the issues in the cause, of a character calculated to inflame the passions and prejudice of the jury, after objection had been made to the use of such language and to the statements and argument of counsel, and after the court had instructed him to confine himself to the record, the said remarks being to the effect that the jury should consider, in determining the amount of their verdict, that it would not sting the glass company, but would fall upon the accident insurance company, being practically a repetition of the statements and argument to which defendant's counsel had objected and which his honor had ruled improper.' Whereas, his honor should have set aside the verdict and granted a new trial for the reason therein stated.

"(5) That his honor erred in refusing the defendant's motion for a new trial upon the ground set forth in the notice duly served upon plaintiff's attorneys, as follows: 'To Messrs. Nelson, Nelson & Gettys, Attorneys for Plaintiff: You will please take notice that, upon the motion for a new trial, to be made before his honor, John S. Wilson, the defendant will rely, in addition to the grounds based upon the minutes of the court, upon the point that the counsel for the plaintiff in his argument to the jury went outside of the record, and made improper remarks to the jury of such a character as to prejudice and inflame them, and upon this point will use an affidavit, a copy of which is hereto attached. Shand & Shand, Lyles & Lyles, Attorneys for Defendant'—and the affidavit of J. B. S. Lyles, attached to said notice, and statements of W. S. and P. H. Nelson, which are a part of the record in this cause. Whereas, his honor should have granted the motion for a new trial upon the grounds and for the reasons set forth therein.

"(6) That his honor erred in allowing plaintiff's attorney, over the objection of defendant, to go outside of the record and improperly argue to the jury that some accident insurance company, in no wise a party to this cause, would pay any verdict that might be rendered against the defendant, and thus to persuade and prejudice the jury that the defendant would not be injured by any verdict; and his honor further erred in allowing such remarks without cautioning or charging the jury that they should not consider them or in some other manner relieving the defendant from the prejudice thereby created in the minds of the jury. Whereas, his honor should have required plaintiff's counsel to keep within the record and refrain from such argument on outside matter of a character to inflame and prejudice the jury, and, having failed in this, he should have cautioned and instructed the jury that such remarks were incompetent and improper and had nothing to do with the case, and that the jury should not consider them at all.

"(7) That his honor erred in refusing defendant's motion, made at the close of plaintiff's testimony, for a nonsuit upon the cause of action for punitive damages, as follows, to wit: 'Mr. Lyles: We ask for a nonsuit: First, as to the cause of action for exemplary or punitive damages, on the ground there is no evidence tending to establish the cause of action. * * * The errors being: (a) There was no evidence tending to establish such cause of action; and (b) that by the failure of his honor to grant the motion the defendant was misled and prejudiced in the presentation of its case to meet some such supposed evidence, when the plaintiff, by his counsel in open court, at the close of all the testimony, voluntarily acknowledged that there was no such testimony, and withdrew the cause of action.

"(8) That his honor erred in refusing the defendant's motion for a new trial made upon the second ground, as follows, to wit: 'That his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in refusing defendant's eleventh request to charge, as follows, to wit: "The only defect alleged in the appliances furnished plaintiff is that the belt was too tight or too short." The error being that the only defective appliance alleged in the complaint was a belt too short or too tight, and it was error, therefore, not to so instruct the jury and to allow them to consider any other defect.' Whereas, his honor should have granted the motion for the reasons therein stated.

"(9) That his honor erred in refusing defendant's eleventh request, as follows, to wit: 'The only defect alleged in the appliances furnished plaintiff is that the belt was too tight or too short.' The error being that this request set forth the proper construction of the complaint, and the defendant was entitled to have the cause submitted to the jury under such proper construction; that is, to have the jury limited to the issues raised by the pleadings, which were the only issues of which it had notice.

"(10) That his honor erred in refusing defendant's motion for a new trial made upon the first ground, as follows, to wit: 'That his honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's tenth request, as follows, to wit: "There is no evidence that the defendant violated its duty to furnish plaintiff with a safe place to work." And thereby submitted and allowed the jury to consider the allegation and argument of counsel to the effect that defendant had failed to furnish the plaintiff with a reasonably safe place to work, when there was no competent evidence adduced to sustain this allegation in the complaint.' Whereas, his honor should have granted the motion upon the grounds therein stated.

"(11) That his honor erred in refusing the defendant's tenth request to charge, as follows, to wit: 'There is no evidence that the defendant violated its duty to furnish plaintiff with a safe place to work.' The error being that there was no evidence from which a reasonable juror could conclude that the defendant had failed to furnish plaintiff with a safe place to work, and, the plaintiff bearing the burden of establishing this, the defendant was entitled to have this issue withdrawn from the jury.

"(12) That his honor erred in admitting, over the objection of the defendant, testimony by the plaintiff, W. E. G. Horsford, to the effect that the defendant had no loose or shifting pulleys on the shafting in question, and that with such loose or shifting pulleys the accident could not have happened; the said testimony being as follows, to wit: 'Q. What is the shifting or loose pulley used for? Mr. Lyles: I object. The only allegation of any delict in this complaint, anything wrong with the machinery; was that the belt was too short. Incompetent for them to prove in any other particular except too short. The only allegation contained in any one of these subdivisions is that the belt was too short. Mr. Nelson: In failing to furnish a safe place to work and in requiring him to work endeavoring to place a belt around the two pulleys, one of which was revolving rapidly, we submit it is proper to show wherein that was unsafe. Proper to show if a loose pulley or lever was there, that that was the proper construction, and that would have made it safe. The Court: I think so. Mr. Lyles: Note exception. Mr. Nelson: State whether or not there was any loose pulley there? A. No, sir; no loose pulley. Q. If a loose pulley was there, would that make it perfectly safe? Mr. Lyles: I object. The Court: Leading. Mr. Nelson: State whether or not, if a loose pulley was there, would it make it safe? A. If a loose pulley had been there, would have had a lever to push the belt on, and it would have been safe. Mr. Nelson: That loose pulley or lever, what is the operation for changing the belt from a loose pulley to a revolving pulley? Mr. Lyles: I object. There is no allegation of such defective machinery in the complaint. A safe place to work is a separate thing from unsafe appliances. The only allegation of unsafe machinery of which we have notice is that the belt was too short. It does not say that the machinery was defective in that there was no shifting pulley. Mr. Nelson: Counsel had the right to move to make this complaint more certain and definite; he could have done that, and we would have been obliged to say, and in failing to furnish a safe place to work. The Court: Go ahead, Mr. Nelson. Mr. Nelson: Where they have a loose pulley and lever or a shifter, what is the operation to transfer the belt from the loose pulley to the stationary pulley? Mr. Lyles: I object. A. If you have a loose pulley, that lever or shifter is fixed so that when you press the shifter you push it over and that will slide the belt onto the tight pulley, from the loose pulley to the tight pulley, and don't have to touch the belt, just this lever. Q. If you have no loose pulley or shifter or lever, tell us whether or not you have to handle the pulley with your hand to put on the pulley? A. Yes, sir; if you haven't got a loose pulley, you cannot get it on without putting your hands on. Q. Where they have a loose pulley, is there any danger in transferring the belt? A. No, just pull the lever over, and that shifts the belt. Q. Did they have a loose pulley or a lever down there at that time? A. No sir. Mr. Lyles: Your honor understands I am objecting to all these questions? The Court: Yes; go ahead. Mr. Nelson: In pulling the belt over the pulley which operated the air compressor, was it necessary to use the hand? A. Yes, sir.' Whereas: (a) His honor should have sustained the objection of the defendant that there was no allegation in the complaint that the machinery was defective in any other respect than that the belt was too short or too tight, and the plaintiff, having thus specified in his complaint the delictor acts of negligence of the defendant, his honor should have ruled this testimony incompetent and should have excluded the same; and (b) the plaintiff, not having established that it was customary or at all necessary to have loose or shifting pulleys, or that the machinery was in any manner not reasonably safe without them, his honor should have excluded the testimony for the reason that it did not tend to establish any negligence on the part of the defendant in the particulars specified in the complaint.

"(13) That his honor erred in refusing defendant's motion for a new trial made upon the third ground, as follows, to wit: 'That his honor erred in admitting, over the objection of defendant, the testimony of the plaintiff to the effect that there were no loose or shifting pulleys on the shafting in question. The errors being: (a) That the only defect in the machinery alleged in the complaint was that the belt was too short or too tight and no defect in the shafting or pulleys was alleged; and (b) that the plaintiff did not endeavor to establish that shafting and pulleys of this character, without the shifting pulleys, were unreasonably unsafe and dangerous, or that shifting pulleys were customary or reasonably necessary for such purpose, and the testimony merely tended to confuse and mislead the jury in violation of his honor's charge that the defendant was merely under a duty to furnish reasonably safe machinery and a reasonably safe place to work.' Whereas, his honor should have set aside the verdict and granted a new trial for the reasons therein stated.

"(14) That his honor erred in refusing defendant's motion, made at the close of plaintiff's testimony, for a nonsuit upon the whole case, as follows, to wit: 'Mr. Lyles: * * * We ask for a nonsuit on the whole case, upon two grounds, first of which is that there is no evidence tending to establish the violation of any duty owed by the defendant to the plaintiff that approximately resulted in damages to the plaintiff, or the violation of any duty owed by any servant, for the violation of which duty the defendant is responsible under law. * * * Whereas, his honor should have granted the motion upon the grounds therein stated.

"(15) That his honor erred in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant as requested by the defendant in its third request to charge, as follows, to wit: 'The jury is instructed to find a verdict for defendant, as there is no evidence tending to establish the violation of any duty owed plaintiff by defendant, directly and proximately resulting in damage or injury to plaintiff.' Whereas, his honor should have directed a verdict for the defendant as therein requested.

"(16) That his honor erred in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant as requested in defendant's fourth request to charge, as follows, to wit: 'The jury is instructed to find a verdict for defendant for the reason that the evidence admits only of the inference that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant not in the performance of any duty owed by defendant to plaintiff.' Whereas, his honor should have directed a verdict for the defendant as therein requested.

"(17) That his honor having charged the defendant's ninth request to charge, as follows, to wit: 'A defect in machinery or appliances furnished by the master is not to be presumed from the mere fact that it failed or broke in use. The plaintiff must establish such defect by the preponderance of the testimony'—he erred in failing to direct a verdict for the defendant as requested in defendant's first request, as follows, to wit: 'The jury is instructed to find a verdict for defendant.' The error being that his honor, having adopted for the law of the case the rule set forth in defendant's ninth request, there was no evidence from which a reasonable man could infer that there was any defect in the machinery or appliances furnished by defendant, and there was therefore a failure of evidence to establish any defect in the machinery or appliances, and consequently a failure to establish any breach of duty owed by the defendant to the plaintiff under the allegations of the complaint.

"(18) That his honor erred in modifying or changing defendant's seventh request, which reads as follows: 'The master is not under an absolute duty to furnish his servant with a safe place to work and safe machinery and appliances. He owes merely the duty of ordinary care to do so; that is, of furnishing such a place to work and such machinery and appliances as a man of ordinary sense and prudence would furnish under similar circumstances.' And in charging the same in the following form: 'Now for the defense, I charge you as follows: "(7) The master is not under an absolute duty to furnish his servant with a safe place to work and safe machinery and appliances"—not under an absolute duty, because, as I have tried to illustrate, it may be such work that the master cannot guarantee safety, cannot guarantee safety to the employé, but only to furnish what is reasonably safe and suitable under suitable circumstances. I charge you that.' The error being that the charge as requested stated a correct proposition of law, absolutely applicable to the issues raised by the pleadings and the testimony, which the defendant was entitled to have charged in the form requested; but in the form to which it was changed by his honor it took away from the jury the proper test under which they should have determined the question whether the defendant was negligent in failing to furnish the plaintiff a safe place to work and safe machinery and appliances, to wit, the test of ordinary care, that is, the care that would be exercised by a man of ordinary sense and prudence, and instructed the jury to the effect that the master was not under an absolute duty to furnish a safe place to work and safe machinery and appliances only in cases where the work was such that the master could not guarantee safety to the employé, thus instructing them that the master was under an absolute duty in other cases.

"(19) That his honor erred in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant as requested in defendant's fifth request to charge, as follows, to wit: 'The jury is instructed to find for the defendant, for the reason that the evidence admits only of the inference that plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed as a proximate cause of his own injuries.' Whereas, his honor should have granted the request and directed a verdict for the reasons therein stated.

"(20) That his honor erred in refusing defendant's motion for a new trial made upon the fifth ground, as follows, to wit: 'That his honor, having charged the defendant's eighteenth request, as follows, to wit: "If plaintiff had a choice of two ways to do the work in the doing of which he was injured—one safe and one dangerous—and he voluntarily chose the dangerous way and was injured thereby, as a proximate consequence of doing the work in this dangerous way, then he cannot recover." And this having thereby become the law of the case, and the evidence having conclusively established in the affirmative the facts upon which this law was hypothecated, his honor must, as a matter of law, set aside the verdict as being contrary to law.' Whereas, his honor should have granted the motion for the reasons therein stated.

"(21) That his honor having charged the defendant's eighteenth request, as follows: 'If plaintiff had a choice of two ways to do the work in the doing of which he was injured—one safe and one dangerous—and he voluntarily chose the dangerous way and was injured thereby, as a proximate consequence of doing the work in this dangerous way, then he cannot recover.' And this having thus become the law of the case, it was error for his honor to refuse to direct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant as requested in defendant's first request, as follows, to wit: 'The jury is instructed to find a verdict for defendant.' Because the only inference that could be drawn from the testimony was that the plaintiff had a choice between a safe and a dangerous way of doing the work, and that he voluntarily chose the dangerous way, and was injured as a proximate consequence of doing the work in this way.

"(22) That his honor erred in charging the plaintiff's fourth request, as follows, to wit: 'A servant is not ordinarily guilty of contributory negligence in obeying an order or rule of his master, unless the danger or peril of obeying such rule or order is so imminent or obvious that a man of ordinary prudence would not incur it. To show contributory negligence under such circumstances, it is not sufficient that the employé receiving the order should have misgivings and believe the act required to be hazardous, unless the danger is so imminent and obvious that a man of ordinary prudence would not incur it. If there is ground for reasonable difference of opinion as to the danger, the servant is not bound to set up his judgment against that of the master, whose orders he is required to obey; but he may rely on the judgment of his superior.' The error being that there was no evidence from which a reasonable man could infer that the plaintiff had been ordered to do the work in the manner in which he did it, since the plaintiff did not even claim that he had been instructed by a superior servant or officer to do the work in the manner which caused his injury, and it was therefore error to submit to the jury the issue whether his obedience to such an order excused him from the danger of the work that he undertook.

"(23) That his honor erred in charging the plaintiff's sixth request, as follows, to wit: 'A servant may, without inspection, assume and rely upon the assumption that the machinery and appliances furnished him by the master are safe and suitable, and he is not ordinarily bound to exercise ordinary care to ascertain if they are so.' The errors being: (a) That the evidence admitted only of the inference that the plaintiff had full opportunity, certainly as much so as his superiors, of observing any defects in the machinery and appliances furnished him, and it was not a case of superior knowledge of the defect on the part of the master; (b) that there was no evidence from which a reasonable man could infer that there was a defect in the machinery and appliances; and (c) that a servant is ordinarily bound to exercise ordinary care to inspect and ascertain if there are defects in the machinery and appliances furnished him, certainly except in cases of superior knowledge on the part of the master of hidden defects, and there was no evidence bringing this case within the exception.

"(24) That his honor erred in refusing defendant's motion for a nonsuit, made at the close of plaintiff's testimony, upon the following grounds, to wit: 'Mr. Lyles: * * * We ask for a nonsuit on the whole case, upon two grounds: * * * Second, on the whole case. It is clear that the plaintiff is barred by his assumption of risk.' Whereas, his honor should have held, from the plaintiff's testimony, that the plaintiff had assumed the risk of the injury he sustained, and should have granted the motion.

"(25) That his honor erred in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant as requested in defendant's sixth request to charge, as follows, to wit: 'The jury is instructed to find a verdict for the defendant, for the reason that the evidence admits only of the inference that plaintiff assumed the risks of the injuries he sustained.' Whereas, his honor should have granted the request and directed a verdict for the defendant for the reasons therein stated.

"(26) That his honor erred in refusing defendant's motion for a new trial, made upon the eleventh ground, as follows, to wit: 'That the verdict is so excessive that, coupled with the fact that it was returned by the jury in less than one-half hour after the case was submitted to them, and the further fact that the plaintiff sought only $15,000 damages and voluntarily consented to the exclusion of punitive damages, it shows that it was the result of prejudice and caprice, and was not founded upon a mature deliberation of the issues presented.' Whereas, his honor should have held that the facts therein stated, which appear of record in the cause, established as a proposition of law that the verdict was the result of caprice and prejudice, and should have granted the motion upon this ground.

"(27) That his honor erred in ordering and requiring the defendant, over the objection of its counsel, to proceed with the drawing of the jury and the trial of the case, when there were only 24 veniremen present, and he erred in refusing to postpone the trial until the extra venire had been summoned and had answered. Whereas, his honor should have upheld the objection of the defendant and allowed a postponement of the trial until the extra venire had been summoned and had answered, so that the defendant would have had the benefit of a full venire from which to draw the jury."

Lyles & Lyles and Shand & Shand, all of Columbia, for appellant. Nelson, Nelson & Gettys, of Columbia, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the wrongful acts of the defendant, while he was employed to work in its glass factory

The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions involved, are as follows: "That on or about the 6th day of May, 1910, plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant, in the blowing room of its said factory, and was by defendant's manager ordered to do certain work, in the blacksmith shop of said factory, to wit, to assist in placing a belt on the pulley, which operates the air compressor, in said blacksmith shop; the belt being around a small pulley, which was operated by an electric motor, which pulley was revolving rapidly. Plaintiff, together with other workmen, was ordered to put said belt around the larger pulley, which operated the air compressor. That said belt was too short or tight to be operated on said pulleys, and upon its being placed around, or nearly around, said large pulley, it was violently thrown therefrom, and violently struck this plaintiff on the face and head, and knocked him senseless to the floor, and the small pulley, continuing to revolve at a great speed, caused said belt to beat and whip this plaintiff all over his person, bruising and battering him from head to foot. That the aforesaid injuries and damage to the plaintiff were caused by the careless, negligent, reckless, willful, and wanton conduct of the defendant: In failing to furnish plaintiff a safe place to work, and in requiring him to work at, and endeavor to place a belt around, two pulleys, one of which was revolving rapidly. In failing to furnish plaintiff safe appliances with which to work, and furnishing plaintiff a belt which was too tight or too short to be operated with safety. In ordering and requiring plaintiff to put said belt on said pulleys, when defendant knew, or should have known, that it was too tight and dangerous to operate. In ordering and requiring plaintiff and other employees to place said belt on said pulley while one of said pulleys was in motion."

The defendant denied the allegations of negligence and recklessness, and set up the defenses of contributory negligence and assumption of risk. The defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, which was refused. It also requested his honor, the presiding judge, to direct the jury to find a verdict in favor of the defendant, which request was also refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $12,500. The defendant made a motion for a new trial which was refused, except in one particular. His honor, the presiding judge, ordered that a new trial be granted, unless the plaintiff would consent upon the record that the verdict be reduced to $10,000. The plaintiff gave his consent, and the verdict was accordingly reduced. The defendant appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported.

Before proceeding to consider the exceptions specifically, we will first dispose of those assigning error, on the part of the circuit judge, in refusing the motions for a nonsuit, and to direct a verdict for the defendant, on the grounds that there was no testimony tending to sustain the material allegations of the complaint, or that the testimony showed that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence or assumed the risk.

The "case" contains 140 pages, and consequently the testimony is voluminous. We have considered it carefully, and have reached the conclusion that there was testimony tending to sustain the material allegations of the complaint, and that the motions for nonsuit, and the direction of a verdict, were properly refused; also, that the testimony tending to show contributory negligence and assumption of risk was susceptible of more than one inference; and that these defenses were properly submitted to the jury.

A detailed statement of the testimony would prolong this opinion to a great length, and no useful purpose would thereby be subserved. We proceed to the consideration of the specific exceptions.

First, second, and third exceptions:

[1] These exceptions relate to the admissibility of certain testimony. The objections to the testimony upon the trial of the case, and the errors assigned in those exceptions, do not correspond. The first objection to the testimony was that it tended to show an effort to compromise, whereupon the plaintiff's attorneys disclaimed any such purpose. The other objections failed to state the grounds thereof, and consequently are not properly before this court for consideration.

Fourth, fifth and sixth exceptions:

These exceptions relate to remarks made to the jury by one of plaintiff's attorneys. The appellant's attorneys in their argument say: "The language to which these exceptions are directed is somewhat in dispute, and reference must be had to affidavit of J. B. S. Lyles, and statement of W. S. & P. H. Nelson. For the purposes of this argument, we are perfectly willing to confine ourselves to the statement of the Mr. Nelson, as we have no desire to raise an issue between counsel." They then quote from the statement of Mr. W. S. Nelson as follows, and base their argument upon the facts therein stated: "In his argument to the jury, Mr. Nelson referred to testimony (checks and vouchers offered by plaintiff) to show payment to Horsford after his injuries, and referred to the testimony that Mr. Seibels had told Horsford, that they had liability insurance. I was sitting within a few feet of Mr. Nelson, and directed his attention to this part of the argument. At this point Mr. J. B. S. Lyles objected to the argument, and asked the court to request counsel to keep within the record. Mr. Nelson called the attention of the court to the testimony, whereupon the court ruled about to this effect, 'Yes, keep within the record.' Mr. Nelson stated to the jury, in effect, that he did not wish to go out of the record, for it would be a ground for reversal if he did, for he thought the jury would give such a good verdict that he did not wish to run any chance of having it reversed. What Mr. Nelson did state to the jury was about this: That Mr. Seibels had stated that they had liability insurance; that we did not know whether these payments came from the glass company or insurance company. I did not understand the court directed Mr. Nelson to desist from argument along the line which was interrupted by Mr. Lyles, but, after the interruption, further than making to the jury a statement that he did not wish to go out of the record, I am sure Mr. Nelson did not dwell upon this line of argument, and about all he did say was that the Carolina Glass Company claims it has made certain payments to the plaintiff (referring to checks and vouchers offered in evidence), but Mr. Seibels said they had liability insurance, and we do not know whether the glass company or insurance company actually paid these amounts; as we do not know whether the glass company or the insurance company had paid these bills, and did not know by whom the verdict would be paid, if the jury rendered one for the plaintiff."

When Mr. J. B. S. Lyles objected to the remarks of Mr. P. H. Nelson, as to the matter of liability insurance, and asked the court to request counsel to keep within the record, the court so requested, whereupon counsel disclaimed any desire to go out of the record. No further objection was made to the line of argument pursued by counsel. Under these circumstances, the exceptions must be overruled.

Seventh exception:

[2] The cause of action for punitive damages was withdrawn, and the appellant's attorneys have failed to show wherein this was prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.

Eighth and ninth exceptions:

It is only necessary to refer to the allegations of the complaint, to show that these exceptions cannot be sustained.

Tenth and eleventh exceptions:

What has already been said disposes of these exceptions.

Twelfth and thirteenth exceptions:

[3] One of the allegations of negligence was the failure of the defendant to furnish the plaintiff a safe place to work, and the testimony was competent, for the purpose of showing the condition of the place.

Fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth exceptions:

These exceptions make the point that there was no testimony tending to establish negligence. What has already been said disposes of these exceptions.

Eighteenth exception:

When this exception is considered, in connection with the entire charge, it will be found to be free from error.

Nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, and twenty-second exceptions:

In these exceptions the appellant contends that the evidence admitted only of the inference that plaintiff was guilty of negligence, which contributed to his injury as a proximate cause. What has already been said disposes of this question.

Twenty-third exception:

What has already been said disposes of this exception.

Twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth exceptions:

These exceptions assign error, on the part of the circuit judge, in not holding that the plaintiff assumed the risk, and are disposed of by what has already been said.

Twenty-sixth exception:

There is nothing in the record tending to show that the verdict was the result of prejudice or caprice.

[4, 5] Twenty-seventh exception:

The appellant's attorneys did not argue this exception; but, waiving such objection, it cannot be sustained.

I think the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed; but, as the other members of the court are of the opinion that the fourth, fifth and sixth exceptions should be sustained, the judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

WOODS, J. [6] I am unable to resist the conclusion that matter universally recognized as extraneous and highly prejudicial, in the trial of issues like those involved in this case, was brought into the evidence and argument against the objection of defendant's counsel, and that for that reason the defendant did not have a fair trial. There can be no doubt on the bench or at the bar that, in an action by an employé against his employer to recover damages for personal injury, both reason and authority forbid bringing into the evidence or argument the fact that defendant is protected by employer's liability insurance. Such evidence or argument has a manifest and strong tendency to carry the jury away from the real issue and to lead them to regard carelessly the legal rights of the defendant on the ground that some one else will have to pay the verdict. This is the only reason that can be assigned for attempting to use such testimony and argument. One of the most manifest and pressing duties, not only of courts, but of lawyers, is to prevent influences of this kind from finding their way into the administration of justice. In the discharge of this duty the entire commonwealth is deeply concerned, for the use in evidence and argument of such influences produces injustice, and waste of the time and labor of courts and juries at great public cost.

In this instance the evidence was brought out under the guise of a conversation between the plaintiff and Seibels, the president, and Brewer, the manager of the defendant company. Such a conversation as to any matter germane to the issue on trial was not subject to objection, but it was here used as a medium for getting before the jury prejudicial testimony entirely foreign to the issue. There was no ground for the defendant's counsel to object to the questions as tending to elude testimony as to insurance, because the questions contained no reference to the subject, and counsel could not anticipate that the answers would be incompetent. When the incompetent answer came, counsel did not object generally; but the court responded by saying that the answer was already out.

It is said, however, that the objection to the testimony cannot be sustained, because counsel did not move to strike out. The general rule is indisputably established that, when in the course of a trial incompetent statements of witnesses are brought in either from accident, or when they might be reasonably, though erroneously, thought by counsel to be competent, the only remedy that the court can afford is to grant a motion to strike out and instruct the jury to disregard the testimony. The injury resulting from the jury having heard the incompetent statement is regrettable, but the trial cannot be estopped because of such accidents and mistakes liable to occur in every trial. State v. Wideman, 68 S. C. 119, 46 S. E. 769; State v. Adams, 68 S. C. 421, 47 S. E. 676; Hagins v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 72 S. C. 216, 51 S. E. 683; Keys v. Winnsboro Granite Co., 76 S. C. 284, 56 S. E. 949.

But when testimony manifestly incompetent and prejudicial is adduced for the purpose of having such testimony influence the jury, the party who adduces it will not be allowed to hold his verdict and assert that the court can do nothing against the unfair advantage of having the statement before the jury, beyond striking it out and instructing the jury to disregard it. In such case it does not lie in the mouth of the offending party to say that, although he has brought in irrelevant and prejudicial testimony, the court cannot entirely deprive him of the benefit of it. It makes no difference that defendant's counsel did not move to strike out the testimony. Had the motion been made and granted, the plaintiff would still have had the unfair advantage of having testimony before the jury which he ought not to have offered. Justice can be satisfied only by the complete relief of a new trial. Reference to the subject in the argument was still more objectionable. In a written statement of facts made by Mr. W. S. Nelson, and accepted by counsel for defendant, it is said that Mr. P. H. Nelson stated in argument that "Mr. Seibels had told Horsford that they had liability insurance," that Mr. Lyles for defendant "objected to the argument and asked the court to request counsel to keep within the record," that Mr. Nelson called the court's attention to the testimony on the subject, and the court said, "Yes, keep within the record"; and, in summing up Mr. Nelson's remarks, the statement continues: "About all he did say was that the Carolina Glass Company claims it has made certain payments to the plaintiff (referring to checks and vouchers offered in evidence), but Mr. Seibels said they had liability insurance, and we do not know whether the glass company or insurance company had paid these bills, and did not know by whom the verdict would be paid if the jury rendered one for the plaintiff."

The inevitable conclusion that a party should not be allowed to hold a verdict obtained under such circumstances is enforced and illustrated in many cases. With respect to testimony as to employer's insurance, the Supreme Court of Mississippi said, in Herrin v. Daly, 80 Miss. 340, 31 South. 790, 92 Am. St. Rep. 605: "It could not conceivably throw any light on the issue, and could have no other tendency than to seduce a verdict on the ground that an insurance company, and not the defendants, would be affected." In Cosselmon v. Dunfee, 172 N. Y. 507, 65

N. E. 494, the question was asked: "Do you know whether they carry insurance for accidents, to their employes?" And the court went to the extent of holding that the plaintiff should not be allowed to hold his verdict, although the question was ruled out because by the question the plaintiff had improperly produced on the mind of the jury the impression there was such insurance. In the cases of Iverson v. McDonnell, 36 Wash. 73, 78 Pac. 202, and Westby v. Washington Brick, etc., Co., 40 Wash. 289, 82 Pac. 271, similar questions were held to be ground for reversal. Other cases holding such evidence inadmissible are: Roche v. Llewellyn Iron Works Co., 140 Cal. 563, 74 Pac. 147; Prewitt-Spurr Mfg. Co. v. Woodall, 115 Tenn. 605, 90 S. W. 623; Barrett v. Bonham Oil & Cotton Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 57 S. W. 602; Lowsalt v. Seattle Lumber Co., 38 Wash. 290, 80 Pac. 431; Blanchard v. Olds Gasoline Engine Works, 142 Mo. App. 319, 126 S. W. 828.

The same rule has been applied to the argument: Prewitt-Spurr Mfg. Co. v. Woodall, supra; Hollis v. United States Glass Co., 220 Pa. 49, 69 Atl. 55; George A. Fuller Co. v. Darragh, 101 Ill. App. 664; Tremblay v. Harnden, 162 Mass. 383, 38 N. E. 972; Lone Star Brewing Co. v. Voith (Tex. Civ. App.) 84 S. W. 1100; Coe et al. v. Van Why, 33 Colo. 315, 80 Pac. 894, 3 Ann. Cas. 552. In Tremblay v. Harnden, supra, the trial judge refused to allow counsel to comment on evidence of the defendant himself that he had insurance; the court saying: "We are of opinion that the judge was right in this refusal. It does not appear that the defendant relied upon his insurance in any way as a defense to this suit, and very likely the fact of insurance was brought out in cross-examination. It was not a subject for legitimate argument to the jury."

It is not necessary for us to go the extent that many of the courts have gone on this subject. The principle on which all the courts proceed is the same, namely, that such testimony or argument is not unfair. For these reasons I think the circuit court should be reversed.

On the other points I concur in the opinion of the Chief Justice.

WATTS, J., concurs. FRASER, J., concurs in the result.

HYDRICK, J. I concur in this opinion as applied to the facts of this case. But I reserve my opinion as to whether such testimony would not be admissible in a case where it appeared that plaintiff's injury resulted from reckless, willful, or malicious acts of defendant. In such a case, it might be reasonably inferred that such conduct was induced by reliance upon the insurance, and, if punitive damages are awarded, the general rule is that all the facts and circumstances should be laid before the jury in order that they may the more intelligently and justly award proper punishment.

BROWN et ux. v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 28, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1032*)—ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

A party may not complain of the admission of immaterial and irrelevant evidence, unless he shows that it was prejudicial to his rights.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 1097, 1195*)—LAW OF THE CASE.

The decision of the Supreme Court on appeal is the law of the case on a subsequent trial and appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4358-4368, 4427, 4661-4665; Dec. Dig. §§ 1097, 1195.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; G. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by William Brown and wife against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following are the exceptions of defendant:

"(1) That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in overruling defendant's objection to and admitting the following testimony: 'Q. When you got to Summerville, what did you find? A. She was dead and buried. Q. Was that or not the first time you knew she was dead? A. Yes, sir; that was the first time. Q. When was it you came to Summerville—how long after the burial? A. The second day. She died on the 22d, and I got the letter on the 24th. She died Wednesday, and I got the letter on Friday. Q. Then you came? A. Yes, sir. Q. Rosa, when did you get this letter? A. On the 24th. Q. When you got that letter, what did you do? A. I began to pack my trunk. Q. To come on? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you come immediately in response to that letter? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was the date of the letter? A. That letter was dated 22d, and I got it on the 24th. Q. When you got to Summerville, when did you first hear of the death of your sister? A. I did not hear until I got home in the house.' Whereas it is respectfully submitted that the said testimony was immaterial and irrelevant, as defendant was only liable in damages, if liable at all, for mental anguish caused to the plaintiff by being deprived of seeing her dead sister and of attending her funeral and burial, and the defendant could not be held liable for any mental anguish of the plaintiff, caused by the death of her sister and knowledge thereof, and that where, how, and when she acquired such knowledge is irrelevant and immaterial, and is entirely apart and disconnected from the message that was sent, the failure to deliver which prevented her being present at her sister's funeral and seeing her dead body, and for which alone she could be entitled to recover damages; that this result could not have been contemplated from the wording of the message, and no notice thereof to the company was given.

"(2) Because the court erred in not granting defendant's motion for a nonsuit at the close of the plaintiff's case, on the ground that there was not only no allegation in the complaint, but no testimony whatsoever, that plaintiff paid or promised to pay for the transmission of the message, or that the sender paid or promised to pay therefor, or that there was any consideration to the defendant.

"(3) Because the court below erred in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for a nonsuit, made at the close of the plaintiff's case, as to the cause of action based on negligent tort (only), on the ground that it affirmatively appeared from the plaintiff's own case that the message sued on was an interstate message, and that it did not appear that there was any default or breach of duty with regard thereto on the part of the defendant within the territorial limits of the state of South Carolina; and the defendant maintains that the statute entitled 'An act to allow damages against telegraph companies doing business in this state for mental anguish or suffering even in the absence of bodily injury caused by negligence in receiving, transmitting and delivering messages,' approved February, 1901 (Stat. S. C. vol. 23, p. 748), which act is the foundation of the cause of action based on negligent tort, is, if construed as applicable to the message in this case, unconstitutional and void, because in contravention of the federal Constitution, to wit: (a) Article 1, § 8, subd. 3, of the Constitution of the United States, conferring on Congress power to regulate commerce among the several states, and (b) article 1, § 8, subd. 17, of the Constitution of the United States, conferring power on Congress to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over the District of Columbia, and (c) that part of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

"(4) That the court below erred in refusing the defendant's motion for a nonsuit or a direction of verdict in its favor, at the close of the whole case, as to the cause of action based on negligent tort (only), on the grounds set out in defendant's motion for a nonsuit at the close of the plaintiff's case, and on the additional ground that it then affirmatively appeared that there was no default or negligence within the state of South Carolina, and that whatever default or negligence there was on the part of the defendant occurred without the state of South Carolina and within the District of Columbia; and therefore, as the message sued on was an interstate message, the defendant maintains that the statute entitled 'An act to allow damages against telegraph companies doing business in this state for mental anguish or suffering even in the absence of bodily injury caused by negligence in receiving, transmitting and delivering messages,' approved February 20, 1901 (Stat. S. C. vol. 23, p. 748), which act is the foundation of the cause of action based on negligent tort, is, if construed as applicable to the message in this case, unconstitutional and void, in contravention of three parts of the federal Constitution, to wit: (a) Article 1, § 8, subd. 3, of the Constitution of the United States, conferring on Congress power to regulate commerce among the several states, and (b) article 1, § 8, subd. 17, of the Constitution of the United States, conferring power on Congress to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over the District of Columbia, and (c) that part of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

"(5) That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing to charge the eleventh request of the defendant, which was as follows: 'That the measure of damages is governed in this case by the law of the District of Columbia, where the tort was committed; and under the law of that state any mental anguish which does not proceed from or accompany physical injury is not an element of damage, and cannot be recovered. The jury is therefore instructed that the plaintiff cannot recover damages in this case for the mental anguish she claims to have suffered in not seeing her dead sister's face and attending her funeral.'

"(6) That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing to charge the request of the defendant, numbered 11a, which was as follows: 'If the jury find from the evidence that the sole default of the defendant occurred in the District of Columbia, and that there was no breach of duty anywhere else, then the jury are instructed to bring in a verdict for the defendant, as far as compensatory damages for mental anguish are concerned.'

"(7) That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing to charge the fourteenth request of the defendant, which was as follows: 'Unless the plaintiffs have proved by a preponderance of the evidence that there was some default or breach of duty on the part of the defendant within the territorial limits of the state of South Carolina, there can be no recovery of damages for mental anguish, because the statute allowing such damages, if construed as authorizing recovery thereof where the plaintiff has not proved a default within the state, would be unconstitutional and void as in contravention of article 1, § 8, subd. 3, of the federal Constitution, conferring on Congress power to regulate commerce among the several states; and also of article 1, § 8, subd. 17, thereof, conferring power on Congress to exercise exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia.'

"(8) That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing to charge the fifteenth request of the defendant, which was as follows: 'If the jury find from the testimony that there has been no default or breach of duty in the state of South Carolina, and that such default or breach occurred without the state of South Carolina and in the District of Columbia, there can be no recovery of damages for mental anguish; for the mental anguish statutes upon which such recovery depends, if construed as authorizing a recovery under such circumstances, would be unconstitutional and void as in contravention of article 1, § 8, subd. 3, of the Constitution of the United States, conferring on Congress power to regulate commerce among the several states, and also of article 1, § 8, subd. 17, thereof, conferring power on Congress to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over the District of Columbia.'

"(9) That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing to charge the sixteenth request of the defendant, which was as follows: 'If the jury find that there was no default or breach of duty within this state, there can be no recovery of damages for mental anguish, as the mental anguish statute, if construed as applying to and authorizing recovery of damages for mental anguish under the circumstances of this case, would be unconstitutional and void as in contravention of that part of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.'

"(10) That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in charging the jury that the defendant telegraph company is liable for what it did under the laws of the state of South Carolina, and its right and remedies are under the laws of that state, irrespective of where the act of negligence may have occurred."

Mitchell & Smith, of Charleston, for appellant. Logan & Grace, of Charleston, for respondents.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff Rosa Brown through the wrongful acts of the defendant in failing to deliver the following telegram: "Summerville, S. C., January 22, 1908. Mrs. W. M. Brown, No. 72 Canal St., S. W., Washington, D. C. Come at once. Your sister died this morning. Frederika Alsten."

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $750 for negligence, thus eliminating the question as to the right of the plaintiff to recover punitive damages.

The appeal is from the refusal of his honor, the presiding judge, to grant the motion for nonsuit, and the direction of a verdict; also from his refusal to charge certain requests, and from certain parts of his charge, alleged to be erroneous.

This is the second appeal in this case; the first being reported in 85 S. C. 495, 67 S. E. 146, 137 Am. St. Rep. 914. The appellant's exception will be incorporated in the report of the case.

[1] The first exception cannot be sustained, for the reason that, even if the testimony therein mentioned was immaterial and irrelevant, the appellant has failed to show that it was prejudicial to its rights. The second exception was withdrawn.

[2] All the other questions presented by the exceptions herein were involved upon the former appeal, and were determined adversely to the contention of the appellant. They are therefore subject to the doctrine of res adjudicata, and, even if the rulings then made were erroneous, they could not be corrected in this case. Jones v. Railway, 65 S. C. 410, 43 S. E. 884.

These questions were also presented upon a petition for a rehearing on the former appeal in this case, but were again decided against the petitioner, and the petition dismissed. Again, they were affirmed in the case of Heath v. Telegraph Co., 87 S. C. 219, 69 S. E. 283, and still again in the case of Boyd v. Telegraph Co., 88 S. C. 518, 71 S. E. 28. In the last-mentioned case, the court had under consideration the question whether the addressee of a telegram, in a state which has not a mental anguish statute, has the right of recovery in this state for delay in delivering a message sent from this state to that, without reference to where the delay occurred, and ruled that he did have such right. In reversing the circuit judge, this court merely said: "This question has undergone judicial investigation so recently that we deem it only necessary to cite the cases of Brown v. Telegraph Co., 85 S. C. 495, 67 S. E. 146, 137 Am. St. Rep. 914, and Heath v. Telegraph Co., 87 S. C. 219, 69 S. E. 283, to show that the exceptions raising this question must be sustained."

These exceptions are therefore overruled. Judgment affirmed.

TOLAR et al. v. MARION COUNTY LUMBER CO.†

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 26, 1912.)

1. INFANTS (§ 30*)—CONVEYANCES—RATIFICATION—PRIORITY.

Mortgages ratified and executed after one became of age are superior to a deed made during his minority, but not ratified until after a ratification and execution of such mortgages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. §§ 41-49, 54, 55; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

2. INFANTS (§ 30*)—CONVEYANCES—RATIFICATION—PRIORITY.

A minor's deed to the timber on land is only inconsistent with mortgages covering the whole estate, executed and ratified after he became of age, but before ratification of the deed, so far as the timber is concerned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. §§ 41-49, 54, 55; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

3. INFANTS (§ 30*)—CONVEYANCES—RATIFICATION.

A conveyance made by an infant may be ratified on his reaching his majority, subject to mortgages previously executed and ratified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. §§ 41-49, 54, 55; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

4. INFANTS (§ 30*)—CONVEYANCES—RATIFICATION.

An infant's deed, ratified after reaching his majority, is superior to the title of persons claiming under a deed executed after such ratification, of which the subsequent grantee had notice.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1177*)—DISPOSITION—REMAND.

An action involving title under a deed to timber, giving the grantee 10 years in which to cut the timber, dating from commencement to cut, and providing that, if at the end of that time the timber should not be removed, he might have 10 years longer by paying 6 per cent. of the purchase price, should be remanded, for the purpose of enabling the parties to introduce evidence upon an issue as to whether a reasonable time had elapsed for removal of the timber, where the trial court erroneously deemed it had no right to require removal within any time other than that fixed by the deed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Dillon County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Controversy, without action, between J. J. Tolar and another and the Marion County Lumber Company. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Remanded.

Montgomery & Lide and Henry Buck, all of Marion, for appellants. Willcox & Willcox, of Florence, and M. C. Woods, of Marion, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is a controversy without action.

The facts, as agreed upon by the parties, are set out in the record.

The issue submitted to the court was: "Who has superior title to the timber on the two tracts of land hereinbefore described, plaintiffs or defendant?" And that issue involves the law as to the manner in which the contracts of an infant must be ratified after attaining his majority.

[1, 2] It appears from the agreed statement of facts that Ashton L. Berry was born on the 1st of March, 1881, and therefore attained his majority on the 1st of March, 1902; that Sarah A. Berry and Ashton L. Berry conveyed the timber on the two tracts of land described in the record, to the Cape Fear Lumber Company on the 9th of February, 1899, and that the deed of conveyance was duly recorded; that Sarah A. Berry and Ashton L. Berry executed a mortgage on one of said tracts of land to certain parties on the 26th of July, 1899, which was duly recorded on the 4th of August, 1899, and transferred to C. L. Willis on the 3d of October, 1900; that Ashton L. Berry made the following indorsement on said mortgage on the 4th of March, 1902, "I hereby indorse the within paper as just and correct;" that Sarah A. Berry and Ashton L. Berry executed a mortgage on the other tract of land to C. L. Willis on the 10th of December, 1900, which was duly recorded; that Ashton L. Berry made the following indorsement on said mortgage on the 4th of March, 1902, "I hereby indorse the foregoing paper as correct;" that Sarah A. Berry and Ashton L. Berry executed another mortgage to C. L. Willis on both tracts of land on the 4th of March, 1902; that Ashton L. Berry, on the 11th of December, 1902, ratified and confirmed his deed of conveyance, which he had made to Cape Fear Lumber Company on the 9th of February, 1899; that on the 12th of December, 1903, Sarah A. Berry and Ashton L. Berry conveyed both tracts of land to C. L. Willis in fee, and the deed was duly recorded; that on the — day of August, 1904, the Cape Fear Lumber Company conveyed said timber to the defendant, Marion County Lumber Company; that C. L. Willis and his wife conveyed the timber on said lands to the plaintiffs on the 1st of June, 1906.

In the case of Norris v. Vance, 8 Rich. 164, the court uses this language: "According to the decision in the case of Norris v. Wait, 2 Rich. 148 [44 Am. Dec. 283], and other authorities, this court is satisfied that to show a confirmation of an infant's contract, there must be, after he attains maturity, and with a full knowledge of his rights, one of these three things, viz: (1) Acquiescence, from which assent may be fairly inferred; (2) an adequate benefit enjoyed, which has grown, directly or indirectly, out of the contract; (3) some direct act of express assent."

There are exhaustive notes to the cases of

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Index.

Shreeves v. Caldwell, 8 Ann. Cas. 592, and Craig v. Van Bebber, 100 Mo. 584, 13 S. W. 906, 18 Am. St. Rep. 569, which discuss this subject in every aspect. The contract of an infant, except for necessities, is voidable, and is without force and effect until ratified by the infant after he becomes of age. Ihley v. Padgett, 27 S. C. 300, 3 S. E. 468.

If an infant executes a deed of conveyance, and, after attaining his majority, executes another deed or mortgage embracing the same land, the first deed will thereby be rendered as ineffectual as if it had never been made, for the reason that it is inconsistent with the second deed or mortgage, and was without vitality until confirmed in some way after the grantor ceased to labor under the disability of infancy. Therefore, when Ashton L. Berry, on the 4th of March, 1902, ratified the two mortgages executed by him during his minority, and also executed a third mortgage on that day, the lien of these respective mortgages became paramount to the rights of the Cape Fear Lumber Company, under its deed, dated the 9th of February, 1899; and such lien was not subject to be divested or rendered less effectual by the subject ratification of the deed of conveyance to the Cape Fear Lumber Company, which took place on the 11th of December, 1902. While it is true Ashton L. Berry could do no act, after ratifying the two mortgages and executing a third, that would render said mortgages less effective, nevertheless there are facts in this case by which Ashton L. Berry had the power to ratify the deed to the Cape Fear Lumber Company, subject to the lien of said mortgages. The reason why a subsequent deed or mortgage disaffirms a deed made during infancy is because they are inconsistent. A subsequent mortgage is inconsistent with a prior deed, for the reason that, if the deed should be considered as of force, there would be no power left in the grantor to make a valid mortgage. When, however, the deed executed during minority did not purport to cover all the land embraced within the mortgages, it cannot be said that they are wholly inconsistent.

[3] In the case under consideration, the deed to the Cape Fear Lumber Company did not purport to convey all the land, but only the timber thereon. Therefore the deed and the mortgages were only inconsistent to the extent that the mortgages had a prior lien, but which, after its enforcement by sale of the property, might leave the rights of the grantee unaffected to any great extent. When Ashton L. Berry ratified the mortgages, he took no other action tending to show an intention to repudiate the deed; and we see no reason why he could not thereafter ratify it, subject, of course, to the lien of the mortgages.

[4] When Sarah A. Berry and Ashton L.

Berry conveyed the two tracts of land to C. L. Willis, he knew that Ashton L. Berry had previously ratified the deed executed in favor of the Cape Fear Lumber Company; in fact, the instrument of writing, expressly confirming the deed made to said company on the 9th of February, 1899, was sent to him, and was then in his possession. The ratification of said deed created vested rights in the Cape Fear Lumber Company, which could not be divested by a subsequent deed. Therefore the title of the said company was paramount to that of C. L. Willis, and likewise to the title of the plaintiffs, as the deed of conveyance to them by C. L. Willis did not invest them with rights superior to those of C. L. Willis. This is shown by the following statement, which appears in the record: "Willis told J. J. Tolar, the partner who conducted the negotiations for his firm, that A. L. Berry was a minor at the time of the deed made by him to Cape Fear Lumber Company, and in corroboration of his statement produced, or offered to produce, and showed to Tolar, or offered to show to him, the confirmation above referred to," etc.

[5] The next assignment of error is as follows: "Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in holding that under the conveyance herein the defendant, Marion County Lumber Company, as grantee of the Cape Fear Lumber Company, took an estate in fee simple; it being respectfully submitted that by a proper construction of said conveyance it imposed upon the grantee and the defendant herein, as its successor, the duty of cutting and removal of said timber within a reasonable time."

The respondent's attorneys, in their argument, concede that under the cases of Flagler v. Railway, 89 S. C. 328, 71 S. E. 849, McClary v. Railway, 90 S. C. 153, 72 S. E. 145, and A. C. L. Corporation v. Litchfield, 90 S. C. 363, 73 S. E. 182, 728, the construction of said deed by his honor, the circuit judge, was erroneous.

The sixth and seventh exceptions, which are as follows, will be considered together:

"Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in not holding that more than a reasonable time in which to cut and remove said timber had elapsed before the commencement of this action, and that therefore the timber had revested and reverted in plaintiffs, as the successors in interest of C. L. Willis.

"Because, if the agreed statement of facts does not show the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties at the time of the execution of the timber deed sufficiently for the court to pass on the question of whether or not a reasonable time had elapsed in which to commence to cut and remove the said timber, his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in not remanding the case, or taking testimony to fully determine these facts; it being respectfully submitted that, this action being in the nature of a suit in equity, the court should be fully advised of all the facts before attempting to pass judgment."

The ruling of his honor, the circuit judge, in this regard, is as follows: "It was contended by plaintiffs that the deed under which defendant claims, when properly construed, bound the defendant to remove the timber within a reasonable time. This deed undoubtedly conveys the timber in fee simple. By a stipulation or provision contained in the deed, the defendant was to have 10 years from the time it commenced to cut the timber in which to cut and remove same, and, if at the end of that time it has not removed said timber, then, by a payment of 6 per cent. upon the purchase price, it was to have 10 years longer to remove same. Whatever may be my personal views as to the propriety of sustaining a contract of this character, I am constrained to hold, under the doctrine laid down in the cases of Knotts v. Hydrick, 12 Rich. 314, and Wilson v. Alderman, 80 S. C. 106, 61 S. E. 217, 128 Am. St. Rep. 865, that defendant's grantors received title to the timber in question in fee simple, and that I have no right to hold defendant to be required to remove this timber within a reasonable time, or within any time, except that which is provided for by the terms of the deed itself. I may add that, even if I did not regard myself bound by these decisions to give effect to the deed according to its terms, yet there is nothing from which I could ascertain whether or not a reasonable time for the removal of the timber in question has expired. The agreed statement of facts would seem to indicate that a reasonable time had not expired."

The circuit judge did not consider it necessary to decide the question whether the grantee had commenced to cut and remove the timber within a reasonable time, as the case of Flagler v. Railway, 89 S. C. 328, 71 S. E. 849, and the other cases hereinbefore mentioned, had not then been decided.

He states that there is nothing from which he could ascertain whether a reasonable time had elapsed, and merely remarked that the agreed statement would seem to indicate that a reasonable time had not expired. Furthermore, it does not appear from the agreed statement of facts whether the burden of proof rested upon the plaintiffs or the defendants.

Under these circumstances, justice and equity demand that the case should be remanded, for the purpose of enabling the parties to introduce testimony upon this issue.

STATE ex rel. MUTUAL BEN. LIFE INS. CO. v. McMASTER, Ins. Com'r.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 26, 1912.)

INSURANCE (§ 11*)—LIFE INSURANCE—CIRCULARS—RIGHT TO ISSUE.

Act Feb. 27, 1908 (25 St. at Large, p. 1110), which prohibits a life insurance company from issuing circulars misrepresenting the benefits promised by policies, etc., authorizes the Insurance Commissioner to refuse permission to circulate a pamphlet containing statements which unreasonably assume that there will be no decrease in dividends from a scale based on a particular year, during which there was a considerable increase in dividends over any previous year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

"To be officially reported."

Mandamus proceeding by the State, on relation of the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company, against Fitz Hugh McMaster, Insurance Commissioner. Petition dismissed.

T. Moultrie Mordecai, of Charleston, for petitioner. J. Fraser Lyon, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an application to the court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, for a writ of mandamus, requiring the respondent to grant to the petitioner permission to circulate a certain pamphlet, which the respondent had ruled was in violation of law. The pamphlet is entitled "The Accelerative Endowment Plan."

The respondent does not object to all the provisions thereof, but only to those on pages 14, 15, and 16, which are as follows:

Page 14: "The company does not publish any 'estimates' of future dividends. Such dividends are necessarily contingent upon existing business conditions, and their amount cannot be predicated or ascertained in advance. For purposes of illustration, however, it has computed the final results of various policies at certain ages, based upon the assumption that the company's present dividend scale shall be maintained without change and that all dividends upon the policies in question will be applied upon the accelerative endowment plan. Any change in the company's dividend scale will correspondingly affect the results shown on the following pages."

years. The time has come when, it is believed, the company is justified in adopting a new dividend scale, which will be applied to the dividends of 1912. The new scale results in a considerable increase in the dividends, on all but a few policies." Indeed, the written argument of the petitioner's attorneys shows that these allegations are admitted.

The respondent alleges "that the said pamphlet is wholly an estimate; that it is based upon the dividend scale of the year 1912, which is greater than that of any year since 1900; that representations and estimates contained in said pamphlet are not based upon the average earnings of the petitioner, or upon the said company's experience for a number of years, sufficient to enable it to state what will be the amount of dividends and other benefits which will be received by policy holders in future years, or the value of the policies at any definite time in the future." The respondent also alleges "that it is contrary to the public interest to allow the petitioner to circulate the pamphlet referred to in the petition, and that said pamphlet is misleading to the public."

As a part of his return, the respondent relied upon a circular letter, issued by the president of the petitioner to its agents November 25, 1911, which contains the following statements: "The company's present dividend scale, with certain modifications, which were first made applicable to the dividends of 1910, was adopted for the dividends of 1900, and has accordingly been in use 12

The act of 1912 (page 768) provides "that any order, ruling or decision of the Insurance Commissioner, in all matters either of law or discretion, within the jurisdiction of his department, shall be subject to review by certiorari or mandamus proceedings, before any circuit judge or justice of the Supreme Court, which may be held at chambers or in open court, upon thirty days notice to the Insurance Commissioner."

The act of 1910 (page 772) contains the provision that, "before granting a certificate of authority, to do business in this state, to any company, the Insurance Commissioner shall be satisfied, by proper evidence, that such applicant for license is duly qualified to do business under the laws of this state; that it is safe and solvent; that its dealings are fair and equitable; and that it conducts its business in a manner not contrary to the public interests."

The act of 1908 (page 1110) provides that "no life insurance company doing business in this state, and no officer, director or agent thereof, shall issue or circulate, or cause or permit to be issued or circulated, any estimate, illustration, circular, or statement of any sort, misrepresenting the terms of any policy issued by it, or the benefits or advantages promised thereby, or the dividends or shares or surplus to be received thereon, or shall use any name or title of any policy or class of policies, misrepresenting the nature thereof."

The question raised by the pleadings is whether the petitioner is issuing or circulating an estimate, illustration, circular, or statement misrepresenting the benefits or advantages promised by the policy, or the dividends or shares of surplus to be received thereon.

The petitioner's attorneys, in their written argument, say: "The statements made in the leaflet complained of are based entirely and solely upon data which the Commissioner of South Carolina requires the company to file with him as a part of its annual return, and such data is a part of the public records of his office." The proposition for which the petitioner contends is not tenable, for the reason that the statement in the circular is based, not only upon the scale of dividends for the year 1912, but upon the assumption that there will not be a decrease in the scale of dividends during the two periods mentioned in the circular, to wit, 27 and 37 years. This assumption is unreasonable, and tends to mislead the public, for the reason that the scale of dividends is based upon a single year, and upon the further fact that the scale for that year resulted in a considerable increase in the dividends over any previous year.

The circular in question is in violation of the act of 1908, and the petition is therefore dismissed.

WOODS, HYDRICK, and WATTS, JJ., concur.

(32 S. C. 329)

RICHLAND COUNTY v. OWENS et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 26, 1912.)

1. ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 57*) — STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

By express provision of Act March 1, 1909 (26 St. at Large, p. 83), an instrument is entitled to record in the state when its execution is proved by affidavit before a foreign notary, who shall affix thereto his official seal within the state of his appointment; the requirement of Civ. Code 1902, § 595, that he accompany his seal with a certificate of his official character, being eliminated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Acknowledgment, Cent. Dig. § 264; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 370*)—ORIGINAL OF INSTRUMENT REQUIRED TO BE RECORDED.

By express provision of Civ. Code 1902, § 2897, production, on notice to the adversary, of the original of an instrument required to be recorded, is prima facie evidence of its execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1559, 1560, 1562-1578, 1592; Dec. Dig. § 370.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1171*)—HARMLESS ERROR.

Error in finding, in an action on a bond, certain small sums to have been improperly paid out, was harmless, where the amount in fact improperly paid out exceeded the amount of the bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4546-4554; Dec. Dig. § 1171.*]

4. OFFICERS (§ 129*)—MISFEASANCE — BREACH OF BOND.

Failure of an officer to obey the positive mandate of the statutes is misfeasance in office, and a breach of his bond that he shall well and truly perform the duties of his office as required by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 225, 226, 229-234; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 142*)—QUESTION FOR COURT OR JURY—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

The question of proximate cause, though ordinarily for the jury, is for the court, when the evidence is susceptible of only one reasonable inference.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 387; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

6. OFFICERS (§ 142*)—MISFEASANCE—LOSS OF FUNDS—PRESUMPTION.

When an officer pays out public funds without compliance with a mandatory statute, there is a presumption, which he is required to rebut, that his act was the direct cause of the loss of such funds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 253-255; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

7. COUNTIES (§ 98*)—SUPERVISOR — COUNTY FUNDS—LOSS.

The county supervisor, having left warrants signed in blank with the clerk of the county board, who filled them out and issued them to pay forged claims, is not excused under the doctrine of independent intervening cause, but is within the doctrine that, where an injury results from concurring causes, he who originates one of them is as responsible as if it had been the sole cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 141-143, 147; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

8. ESTOPPEL (§ 72*)—ACTS MAKING INJURY POSSIBLE—COUNTY SUPERVISOR — LOSS OF FUNDS.

Under the doctrine that, if one of two innocent persons must suffer by the fraud of another, he must bear the loss whose negligence makes the loss possible, the county supervisor, and consequently his bondsman, is liable to the county, where by his negligence in intrusting the clerk of the county board with warrants signed in blank, and failing thereafter to examine the stubs and scrutinize the claims paid therewith, he enables the clerk to issue them to pay forged claims.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 188; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

9. COUNTIES (§ 98*)—SUPERVISOR—WARRANT FOR FUNDS—"DRAW."

While, under the statute providing that the county supervisor shall "draw" his warrant, he need not personally write the whole warrant, or fill up the blank spaces, the word "draw" being used in the sense of "issue," yet it is his duty before signing them to examine the claims for payment of which they issued, and see that they are proper, and have been itemized, verified, and approved as required by statute, which duty he cannot delegate, except at the peril of himself and bondsman.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 141-143, 147; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2199-2200.]

10. COUNTIES (§ 166*)—FUNDS—WARRANTS—EVIDENCE.

That warrants drawn by the county supervisor were accompanied by the claims against the county for payment of which the warrants were issued is no evidence that the amounts paid out on the warrants were for services or materials furnished the county where the accounts were not itemized and verified as required by the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 259; Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 971*)—REVIEW — DISCRETION—QUALIFICATION OF EXPERTS.

The decision of the preliminary question of qualification of a witness as an expert is one for the trial judge, not to be interfered with, unless manifestly erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3852-3857; Dec. Dig. § 971.*]

12. EVIDENCE (§ 501*)—OPINIONS — HAND-WRITING.

One having stated the facts on which his opinion that claims were forgeries was based, his testimony was admissible, though he was not a handwriting expert.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2292-2305; Dec. Dig. § 501.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the County of Richland against Samuel H. Owens and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 86 S. C. 571, 68 S. E. 753.

Green & Green, R. H. Welch, and W. H. Townsend, all of Columbia, for appellants. W. Hampton Cobb, Thomas & Lumpkin, and D. W. Robinson, all of Columbia, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. The complaint sets up three causes of action on three official bonds, given by the defendant Owens, as supervisor of Richland county, for three consecutive terms of office, of two years each. The condition of each bond is that Owens, as supervisor, shall well and truly perform the duties of his office, as required by law.

[1, 2] Copies of the bonds, certified by the clerk of the court and register of mesne conveyances, in whose office the originals had been recorded, as required by law, and also the originals, which were produced by the state treasurer, who was the legal custodian of them, were properly admitted in evidence. Section 595, vol. 1, Code 1902, provides that copies of official bonds "so certified shall be good and sufficient evidence in all suits to be instituted in any court of this state." The surety company contends that the bonds could not have been legally recorded, and therefore that the certificate of their record was illegal, because the bonds were executed by the surety company outside the limits of the state, and proof of their execution by the corporation was taken before a foreign notary, whose official seal was not accompanied by a certificate of a clerk of a court of record of the county in which the affidavit was taken as to his official character, as required by section 948, vol. 1, Code 1902. Evidently this appellant overlooked the fact that section 948 was amended (26 Stat. 83) so as to dispense with the necessity of such a certificate, and so as to make the official seal of a foreign notary, affixed within the state of his appointment, a sufficient authentication of his signature, residence, and official character; and the act was made to apply to and validate the probate of all instruments previously executed according to its provisions, whether the same were then recorded or not. Section 2897, vol. 1, Code 1902, as amended (23 Stat. 1073), affords authority for the introduction of the originals, the respondent having given the notice required. Under that section, the production of the original bonds was prima facie evidence of their execution.

The complaint alleges numerous breaches of the condition of each of the bonds, resulting in loss to the county; but it will be necessary to mention only those upon which the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff. They were in substance, as follows: (1) That Owens, as supervisor, issued warrants, in payment of claims against the county for labor and materials, which were not itemized and verified as required by law, and without proper scrutiny thereof. (2) That he issued warrants in payment of an extra salary or allowance to C. M. Douglas, as clerk of the county board of commissioners, in violation of law. (3) That he signed warrants in blank, and left them with C. M. Douglas, who filled them up and issued them in payment of false, fictitious, and fraudulent claims, having forged thereon the signatures of the necessary number of the members of the county board of commissioners.

Each of these breaches was proved by undisputed evidence. It cannot be denied that, in the particulars alleged, the supervisor violated the positive mandate of the statutes. The amount of the claims so paid was proved by production of the warrants and the claims. Under the first cause of action, they amounted to $1,592.32; under the second, to $8,793.33; and, under the third, to $6,044.36. But as the recovery against the surety could not exceed the penalty of each bond, which was only $5,000, the court directed the verdict for only $11,592.32, being the full amount proved under the first cause of action and $5,000 under each of the others.

[3] In this connection, we dispose of the exceptions which complain of two slight errors in adding into the amounts, found to have been improperly paid out under the second and third causes of action, the sums of $34.80 and $30, respectively. It will be seen, from the figures above stated, that these errors were harmless, because the county was entitled to recover, under each of those causes of action, a much greater amount than the items in question in excess of the amount for which the verdict was directed, which was only $5,000 in each case.

[4] Section 806, vol. 1, Code 1902, is in part as follows: "No accounts shall be audited and ordered to be paid by the county board of commissioners for any labor performed, fees, services, disbursements, or any other matter, unless it shall be made out in items and accompanied with an affidavit attached thereto, and made by the officer or person presenting or claiming the same, that the said items are correct, and that the labor, fees, disbursements, services or other matters charged therein have been in fact done, made, rendered or are due, and that no part of the same has been paid or satisfied."

Section 814, vol. 1, Code 1902, is as follows: "No member of the county board of commissioners shall vote for an extra allowance to any person who is paid by salary, nor shall the treasurer of said county knowingly pay to any such person any extra allowance." By section 763 the salary of the clerk of the county board of commissioners was fixed at $500.

Sections 806 and 814, above quoted, are mandatory, and the supervisor was a member of the county board of commissioners, and its chairman. Section 758, vol. 1, Code 1902. The requirement that claims of the kind mentioned shall be itemized and verified is jurisdictional, and payment thereof without compliance with the positive mandate of the statute is void, and an illegal disbursement of the public funds. Bank v. Goodwin, 81 S. C. 419, 62 S. E. 1100.

It is perfectly immaterial whether we say that the failure on the part of a public official to obey the positive mandate of the statutes is negligence per se or not. It is that and more; but it is enough to say that it is a violation of the law and misfeasance in office. No officer of the law should be allowed to violate the laws enacted for his guidance, without being held responsible for injurious consequences. Nor can his bondsmen escape, because, on the premise stated, it cannot be said that he has well and truly performed the duties of his office, as required by law. State v. Moses, 18 S. C. 372; State v. Assmann, 46 S. C. 562, 24 S. E. 673.

[5] Appellants contend that it was error, however, to direct the verdict, because it was the province of the jury to decide whether the supervisor's violation of the law was the proximate cause of the loss to the county. Ordinarily, the question of the proximate cause is for the jury. But, when the evidence is susceptible of only one reasonable inference, it is for the court. In this case, reasonable men could not differ.

[6] But, moreover, when a public officer pays out public funds without compliance with the terms of a mandatory statute, the law will presume that his act is the direct cause of the loss of such funds, and the burden is upon him to rebut the presumption, and prove that, notwithstanding his violation of the law, no loss resulted. Analogous in principle is the holding that, when a statute, requiring signals to be given by railroad engines approaching highway crossings, is violated, and injury results, it will be presumed it was caused by the failure to give the signals. On the first appeal in this case, it was held that, if an officer so negligently discharges the duties of his office that loss results, his bond is liable. 86 S. C. 571, 68 S. E. 753.

[7] The doctrine of an independent intervening cause, in the criminal act of C. M. Douglas, in issuing warrants to pay the forged claims cannot avail the defendants. Where an injury results from concurring causes, he who originates one of them is as responsible as if it had been the sole cause. When the defendant, Owens, left warrants signed in blank with Douglas, he originated one of the concurring causes of the loss by means of the forged claims.

[8] Again, if one of two innocent persons must suffer by the fraud of another, he must bear the loss whose negligence makes the fraud possible. Since the defendant Owens, by his negligence in intrusting Douglas with warrants signed in blank, and his failure thereafter to examine the stubs and scrutinize the claims which were paid with such warrants, enabled Douglas to commit the frauds, his bond is liable for the loss caused thereby. The evidence warrants no other reasonable conclusion than that his negligence was at least a proximate concurring cause of the loss resulting from the forged claims.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to follow the learned counsel in their discussion of the doctrine of independent intervening causes, and also the question whether Douglas was, under the statute, an agent or subordinate of the supervisor, or an independent officer, for whose acts the defendant Owens should not be held responsible. Those would have been vital questions, if the negligence of Owens and his violation of the mandates of the law had not put it in the power of Douglas to commit the forgeries, which would have been almost, if not quite, impossible, but for the negligence of the supervisor and his disobedience of the law.

[9] We cannot sustain the position taken by counsel for respondent, and sustained in the court below, that, when the statute says, "The supervisor shall draw his warrant," it means that he must, with his own hand, perform the clerical work of writing the whole warrant, or filling up the blank spaces. The word "draw" is used in the sense of "issue." There was no impropriety or violation of the law in allowing the clerk to write the body of the warrants or fill the blank spaces. But it was the duty of the supervisor, before signing them, to examine the claims and see that they were proper, and that they had been properly itemized and verified, and approved by the county board of commissioners, because the statute requires this to be done before a warrant can be legally issued. This duty the supervisor could not delegate, except at his peril and that of the surety on his official bond. But the error was harmless, because the verdict was rightly directed on other grounds.

[10] Appellants contend that the warrants were accompanied by the claims, which afford some evidence that the amounts paid out were for some services rendered or materials furnished to the county, and therefore the jury should have been allowed to decide how much benefit the county received. As the claims were not itemized and verified, as required by law, they could not be legal evidence, either directly or inferentially, that the county had received any benefit from the money paid out on them. As we have seen, payment of such claims was illegal, and the illegal disbursement of public funds raises a presumption of loss, and not an inference of benefit, to the public.

[11, 12] The decision of the preliminary question whether a witness is qualified to testify as an expert must necessarily be left to the discretion of the trial judge, and this court will not interfere with his decision, unless it is manifestly erroneous. We see no error in allowing Mr. C. H. Barron to testify that, in his opinion, certain claims were forgeries. Besides, he stated the facts upon which his opinion was based, and therefore his testimony would have been admissible, if he had not been an expert in handwriting. Moreover, all the claims of that class for which the verdict was directed were either admitted by defendants' counsel to be forgeries, or proved to be such by undisputed evidence.

CABLE PIANO CO. v. DUNCAN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 4, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 957*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

Though plaintiff's affidavit, on motion to open default on a counterclaim, tended strongly to explain and excuse his failure to observe and reply to the counterclaim, the order of denial will not be reversed; the showing not so conclusively proving due diligence or excusable neglect as to warrant holding that there was an abuse of discretion.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 126*)—DEFAULT—PROOF OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

The damages set up in a counterclaim not being liquidated, they depending on proof of a guaranty, of defects, and, if any, of their extent, it is error to grant a judgment thereon, on default, for the amount demanded, without such proof.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by the Cable Piano Company against John T. Duncan. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

James H. Hammond, of Columbia, for appellant. McLaughlin & Smith, of Columbia, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This action of claim and delivery was brought to recover possession of a Kingsbury piano, or $750, its value, $150 damages, and $50 attorney's fees. The allegation of the complaint is that the defendant bought the piano for $750, giving the plaintiff as part payment another piano, valued at $250, and executing a mortgage for the remainder of the purchase; that the defendant has paid $20 on the mortgage, but has defaulted in failing to pay the remainder of the mortgage at maturity. The defendant answered the complaint, alleging that the Kingsbury piano was so defective that he demanded a rescission of the sale and a return of his piano and the $20 paid on the purchase price, that the plaintiff refused to comply with the demand, and that the plaintiff is indebted to him in the sum of $270 and interest. The defendant further set up a counterclaim for $270 and interest, alleging an express guaranty by the plaintiff that the Kingsbury piano was a perfect instrument, and the failure of the guaranty, in that the instrument was defective and unsatisfactory, and was not worth the amount charged, because of its defects and failure to give satisfaction. The defendant further alleges, in stating his counterclaim, that the plaintiff is in possession of both pianos.

[1] The plaintiff having failed to reply to the counterclaim within 20 days, the defendant gave notice that he would move for judgment thereon. Plaintiff's counsel then served a written notice that on the affidavits attached and the proposed reply he would move to open the default, with leave to reply, on the ground of excusable neglect in failing to plead to the counterclaim. Upon hearing the motion the circuit judge refused to open the default, and ordered that judgment be entered in favor of the defendant on his counterclaim for the amount therein demanded, without submitting the matter to the jury or requiring any proof whatever. The exception alleging an abuse of discretion in refusal to open the default and allow the plaintiff to reply to the counterclaim cannot be sustained. It is true that the affidavits submitted by plaintiff's counsel tended strongly to explain and excuse his failure to observe that a counterclaim was set up and his consequent failure to serve a reply to it; but the showing did not so conclusively prove due diligence or excusable neglect as to warrant this court in holding that there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the circuit judge in refusing the motion.

[2] As to the second point made by the exceptions, we think the circuit judge was clearly in error in granting a judgment on the counterclaim without requiring evidence and the verdict of a jury thereon. The damages set up in the counterclaim were not liquidated, for they depended on proof of a guaranty, set up, of defects in the piano, and the extent of the defects, if they existed. It was therefore necessary for the defendant to make proof before the jury of the guaranty, of the defects, and their extent, and perhaps other facts bearing on the validity and extent of his claim. The precise point has been recently decided in Gadsden v. Home Fertilizer & Chemical Co., 89 S. C. 483, 72 S. E. 15.

The point was made in the argument that the act of 1909 (26 St. 161), providing for counterclaims in actions for the recovery of personal property, does not contemplate a separate judgment on the counterclaim, but that the counterclaim should be considered in the trial of the right to the possession of the property, and that one verdict should embrace and decide all issues. There are strong reasons for this view of the statute; but the exceptions do not cover the point, and we express no opinion on it.

Connecting carriers, being by Act May 13, 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 1), made agents of each other in case of an intrastate shipment, so that the terminal carrier is estopped to deny, as against the consignee, receipt by the initial carrier of all the goods for which it issued a bill of lading, proof that the terminal carrier did not receive part of such goods does not relieve it of liability to the consignee for non-delivery thereof.

Gary, C. J., and Watts, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Clarendon County; H. F. Rice, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Ferdinand Daughty against the Northwestern Railroad Company of South Carolina. An order of a magistrate granting defendant a new trial was affirmed by the circuit court, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with instructions.

J. J. Cantey, of Summerton, for appellant. Purdy & O'Bryan and John Wilson, all of Sumter, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. On April 30, 1911, the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company issued its bill of lading to S. Hirschman & Son, at Charleston, S. C., covering eight sacks of corn consigned to plaintiff at Summerton, S. C. The defendant delivered only seven sacks, and plaintiff filed his claim with defendant's agent at Summerton for $1.70, the value of the undelivered sack. The claim was not paid within 30 days, and plaintiff sued in magistrate's court and recovered judgment for $1.70, the value of the missing sack, and for the penalty of $50 imposed by the act of 1910 (26 Stat. 719) for the failure to pay the claim within 30 days. On defendant's motion, the magistrate granted a new trial, and, in his report to the circuit court, on appeal from his order, stated, as his reason therefor, that he was "impressed with the assurance that the defendant could show that the goods referred to as lost never came in its possession." The circuit court upheld the magistrate's order granting a new trial, and plaintiff appeals to this court.

[1] The statute approved May 13, 1903 (24 Stat. 1), makes connecting carriers the agents of each other. Therefore proof that the defendant never received the undelivered sack could not affect its liability to plaintiff (Venning v. Railroad Co., 78 S. C. 42, 58 S. E. 983, 12 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1217, 125 Am. St. Rep. 768; Smith v. Railway, 89 S. C. 415, 71 S. E. 989), and, notwithstanding it should show on a new trial, "that the goods referred to as lost never came in its possession," the court would, nevertheless, be compelled to give judgment against it, because, under the statute, the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, in issuing the bill of lading, was the agent of defendant, and, in an action by the consignee against defendant for loss of the goods, defendant is concluded by the bill of lading issued by its agent. Salley v. S. A. L., 76 S. C. 173, 56 S. E. 782; Thomas v. Railroad Co., 85 S. C. 537, 64 S. E. 220, 87 S. E. 908, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1177, 21 Ann. Cas. 223. It is clear, therefore, that under the statute law of the state, and the undisputed facts of this case, there can be but one result, and that a judgment for the plaintiff. It necessarily follows that the magistrate committed error of law, when he set aside the only judgment which can be rendered, within the law, and granted a new trial, and it is equally clear that the circuit court erred in sustaining that order.

[2] It is contended, however, that under the statute and decisions of this court the order is not appealable. Section 11 (D) of the Code of Procedure provides: "The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction for correction of errors of law, in law cases, and shall review upon appeal: * * * 2. An order affecting a substantial right made in an action, when such order in effect determines the action and prevents a judgment from which an appeal might be taken, or discontinue the action, and when such order grants or refuses a new trial. * * * Upon any appeal from an order granting a new trial on a case made, or on exceptions taken, if the Supreme Court shall determine that no error was committed in granting the new trial, it shall render judgment absolute upon the right of the appellant; and after the proceedings are remitted to the court from which the appeal was taken, an assessment of damages, or other proceedings to render the judgment effectual, may be then and there had in cases where such subsequent proceedings are requisite." The language of the Code above quoted makes it perfectly clear that this court must entertain appeals from orders which grant new trials, when they are based upon errors of law. The terms of the statute are mandatory—"shall review." It will be observed, however, that the jurisdiction to review such orders is confined to the correction of errors of law, in conformity to the limitation of the power of the court by the Constitution (section 4, art. 5), which confers jurisdiction "for the correction of errors at law, under such regulation as the General Assembly may by law prescribe." The court cannot, therefore, refuse to consider an appeal from an order granting a new trial, when it is based on error of law, without putting itself in the position of ignoring or violating a constitutional statute, which, in plain and unmistakable terms, makes an order granting a new trial appealable.

As above stated, the statute does not undertake to make an order granting a new trial appealable, when it is based upon questions of fact; and the court has correctly and consistently held, in cases too numerous to mention, that it has no power to review such orders. On the contrary, it has held, in a number of cases, that it can review orders granting new trials, when based upon error of law. Byrd v. Small, 2 S. C. 388, was the first case in which the provisions of the Constitution and statute above quoted were considered. In that case it was distinctly held that the power of the circuit court to grant or refuse new trials "is subject to the correction of this court, when his order granting or refusing a new trial involves a question of law." In Massey v. Adams, 3 S. C. 263, the appeal was from an order granting a new trial in an action of trespass to try title. The court entertained the appeal, and said: "The only question proper for our consideration is whether there was error of law in the order granting a new trial. If it was founded, either wholly or in part, on a conclusion from the facts contrary to that of the jury, then, according to the well-established principles governing the court in regard to appeals, in which propositions of law do not arise, we cannot interfere." Finding that questions of fact were involved, the order appealed from was sustained, and judgment absolute was given against appellant. In Caston v. Brooks, 14 S. C. 104, the appeal was from an order granting a new trial, but it was dismissed, because the appellant did not, in the notice of appeal, give his consent, as then required by the statute, that, if the order should be affirmed, judgment absolute should be rendered against him. The provision requiring such consent, as a condition of the appeal, was afterwards stricken from the statute by amendment. But the opinion distinctly recognizes the right to appeal from orders granting new trials where only questions of law are involved. The court said: "The clear object of demanding the assent of the appellant to a judgment absolute is to discourage appeals from orders granting new trials, except where the controversy is of such a nature that it may be finally disposed of upon the argument of pure questions of law in the appellate court. * * * The party allowed to appeal without restrictions from such orders has two chances, he may contend for his verdict, that has been set aside, in the appellate court, and, on being dismissed from that court without relief, may return to the circuit and have a trial de novo of the whole case. The decision of the appellate court may possibly settle nothing of importance to the case, as on a second trial the subject and ground of exception may be entirely eliminated from the case. When, however, the whole question is one of law, capable of being finally disposed of by the appellate court no such inconvenience arises." (Italics added.) In Ex parte Williams, In re Campbell v. Charleston, 7 S. C. 71, the court entertained an appeal from an order setting aside verdicts and granting new trials in certain cases, and reversed the order, because it was granted without notice to the plaintiffs in those cases.

Marshall v. Railway, 57 S. C. 138, 35 S. E. 497, is a case directly in point. That was an appeal from an order setting aside the verdict of a jury and granting a new trial. The order was based on an erroneous construction of the pleadings or for lack of evidence on a point not in issue—questions of law. The court, by Mr. Justice Jones, said (57 S. C. at page 138, 35 S. E. at page 497): "The appeal is from the order granting a new trial. The well-settled rule is that this court cannot review an order granting or refusing a new trial, except for error of law, as the court is without jurisdiction to review the judgment of the circuit court on questions of fact." Again (57 S. C. on page 141, 35 S. E. on page 498): "Inasmuch, then, as the circuit court based the granting of the new trial upon an erroneous construction of defendant's pleading, there was error of law. If the court had granted the new trial on his view of the evidence, and had concluded therefrom that the plaintiff had sustained the charge of negligence in the complaint, and that defendant had failed to sustain the defense of contributory negligence, we could not interfere, upon the rule stated at the beginning of this opinion. But this is not the case." The order was reversed and the case was remanded for judgment on the verdict. Epperson v. Stansill, 64 S. C. 485, 42 S. E. 426, is another case directly in point. In that case the circuit court granted a new trial on the ground that the jury had been erroneously instructed. On appeal, the order granting the new trial was reversed, because it was based on error of law; this court holding that the instruction given was correct. The authority of Epperson v. Stansill was recognized in the later case of Oil Co. v. Ice Co., 68 S. C. 52, 46 S. E. 720. In Lampley v. Railroad Co., 77 S. C. 319, 57 S. E. 1104, it was held that the order granting a new trial was not appealable, because the facts were involved, and the court could not, therefore, give judgment absolute upon the right of the appellant, if it should determine that no error was committed in granting the new trial. But the court distinctly held that such orders, based on error of law, were appealable, in the following language (77 S. C. at page 325, 57 S. E. at page 1106): "Applying this rule [that is, the rule that the act must be construed so that it will not conflict with the Constitution] to the act now under consideration [see 11 (D), subd. 2, above quoted], if we hold that it was intended to apply only to those cases in which the court has power to render final judgment, that is, cases involving questions of law only, then all difficulty disappears, and the court can easily perform the duty imposed upon it. A practical, as well as a legal, point of view, leads to the conclusion that such was the intention of the Legislature." The same principle was recognized in Kennedy v. Greenville, 78 S. C. 128, 58 S. E. 989.

As the granting of new trials is discretionary, unless it appears that the exercise of the discretion was controlled or influenced by error of law, this court held, in Pace v. Railroad Co., 83 S. C. 33, 64 S. E. 915, that an order of the circuit court reversing the judgment of a magistrate's court and granting a new trial, "on the ground that there was no testimony that the goods alleged to have been damaged were injured while in the possession of the defendant," was not appealable. While the circuit court might have rendered judgment against the plaintiff for lack of proof, it exercised the discretion, wisely vested in the court, to order a new trial, perhaps, in order that the plaintiff might have another opportunity to adduce the necessary evidence. In Des Champs v. Railroad Co., 83 S. C. 192, 65 S. E. 176, an order of the circuit court, affirming an order of the magistrate granting a new trial for after-discovered evidence, was held not appealable. The granting of new trials for after-discovered evidence usually involves issues of fact, whether the evidence was newly discovered, and whether due diligence was exercised to procure it, and it also rests in the discretion of the trial court, and the exercise of that discretion will not be reviewed, unless it was abused, or controlled by error of law. State v. Bradford, 87 S. C. 549, 70 S. E. 308. The case of Dixon v. Railway, 83 S. C. 393, 65 S. E. 351, is the only case which I have found in our Reports which holds that an order granting a new trial upon a purely legal question is not appealable. As that case is in direct conflict with the statute, and the numerous decisions of the court which have been cited above, and those which are cited below, it should be overruled.

[3] The doctrine of stare decisis should not stand in the way. That doctrine has no application, where there is a conflict in the decisions of the court. In that event the court is at liberty to adopt those decisions which are sound in principle and in accord with right and justice and the statute law, and overrule those which are contrary thereto. In the Dixon Case, the order of the circuit court granting a new trial was so clearly right that it would have been affirmed, on the reasoning of the circuit judge, which is set out in the report of the case, if the merits had been considered, and that fact, no doubt, influenced the members of this court to concur in the opinion dismissing the appeal, without giving much consideration to the ground upon which it was dismissed. The opinion merely states that "the order is not appealable," without assigning any reason for that conclusion, and cites the Lampley and Pace Cases, in both of which, as we have seen, the orders involved questions of fact, and, besides, they were orders grantable at the discretion of the trial court.

In Simmons v. Mason, 88 S. C. 350, 70 S. E. 898, this court refused to entertain an appeal from an order of the circuit court affirming the order of a magistrate granting a new trial. From a consideration of the opinion of this court, it might be inferred that the motion was made and granted on the ground of newly discovered evidence. But an examination of the record shows that such is not the case. The motion was based on affidavits, but nowhere in the record, either in the notice of the motion, the affidavits, the order of the magistrate granting the new trial, or the order of the circuit court affirming it, is there any intimation or suggestion that the matter set forth in the affidavits was not known to the defendants at the trial. In fact, it was on the affidavits of the defendants themselves, as to matters within their personal knowledge, that the motion was based, and they were both at the trial, but one of the defendants did not testify at the trial. It must have been, therefore, that the magistrate considered the affidavits merely as influencing or determining the exercise of his discretion, and, as it was a matter in his discretion, and also involving questions of fact as to the merits of the case, and as it was affirmed by the circuit court, of course, the order granting a new trial was not reviewable here. But the first intimation to be found in the record about after-discovered evidence is in the appellant's exceptions to this court. The case was, therefore, correctly decided, although the court does say, in broad terms, that it has been held "that an order of the circuit court granting a new trial is not appealable," and "the rule has been applied even when the new trial was granted on the construction of a written instrument—a purely legal question," citing Dixon v. Railway. But the following cases, decided after the Dixon Case, clearly recognize the right of appeal from orders granting new trials in cases where this court can give judgment absolute. Jones v. Woodside Mills, 83 S. C. 505, 65 S. E. 819; Barker v. Thomas, 85 S. C. 83, 67 S. E. 1; McKnight v. Dyson, 91 S. C. 337, 74 S. E. 753; Reynolds v. Deaton, 91 S. C. 454, 74 S. E. 985. Even the opinion of Mr. Justice Watts in this case recognizes the right of appeal in such cases; for he says: "An appeal from an order granting a new trial will not be entertained, except in a case in which judgment absolute might be rendered by this court." And this is such a case. When the law and the evidence in a case admit of but one judgment, the court must pronounce that judgment.

The statute evidently intended to give the right of appeal from some orders granting new trials, for it says so in plain and unmistakable language. But the Legislature, having in mind the unnecessary delay and inconvenience that would result from allowing an appeal in every case where a new trial is granted, and in order to discourage appeals from orders in which there was no error, and to penalize, as it were, such appeals, provided that, on appeal from an order granting a new trial, if this court should determine that no error was committed, it should give judgment absolute. But what of the case where error is committed? Can it be supposed that the Legislature was guilty of the absurdity of allowing an appeal from an order where no error is committed and denying it where error is committed? The statute is plain, and it meant that, when this court should determine that no error was committed, the appellant should have judgment absolute given upon his right by this court; but, if it should determine that error was committed in granting the new trial, it would correct the error by restoring the verdict or judgment set aside, as was done in Marshall v. Railway and Epperson v. Stansill.

It appearing that the new trial was granted, not an account of any dissatisfaction with the evidence, or on account of anything that could change the result, but solely through a misconception of the law applicable to the case, and it also appearing, from the facts proved and admitted, that judgment must eventually go against the defendant, the order appealed from is reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to the circuit court to reverse the order of the magistrate granting a new trial.

WOODS, and FRASER, JJ., concur.

WATTS, J. (dissenting). This is an appeal from an order of Hon. H. F. Rice, Circuit Judge, dismissing an appeal from magistrate court granting a new trial. The appeal will not be considered by this court, because an appeal from an order granting a new trial will not be entertained, except in a case in which judgment absolute might be rendered by this court. McKnight v. Dyson, 91 S. C. 337, 74 S. E. 753, April 12, 1912; Reynolds v. Deaton, 91 S. C. 454, 74 S. E. 985, May 19, 1912.

For these reasons, I dissent.

OSBORNE v. FULLER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 26, 1912.)

USURY (§ 28*)—USURIOUS TRANSACTION.

Where defendant agreed to make advances to plaintiff by giving orders to merchants for goods, and, such an order having been filled, defendant paid the merchant the cash price, and charged to and collected of plaintiff the amount so paid and 20 per cent. additional, being the credit price, the transaction was usurious.

Watts, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by W. R. Osborne against A. P. Fuller. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. P. McGowan, of Laurens, for appellant. Irby & Sullivan, of Laurens, for respondent.

WOODS, J. In this action to recover $952.12, double the amount of alleged usurious interest collected from the plaintiff by the defendant, the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $231.50. The defendant appeals, assigning error in refusing a nonsuit, in giving certain instructions to the jury, and in refusing to order a new trial.

Osborne, the plaintiff, was a tenant of Fuller, the defendant, for the year 1910, cultivating a five-horse farm. Fuller paid the balances on mortgages due by Osborne, and agreed to make advances to him by giving written or verbal orders to merchants for goods. To secure himself, Fuller took a note and mortgage of personal property, including the crop, for $1,400, which it was supposed would cover the entire indebtedness. Fuller paid the merchants for the goods purchased on his orders, and charged and collected from Osborne the amount due and 20 per cent. additional. He testified that this charge was made in pursuance of his agreement with Osborne; but Osborne denied that he was to pay more than the cash price for the goods and 8 per cent. interest thereon. All other questions as to usury having been eliminated by the evidence, and the only substantial question left for the jury was whether this charge of 20 per cent. was usurious. The circuit judge refused to grant a nonsuit, and in effect instructed the jury that under the evidence the charge of 20 per cent. was usurious. When the transaction is stripped to its substance, the correctness of the instruction is made manifest. It is true that there is no limit to the price an owner of property may place on it, or to the difference he may choose to make between cash and credit. But there never was a moment in the transaction when Fuller was the owner of the goods which Osborne got from the merchants. To say that there was first a sale by the merchants to Fuller and a resale by Fuller to Osborne would be to substitute fiction for fact. The merchants did not deliver the goods to Fuller, but to Osborne, for his own use, and to be consumed by him. Fuller did nothing for Osborne but pay out money for his benefit, and Osborne received nothing from Fuller but the use of his money from the date of the advancement.

The case is much stronger against the defendant than Thompson v. Nesbit, 2 Rich. 73. There the plaintiff was the owner of the slave sold by him to the defendant, while here Fuller was not a merchant and had no goods to sell. The facts in that case are thus stated by the reporter: "The plaintiff asked $1,000 for the negro. The defendant was willing to purchase at that price, but could not pay the cash. The plaintiff was willing to give any time that the defendant wanted, if he could have the price increased by the addition to the $1,000 of 10 per cent. per annum until payment should be made. After consultation with several persons as to the best means of carrying out their bargain so as to steer clear of usury, it was agreed that the defendant should fix the time, and the plaintiff the price. The defendant said he must have three years; the plaintiff said he must then have $300 more. Whereupon the bill of sale was drawn, expressing the consideration to be $1,000, and the note was drawn in the following words: 'Three years after date I promise to pay H. Thompson, or bearer, thirteen hundred dollars, to be paid at such times as I please, and to deduct 10 per cent. per annum off of the amount paid at each payment. 11th November, 1839. Samuel Nesbit.' The intention was that 10 per cent. per annum should be added to each payment from the time it was made, until the note became due, so that the defendant should have the right of paying as he pleased within the three years, and upon every payment should have interest calculated in the same manner as it had been done on the $1,000."

The court, in holding that the transaction was usurious, says: "The effect of the agreement is precisely the same as if the note had been taken for $1,000, the price of the negro, with usury at 10 per cent. per annum. The artifice, by which the parties attempted to give the transaction the character of a sale at an enhanced price for the credit allowed, is too plain to escape observation. The price of the negro was not enhanced otherwise than by the exaction of usurious interest while it remained unpaid. The true principal of the note was the sum expressed in the bill of sale."

As in that case the true consideration of the note was the value of the negro, fixed at the time of the sale at $1,000, so in this case the true and only consideration—the only thing of value—which passed from Fuller to Osborne was the payment of money to another for the goods obtained by Osborne. The law will not permit evasions of the usury law by excessive charge for the use of money under the disguise of an increased price for credit in the sale of property. Bank v. Jackson, 43 S. C. 86, 20 S. E. 786; Milford v. Milford, 67 S. C. 553, 46 S. E. 479; Pope v. Marshall, 78 Ga. 635, 4 S. E. 118. In this case there was not even the disguise of a sale from the defendant to the plaintiff, for the defendant was not the owner of the goods, but merely advanced the money to pay for goods sold by others. Under facts almost exactly the same, involving the sale of a mule, the Supreme Court of Alabama held that the transaction was an advance of the purchase money of $102.50, and not a purchase by the person paying the price and a resale at $130, and that it was, therefore, usurious. Meyer et al. v. Cook, 85 Ala. 417, 5 South. 147.

The point is made in the exceptions that the circuit judge allowed the action to be enlarged into an action for the adjudgment of all the questions, including interest, arising in the accounts between Fuller and Osborne. We think the point too technical, for it seems clear from the record that the issue of usury could not have been fairly tried without an examination and adjudgment of interest of the entire account.

Affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and HYDRICK and FRASER, JJ., concur.

WATTS, J. (dissenting). I think judgment should be reversed, and new trial granted, for the reason, in my opinion, there was no usury in the transaction. Fuller only charged Osborne the credit price for goods and merchandise, and for this reason I dissent.

STATE v. WALDRON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
June 13, 1912.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 192*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—CIRCUMSTANCES PRECEDING ACT.

When self defense is relied on and there is some evidence that deceased was the aggressor, evidence of his recent act or acts of violence even towards third persons though uncommunicated to defendant, and so connected in time, place and circumstance with the homicide as to likely characterize deceased's conduct towards defendant, ought to be admitted to show the quo animo, for the question then is what deceased probably did, not what defendant thought he was going to do.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 415; Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 308*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DEGREE OF OFFENSE.

Upon principles enunciated in State v. Gravely, 66 W. Va. 375, 66 S. E. 503, State v. Taylor, 57 W. Va. 228, 50 S. E. 247, and State v. Clifford, 59 W. Va. 1, 52 S. E. 981, an instruction that homicide proved or admitted is presumed to be murder in the second degree is not wholly inapplicable, though self defense be relied on and the facts and circumstances shown in evidence tend to justify the killing, and to reduce the offense to one of lower degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 642-647; Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 823*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

The general proposition contained in an instruction that the law of self defense is the law of necessity, not limiting it to apparent necessity, but followed by the statement that unless the prisoner acted in the honest belief that it was then and there necessary to take the life of deceased in order to save his own life or free himself from some great bodily harm, he was not justified therein, and if the jury believed defendant though previously assaulted, used more force than was reasonably necessary to repel the assault or shot or continued to shoot after necessity for so doing had ceased, they could not acquit him, is not erroneous, for as a whole the instruction does limit the law of necessity stated to apparent necessity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1992-1995, 3158; Dec. Dig. § 823.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

An instruction that where there is more than one assailant, the slayer has the right to act upon the hostile demonstration of one or all of them and to kill one or all if it reasonably appears to him that they are present for the purpose of acting together to take his life or do him some serious bodily injury, is not erroneously rejected where the same proposition is substantially covered in another instruction stated in terms more particularly appropriate to the concrete case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

Robinson and Williams, JJ., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

John M. Waldron was convicted of murder in the second degree, and brings error. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Wm. G. Conley, Lawson Worrell, and Greever & Gillespie, for plaintiff in error. Anderson, Strother & Hughes, Strother, Taylor & Taylor, W. P. Payne, Flanagan & Perry, and Sanders & Crockett, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. On an indictment for the murder of Ben Tate defendant was acquitted of murder in the first degree, but found guilty of murder in the second degree, and the judgment below was that he be confined in the penitentiary for the period of ten years.

The homicide, admitted, occurred on the night of January —, 1910, a Sunday night, in a brothel in Keystone, McDowell County. Defendant was a deputy United States Marshal, who at the request of White, town sergeant, had gone with him to this house to make an arrest for alleged illicit sales of intoxicating liquors. While waiting the return of White from the Mayor's office with warrants, defendant, who before White left to secure the warrants, had been invited on the outside of the house by Tate and his companion Gillespie, patrons of the house, and had declined, was on their coming out of the room of the mistress of this house, enticed by them into an adjoining room, where, almost instantly, the door being shut by one of them, the difficulty occurred, resulting not only in the death of Tate, but of Gillespie also, from pistol shots fired by defendant.

Defendant was the only living witness as to what actually took place in the room where the homicide occurred. He admitted the killing, but on his trial relied on self defense.

The controversy here is reduced to a few questions relating to the rejection of certain evidence proposed by the prisoner, and to the giving and rejecting of certain instructions to the jury.

[1] First, as to the rejected evidence. On the trial, the prisoner, to establish his theory of self defense, was permitted to and did prove by the testimony of White that after he and White entered the house, and asked for the girl Blackburn, reported to have sold the liquor to Walter Waldron and Trivitts, Madge Murray, the mistress of the house, came out of her room and inquired of them, "Why do you all have me charged with selling whiskey and beer to-day?" and that another woman, Jennie Belcher, interposing said: "Make them show you a United States warrant before you go;" that the Murray woman then walked to a bed in the room, and to where, as he supposed, Tate was sitting on a chair, and sat down on his lap, and said to him: "'Sweetheart, you are not going to let them take me, are you?' or something like that; and he said: 'No, not as long as we are here,' and he raised up and pushed her off of his lap." This witness also says, that when Tate got up he walked around to the foot of the bed and stopped, and that witness said to him, we won't have any trouble, we will get a warrant, that he would go down and see Hale, the mayor, and get him up there and pull the whole house; that Waldron and he then walked out in the dance hall, where he wrote a note, proposing to send Waldron for the warrants, but after writing it concluded to go himself, as he thought he could find the mayor quicker. Continuing this witness says: "Then Mr. Tate walked around on this side, and Gillespie on this side (indicating), and touched him (Waldron) on the shoulder, and said he wanted to see him on the outside. He told him that if they wanted to see him, see him in here, and 'I don't see what business you have on the outside.' Gillespie spoke up and said they wanted to see him on the outside." Waldron himself, corroborates White entirely as to what occurred up to the time White left the house to go for the warrants.

As to what occurred immediately afterwards, Waldron further swears, and no fact or witness materially contradicts him: "As soon as Mr. White left they all went over to Madge's room and left me alone in the dance hall. I was standing there and in a short time two fellows came out of Madge's room and come up to me and the big fellow says: 'Come over in the room where you can sit down; it's no use standing up,' and pointed to the room right out across the little hall. There was a light in there and I just walked over, followed him. He walked right on in. I was behind him. I heard the door shut, and just turned my head that way (indicating) and the smallest one had his back to the door and this big fellow struck me. * * * He knocked me down, I guess, the time he struck me. They both jumped on me and I caught on to the bed the best I could on it, then pulled myself up the best I could, trying to get my gun out all the time, shoved myself away from them," when he shot him, thinking he was in danger of being killed, or having great bodily harm done to him, his only reason for shooting.

In connection with this testimony and as further tending to show Tate and Gillespie were the aggressors, and establish his theory of self defense, the prisoner proposed, but was not permitted to prove, by two witnesses, Baxter and Hermanson, that but a few moments before the homicide, both Tate and Gillespie, in connection with two or three other men, were in a violent state of mind towards Hermanson; that but a few moments before White and Waldron entered the house Tate and Gillespie, as Baxter thought from their actions, acting under the influence of liquor, jumped on Hermanson, in aid of their lewd mistresses, and without other cause, beat him, while Hermanson was there waiting for two other women to come down stairs and pay him some money he claimed they owed him.

The attorney general and associate counsel justify the action of the court in excluding this evidence, not on the ground that it might not have influenced the verdict of the jury, but on the grounds, (a) that evidence of a single act of violence is not admissible to establish the turbulent and violent character of deceased; (b) that the conduct of Tate and Gillespie towards Hermanson was unknown to Waldron, and if for no other was inadmissible for this reason; and, (c) because the conduct of Tate and Gillespie constituted no part of the res gestæ, had no bearing upon or connection with the homicide, that there was no causal or even explanatory relation between that recent occurrence and the homicide.

In homicide cases, where the general character of the deceased for turbulence and violence is involved, the general rule, established by the weight of authority, no doubt is, that evidence of isolated facts or specific acts forming no part of the res gestæ, and in no way connected with defendant, will not be received in evidence. 21 Cyc. 910, and cases cited in notes. But when self defense is relied on, and where as in this case, there is evidence tending to show the deceased was the aggressor, the dangerous character of deceased may be shown by the facts and circumstances attending the homicide, and so connected with it as to constitute a part of the res gestæ. 21 Cyc. 909; 1 Wigmore on Ev., section 363; State v. Morrison, 49 W. Va. 210, 218, 38 S. E. 481; Harrison v. Com., 79 Va. 374, 52 Am. Rep. 634. Moreover, Mr. Wigmore, 1 Wigmore on Ev., section 198, citing numerous cases, says: "When the turbulent character of the deceased, in a prosecution for homicide, is relevant (under the principle of § 63, ante), there is no substantial reason against evidencing the character by particular instances of violent or quarrelsome conduct. Such instances may be very significant; their number can be controlled by the trial Court's discretion; and the prohibitory considerations applicable to an accused's character, (ante, § 194) have here little or no force." And whether in such cases as the one at bar there is necessity of showing defendant's knowledge of deceased's character, this writer, in section 63, referred to, says: "The reason for the hesitation, once observable in many Courts, in recognizing this sort of evidence, and the source of much confusion upon the subject, was the frequent failure to distinguish this use of the deceased's character from another use, perfectly well-settled, but subject to a peculiar limitation not here necessary,—the use of communicated character to show the fact and the reasonableness of the defendant's apprehension of violence (post, § 246). As the purpose there is to show defendant's state of mind, it is obvious that the deceased's character, as affecting the defendant's apprehensions, must have become known to him; i. e. proof of the character must indispensably be accompanied by proof of its communication to the defendant; else it is irrelevant. In the present use, this additional element of communication is unnecessary; for the question is what the deceased probably did, not what the defendant probably thought the deceased was going to do. The inquiry is one of objective occurrence, not of subjective belief. This distinction, however, was at first not always appreciated by the Courts, nor clearly laid before them by counsel. Hence, a ruling excluding the present use of the evidence cannot always be taken, as a repudiation of the present principle, but is often merely a ruling that the offer does not satisfy the doctrine of communicated character; and such a Court may in future recognize the present doctrine if the distinction is pressed upon it. Apart from a few such precedents, the principle is now generally accepted." This writer, same volume, section 248, substantially repudiates the doctrine of some decisions, that particular acts of violence if known to defendant ought not to be received in evidence, on the question of defendant's belief of impending danger. "The fact," says he, "that the circumstance creating apprehension is a single act or series of acts, instead of a general character, does not necessarily destroy its capacity to create apprehension. Nor does its distance in time from the moment of the affray necessarily have that effect. * * * Certainly all analogies of the law (apart from the common sense of the situation) favor such evidence; for if particular vicious acts of an animal are relevant to show that its owner was warned of its viciousness (post, § 251), and if particular misconduct of an employee is relevant to show that his employer was warned of his incompetency (post, § 250), then particular deeds of unscrupulous violence may well be deemed relevant to show an apprehension of violence from such a person. The true solution is to exercise a discretion, and to admit such facts when common sense tells us that they could legitimately affect a defendant's apprehensions. The state of the law in more recent times has come on the whole to favor the admissibility of such facts."

We agree with this writer that reason, if not the weight of judicial decision, favors the admissibility in evidence of such facts, when the question is the knowledge or belief of the defendant in the dangerous character of deceased, and the necessity for acting in self defense. And on parity of reasoning where self defense is relied on and there is some evidence that deceased was the aggressor, and the question is what the deceased probably did do, his quo animo, as evidenced by his recent acts of turbulence even towards a third person, so connected in time, place and circumstance with the homicide, as to likely characterize the deceased's conduct towards the defendant ought, on the principles stated by this writer in said section 63, to be received in evidence, for the question then is what deceased probably did, not what defendant probably thought deceased was going to do.

The application of this distinction, so often overlooked, and so clearly stated by Mr. Wigmore, we think well recognized by other writers, and in some leading cases, now to be referred to. In 6 Ency. of Ev. 783, the rule we approve is stated thus: "The violent conduct of the deceased shortly preceding the homicide, though in the absence of and unknown to the accused, is admissible to show his condition of mind and characterize his conduct during the fatal difficulty and by some courts is regarded as part of the res gestæ." We do not think the rule of res gestæ should be so limited in its scope as counsel for the State would limit it. We find the rule applicable in homicide cases thus comprehensively stated in 21 Cyc. 924: "The res gestæ in cases of homicide are the surrounding facts of the transaction, explanatory of the act, showing motive for acting, or standing in a causal relation to the crime. The res gestæ consist of circumstances or declarations made admissible in evidence by reason of their connection with the particular fact under investigation, and the test is, whether the fact or circumstance put in evidence is so connected with the main fact under consideration as to illustrate its character, to further its object, or to form in conjunction with it one continuous transaction. They are proper to be submitted to the jury provided they can be established by competent means, sanctioned by the law, and afford any fair presumption or inference as to the question in dispute."

In People v. Lilly, 38 Mich. 270, the deceased's behavior on the way to the scene of the homicide was held admissible to corroborate the evidence as to his violent conduct during the conflict. In State v. Beird, 118 Iowa, 474, 92 N. W. 694, evidence that the deceased on the night of the homicide, while intoxicated, and going from one saloon to another shortly preceding the homicide, made an assault upon a third person, was held improperly excluded, on the ground that it indicated "a state of mind continuing up to the time of the affray, and which would be likely, in ordinary human experience, to lead to aggression and combativeness at that time." In the Virginia case of Muscoe v. Commonwealth, 87 Va. 460, 464, 12 S. E. 790, 792, the trial court admitted a witness to testify that "just before sundown" upon the evening of the day of the homicide, as he was parting with him the person said: "Buster, I feel hot; I feel like I could shoot a man and make him jump so high before he touches the ground" (indicating the height by his hand), and "Don't tell me to take care of myself. Tell the people that I pass by to take care of themselves." The appellate court responding to the point of error made against the admissibility of this evidence, said: "We are of opinion that this testimony was properly admitted. Coming, as it did, almost immediately before the killing, it shed light upon the condition of the prisoner. It may not be admissible strictly as evidence of intention or of threats, but it certainly shows that the prisoner was in a reckless frame of mind and ready to use the weapon with which he was armed upon none or the most trifling provocation." Citing Whart. Cr. Ev. section 756; Hopkins v. Com., 50 Pa. 9, 88 Am. Dec. 518, and Burke v. State, 71 Ala. 377. In State v.

McIver, 125 N. C. 645, 34 S. E. 439, the court said: "The prisoner also proposed to ask the witness if the deceased did not exhibit this violent and vicious temper towards another of his hands that morning, and beat him unmercifully. This was also excluded. In this we think there was error." In our own case of State v. Abbott, 8 W. Va. 741, it is said: "It is a great mistake to suppose that the res gestæ, in the legal sense, is, in a case of murder, confined to the fact of thrusting the knife into the body, and thereby depriving of life. The res gestæ is the murder, and the murder is made up of the homicide and the intent with which it was committed. Actions, therefore, which seem to demonstrate the quo animo are a part of the res gestæ, and words which are a part of these actions are admissible." A very pertinent case is Sneed v. Territory, 16 Okl. 641, 86 Pac. 70, 8 Ann. Cas. 354, in which the court holds, that where, on the trial of an indictment for murder, the defendant claimed to have shot the deceased in self defense and when the latter was intoxicated, and it appeared from the evidence that there was no eye witness to the affray other than the defendant, that the parties were on friendly terms up to the very day of the difficulty, and that, without provocation, one committed an uncalled for and violent attack upon the other, that it was error to exclude testimony that on the evening of the homicide the deceased had a difficulty with another person, which grew out of an invitation on the part of the deceased to drink with him, and that when his invitation was refused, deceased attempted to shoot such person.

Many other cases cited in support of this rule, state and federal, fully support our view. In our case of State v. Sheppard, 49 W. Va. 594, 39 S. E. 681, it is said: "All acts and conduct of the deceased previous to the fatal encounter may be shown in evidence, which form a part of the res gestæ, or which in any manner tend to shed light upon the question of motive or malice, or of legal provocation, or upon the question whether the defendant committed the homicide." And in Maier v. People, 10 Mich. 212, 81 Am. Dec. 781, 789, it is said: "No other cause being shown for the assault, the proposed evidence, if given, could have left no reasonable doubt that it was, in fact, committed in consequence of the alleged provocation, whether sufficient or not; and all the facts constituting the provocation, or which led to the assault, being thus closely connected, and following each other in quick succession, and the assault itself in which they resulted, constituted together but one entire transaction. The circumstances which, in fact, led to the assault, were a part of the res gestæ, which the jury were entitled to have before them to show what was the real nature of the act, the quo animo, state of mind, and intention with which it was done." In State v. Bright, 89 S. C. 228, 71 S. E. 821, the first point of the syllabus is: "Acts of decedent done immediately before the homicide to show his mental attitude are admissible on the issue of self-defense." And in McAnear v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 518, 522, 67 S. W. 117, 119, that Court says: "We know of no rule of law authorizing the exclusion of any evidence that makes manifest the guilt of a defendant, or that tends in the remotest degree to exculpate him."

It seems quite unnatural and contrary to human experience that a public officer, circumstanced as Waldron was, and so far as the evidence discloses, with no apparent motive other than self defense, or in the heat of passion due to some sudden affray, should have shot down two men. If the former and justifiable, no crime was committed; if the latter, the crime was manslaughter, not murder in the second degree.

On the record now presented we think the evidence of Hermanson and Baxter, excluded, should have been admitted, and that the court below erred in rejecting it, entitling the prisoner to a new trial.

The point is made, that as the prisoner admitted the killing, and as the law presumes all murder to be murder in the second degree, putting the burden of showing justifiable homicide on defendant, if the excluded evidence had been admitted, in connection with all the other evidence, the presumption of guilt would not have been overcome thereby. In answer we may say that there is always a presumption of malice from the use of a deadly weapon; but this rule is applicable only when nothing is offered in explanation, such as self defense and the like. 2 Chamberlayne, Mod. Law of Ev., section 1155, citing among other cases, in note, our case of State v. Clark, 51 W. Va. 457, 41 S. E. 204. And "the fact that the alleged self defense was effected by the use of a greatly superior weapon is by no means conclusive of malice." People v. Barry, 31 Cal. 357, cited in same note. In Perkins v. State, 124 Ga. 6, 52 S. E. 17, it is held that if the accused offers evidence explanatory of the homicide admitted, no presumption of malice arises. The latter proposition, however, according to our cases, would not preclude an instruction on the presumption of murder, the homicide being proven.

[2] Finally, as to the instructions. Exceptions were taken to the giving of all of the State's instructions, and to the rejection of certain of the defendant's instructions. We have considered all these exceptions; but find little merit in any of them. Most of them propound legal principles, applicable to the evidence, many times ruled upon, and we will not undertake to discuss any of them except State's instructions numbered one and three, given, and defendant's instruction numbered five, rejected.

The first criticism of State's instructions numbered one and three, is that the proposition common to both, that homicide proved, or admitted, is presumed to be murder in the second degree, is inapplicable where self defense is relied on, or where the facts and circumstances shown in evidence tend to justify the killing, or reduce the offense to one of lower degree. There is no merit in this criticism. The point is fully covered by prior decisions, which need only be referred to. State v. Gravely, 68 W. Va. 375, 66 S. E. 503; State v. Taylor, 57 W. Va. 228, 50 S. E. 247; State v. Clifford, 59 W. Va. 1, 52 S. E. 981.

[3] An additional criticism of State's instruction number three is, that it tells the jury that the law of self defense is the law of necessity, not limiting it, as in State's instruction number twelve, given, to apparent necessity. But this instruction does not stop with this general declaration of principle. It precedes a statement of the law of self defense, which tells the jury that unless the prisoner acted on the honest belief that it was then and there necessary to take the life of deceased in order to save his own life, or free himself from some great bodily harm, he was not justified therein, and that if the jury believed that defendant, though previously assaulted, used more force than was reasonably necessary to repel the assault, or shot or continued to shoot after the necessity for so doing had ceased, they could not acquit him. We see nothing in this statement of the law prejudicial to defendant. The instruction as a whole practically limits the law of necessity to apparent necessity, and read in connection with State's instruction number twelve the jury could not possibly have been misled by it.

[4] Lastly as to defendant's instruction number five, rejected. This instruction reads: "The Court instructs the jury that where there is more than one assailant, the slayer has the right to act upon the hostile demonstration of either one or all of them, and to kill either one or both of them, if it reasonably appears to him that they are present for the purpose and acting together to take his life or do him some serious bodily injury."

This instruction was approved in Carson v. State, 57 Tex. Cr. R. 394, 123 S. W. 590, 136 Am. St. Rep. 981, and the proposition approved in Wharton on Hom. 396, and cases cited by him, and we think states a correct legal proposition. But we do not think the prisoner was prejudiced by its rejection, because the same proposition was covered substantially and in terms more particularly appropriate to the concrete case, in defendant's instruction number one, given.

For the error in rejecting the evidence of Hermanson and Baxter we are of opinion to reverse the judgment below and grant the prisoner a new trial, as already ordered.

ROBINSON, J., dissents.

WILLIAMS, J. (dissenting). In order that one may have a clearer understanding of the error, found by the majority of the court, it is necessary to state more fully than it is stated in the opinion, not only the undisputed facts connected with and surrounding the homicide, but also to state more fully the rejected evidence. One can then see more clearly the relative importance which the opinion gives to the excluded testimony, and will be better prepared to judge of its value as a precedent.

Defendant's presence at Madge Murray's is thus explained by the evidence. It was reported to him that whiskey was being unlawfully sold at her house, and he procured his brother to go there and see if he could buy some whiskey. His brother took with him one Bob Trivetts, went to the house, and bought a half pint of whiskey from one of the inmates by the name of Florence Blackburn, and, about dark on the day of the homicide, informed defendant of the fact. Without procuring a warrant for her arrest, defendant and W. M. White, chief of police of Keystone, went there to arrest Florence Blackburn, and were told by a number of the inmates that there was no girl of that name there. Defendant says he went to the house without a warrant, at the suggestion of the chief of police, who said he would hold them until defendant could get United States warrants. Defendant's brother was not with him, and he was not able to identify the girl. Some of the witnesses testify that he remarked that, if he could not find Florence Blackburn, he would arrest all that were in the house. After writing a note to the mayor, with the view of sending defendant with it to procure warrants, White decided to go himself, giving as his reason that he knew better where to find the mayor than defendant did, and left defendant on guard. Before he returned the tragedy was enacted, and defendant had departed. Defendant testifies that, after White left and while he was standing in the dance hall, two men came out of Madge Murray's room to where he was standing in the dance hall, and the big fellow says: "Come over in the room where you can sit down; it's no use standing up," and that he followed him into the room. There was a light in the room. He further says: "I was behind him. I heard the door shut, and just turned my head that way (indicating) and the smallest one had his back to the door and this big fellow struck me." The larger of the two men was Tate and the smaller one Gillespie. In this lighted room behind closed door the homicide occurred, and defendant is the only living eyewitness to it.

Without usurping the function of the jury, to pass upon the weight of conflicting oral testimony, the court is not warranted by the record to say, as it has done in its opinion, that defendant was "enticed" into the room by the two men, and that the door was shut "by one of them." That defendant was enticed to enter the room, by the simple invitation which I have quoted from his own testimony, is certainly not to be inferred from the language used; whether or not deceased intended to entice defendant into a secret place for an evil purpose was a question which only the jury could determine, and their verdict would seem to indicate that they did not so interpret the invitation. And the other question, Who shut the door after the three men had gone into the room? is a disputed fact. Rose Coleman says defendant shut it himself, and in doing so mashed her finger.

Defendant says he shot in self defense; that when the door closed he turned his head, and Tate, who had entered the room in front of him, struck him and knocked him to his knees and dazed him; that both of the men jumped on him and commenced beating him; that he caught hold of the bed and pulled himself up, pushed away from them, pulled out his pistol and began shooting, and shot five times. But, after hearing defendant's answers to questions on cross-examination, the jury evidently did not believe his story. From the statements in the opinion, to which I have alluded, and the mention therein made of the failure of the state to prove any motive for the killing, and the importance which the opinion gives to such failure, it is apparent that the majority of the court have been strongly influenced by the weight which it has given to the testimony of the accused, who is contradicted by other witnesses who testified for the state, and by the undisputed facts in the case.

I do not think the reasons assigned for reversing this case are sound; and I am convinced, by a careful inspection of the record, that the question of defendant's guilt or innocence was one of fact for the jury, and that it was not error to exclude the testimony of Baxter and Hermanson. The homicide with a deadly weapon having been proven, and admitted, a case of murder in the second degree was established. Motive, other than malice, which may be inferred from the use of the deadly weapon, is no element of the crime; and the state was not required to show a motive, other than legal malice. But defendant pleaded self defense as the motive; and it was incumbent on him to prove it to the satisfaction of the jury, not to the satisfaction of the court. Cross-examination of a witness is the best test known to the law for ascertaining the truth of his testimony. The cross-examination of accused covers about 20 pages of the printed record; and a perusal of it will convince any impartial reader that the jury were justified in not believing his account of the homicide. I here give a few extracts from it which are fair samples of its character throughout, viz.: "Q. You say that Tate struck you and knocked you down? A. Yes, sir; he knocked me to my knees. Q. Where did he strike you? A. Right on my forehead here (indicating). Q. What did he strike you with? A. I don't know. * * * Q. Where was Tate standing while you were shooting? A. He was beating me all of the time, I guess. Q. On which side of you? A. I don't remember. Q. Where was Gillespie standing while you were shooting? A. They were both beating me all of the time from the time he struck the first lick. Q. Were they beating you while you were shooting? A. Yes, sir. Q. When you raised up didn't you shove yourself back from the bed? A. Yes, sir. Q. When you shoved yourself back from the bed, didn't you shove yourself away from them? A. I don't remember. Q. When you shoved yourself back from the bed, then, you don't remember whether you were away from them or not? A. No, sir. Q. It was when you shoved yourself back from the bed that you commenced shooting? A. I suppose so. Q. When you commenced shooting you don't know whether you were away from them or not? A. No, sir. Q. What were you shooting at? A. I was dazed from the first lick he struck me, and I don't remember. Q. In which direction were you shooting? A. I don't remember. * * * You tell the jury you haven't any idea where you were shooting; is that correct? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you see these men while you were shooting? A. I don't remember. Q. You tell the jury that you don't remember whether you saw them or not; is that right? A. Yes, sir."

The undisputed facts are that neither Tate nor Gillespie was armed with any kind of weapon, and both were in their shirt sleeves; that defendant was armed with two No. 38 Smith & Wesson revolvers; that he did not know either Tate or Gillespie, and had not heard of the Hermanson difficulty; that he fired five shots, every one of which struck the body of one or the other of his victims, Tate's body having two bullet wounds, one of which entered the back, and Gillespie's body having three, one of which entered the back of his neck; that several minutes after the shooting defendant came out of the room, closed the door, and left the building before it was known by any of the inmates that a homicide had been committed; that the furniture in the room was found to be in orderly arrangement, indicating that no scuffle had taken place; that defendant had a small abrasion on his forehead, "just a little scratch just about an inch long," says Dr. S. A. Daniel, who examined it shortly afterwards, and thought it could not have been caused either by a man's fist, or by a certain poker that was found in the room and exhibited to him.

For the purpose of proving that deceased was the aggressor, defendant offered to prove by F. J. Baxter and Sam Hermanson that deceased had a difficulty with said Hermanson in the house a short time before defendant and White came. The court refused to admit the evidence, and for that cause the judgment is reversed. The rejected testimony is, in substance, as follows: Baxter was asked if Ben Tate was drinking, and he said he thought he was, and gave as his reason that he saw him in a fight. He said he did not think that "three or four sober men would get on one man." But he admitted that he did not see Tate staggering, and did not smell whiskey on his breath; that he did not see the beginning of the fight, and did not know how it started. When asked, by counsel for defendant, if Tate was in a violent frame of mind, he replied: "I couldn't say what frame of mind he was in;" that all he saw to indicate his frame of mind was that he was fighting with Sam Hermanson. The excluded testimony of Hermanson is that he knew Tate, but did not see him there; that the difficulty started between himself and Madge Murray; that it was on account of an old grudge between them; that "she had it in for [him] several weeks before"; that she ordered him out, and he sat down and refused to go, and she caught hold of his arm to lead him out, and he jerked away; that then "Wade Gillespie hit [him] and threw [him] down on the floor, and this man [Baxter] helped [him] to get out of there."

I respectfully submit that this testimony has no causal relation to the homicide; that it reflects no light upon it whatever, and is, therefore, no part of the res gestae. Again, I insist that it does not prove, or even tend to prove, either that Tate was a man of quarrelsome and bellicose temper, or that he was in a violent state of mind at the time of the homicide. The testimony does not prove that Tate attempted to do any violence to Hermanson, or that he was even in fault. According to Baxter's testimony there were three or four men on Hermanson; but who the other two were, besides the two that were killed, or whether they were dressed in buckram suits or not, or whether all were trying to do violence to Hermanson, or whether some of them, including Tate, were simply trying to prevent Hermanson from doing violence to some one else, does not appear. And, according to Hermanson's testimony, Tate was not one of the many men that he says were on him; and it is very reasonable to suppose that he, knowing Tate personally and being the person most seriously affected by the fray, would know it, if he had been one of them. But, even if the testimony showed that Tate was in a violent frame of mind at the time of the Hermanson difficulty, which I insist it does not show, still there was ample time for his anger to cool before defendant came to the house. Neither does it follow that, because a man is angered toward one man, he will attempt vengeance upon a stranger.

I do not question the right of a person who is on trial for murder, and who claims that he acted in self defense, to prove the character of deceased for violence. He may do so for either of two purposes, viz.: (1) To show that he was prompted to shoot by a reasonable apprehension of death or great bodily harm to himself. But defendant did not know Tate; hence his character, whatever it might have been, could not have aroused his apprehensions. (2) When it is material to know who was the aggressor in an affray, and the evidence is so conflicting as to leave the matter in doubt; and when character evidence is offered for this purpose it is immaterial whether the accused had previous knowledge of it or not. But, on the vital question of who was the aggressor in this case, there is no conflict of testimony. Defendant is the only living witness to it, and he only has spoken concerning it. Therefore, granting, for argument's sake, that the evidence is of a character tending to prove that deceased was a violent man, still nothing would be gained by proving it, because no other witness has denied that defendant killed in self defense. The only denial of it is found in the uncontroverted facts which I have above recited; and these facts could not be changed, or affected, by the most direct proof that deceased was of violent character, which, at most, only tends to prove a probability, not a fact. The law recognizes that a bad man may sometimes be in the right, and that a good man may sometimes be in the wrong; and no one is justified in taking the life of another simply because he has a bad character. Never having known Tate, or heard anything in regard to his character, defendant could not have apprehended danger from him on account of his character. No witness has denied, and, therefore, there is no occasion to corroborate his story by such evidence as tends only to establish a probability in any case, and such as, in this case, could not possibly overcome the undisputed facts. If defendant had not testified, the same verdict which the jury did find would have been inevitable, under the law; but, having testified that he did the killing in self defense, the verdict depended upon whether or not the jury believed him, and not upon whether they believed some other witness' testimony in preference to him, for there was no one who contradicted him on the vital fact of his defense. Therefore, even if I be wrong in my view that the testimony of Baxter and Hermanson is not admissible, still I can clearly see that its exclusion did not prejudice defendant; because, if admitted, it could have produced no effect upon the undisputed and unalterable facts and circumstances on which the verdict rests.

Moreover, I deny that the rules of evidence admit proof of a single isolated difficulty between deceased and a third person, when unknown to the accused, as evidence of violent character. See, on this subject, the following authorities: Underhill, Crim. Evi. § 325; State v. Roderick, 77 Ohio St. 301, 82 N. E. 1082, and numerous cases cited in the note to this case reported in 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 708. See, particularly, the following cases: State v. Elkins, 63 Mo. 159; State v. Ronk, 91 Minn. 419, 98 N. W. 334; State v. Mims, 36 Or. 815, 61 Pac. 888; State v. Andrews, 73 S. C. 257, 53 S. E. 423; People v. Galmari, 178 N. Y. 84, 68 N. E. 112; Hardgraves v. State, 88 Ark. 261; ¹ Harrison v. Commonwealth, 79 Va. 374, 52 Am. Rep. 634; Sturgeon v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 102 S. W. 812; Warrick v. State, 125 Ga. 133, 53 S. E. 1027.

In Beard v. Insurance Co., 65 W. Va. 283, 64 S. E. 119, we held that, where it was sought to establish the fact that, at the time of insured's death, he was intoxicated, evidence was inadmissible to prove a single intoxication at another time, because a single act does not tend to prove character or habit. The application of the rule in the two cases is the same. If the habit of drunkenness cannot be proven by a single act of intoxication, no more can a single difficulty prove general character for violence.

The best proof of character is general reputation; and defendant made no attempt to prove the character of deceased in that way, and presents no excuse for not doing so. I am convinced by the record that defendant had a fair and impartial trial. Whether or not he is guilty of the crime of which he was convicted is not for me to say; but I can, with perfect propriety, say that there is ample evidence, disclosed in the record, to support the verdict, and human experience and observation teach us that juries always resolve their doubts in favor of the accused, and that, when they do err at all, they usually err on the side of mercy. They were the judges of the value of defendant's testimony; they saw him face to face, observed his countenance, and heard his words; and they evidently refused to believe him. This they had a right to do. It was their minds that had to be satisfied, for the law constitutes them the triers of the facts. The location of the wounds on the bodies of the dead men; the orderly arrangement of the furniture in the room; the fact that five shots were fired, every one striking the bodies of one or the other of the victims; the improbability that a man, after being struck and knocked down and dazed, and set upon by two men, one larger than himself, as defendant said he was, could free himself, and afterwards kill both his assailants, and come out of the affray with only a slight abrasion on the forehead—was an account of the killing which seems to have taxed too heavily the credulity of the jury.

answered this, but still I admit that it seems unnatural that one man should slay another for no cause whatever. But the jury only can judge the motive. They have said that it was not self preservation; it follows that they believed it was malicious. It is useless for me to speculate upon what the jury might have thought, for it was their consciences that had to be satisfied. However, I will mention one or two causes that the evidence might have suggested to their minds. It will be remembered that defendant was left to guard the house while White went for the warrants; and there is also testimony that defendant said that, if he did not find Florence Blackburn, he would arrest all that were in the house. The jury may have thought that defendant himself closed the door to the room, and undertook to guard the men in there, and that they attempted to escape, and were shot; or they may have believed that a quarrel arose, and defendant shot because he was angered, 'perhaps on account of what he conceived to be an improper interference with him in the exercise of his official duty.

I think the testimony of Baxter and Hermanson was properly excluded. Rules of evidence are founded on reason and human experience, and are intended to aid courts and juries in arriving at the truth and justice of a case. Such rules are generally established by the courts; few of them have their origin in legislative enactment. I admit that some courts have, in recent years, gone to very great length, in murder trials, in admitting proof of difficulties between the deceased and third persons, as evidence of deceased's character for violence, when the accused relies on self defense; but an examination of the cases cited in the majority opinion, and a comparison of the evidence held by the courts in those cases to be admissible with the evidence in this case which this court holds should have been admitted, and for excluding which the majority have reversed the trial court, will show that this court has gone much further than any of them. If the opinion is to become the law of this state, it does seem to me that it will serve no needful purpose in the administration of justice, but instead will furnish new causes for appeals and prolongations of murder trials; and deferred trials too often result in unjust acquittals. In recent years the courts of this country have been severely criticised by the public, on account of the many delays and uncertainties in the administration of justice. This criticism is not wholly without just cause; and, in recognition of it, all the great political parties have, this year, pledged themselves, by their national platform declarations, to correct the evil by legislation, as far as possible. The growth of the law in England and in this country shows that many delays, appeals, and reversals have been due to rules of evidence, and rules relating to pleading and practice, which the courts themselves had established, but which Parliament, and the Legislatures of the various states, later either modified or abolished altogether.

It is a fundamental rule of evidence that a fact should be proven by the best evidence, when possible to do so; and the best proof of character is proof of reputation. Why, then, should not one on trial for murder, who wishes to prove the violent character of deceased, be required to do so by proving his general reputation for violence, when he can do so? That is the best method of proving character, and so recognized by all the courts. Why should not the rule be adhered to? Why have some of the courts departed from it in trials for homicide? Defendant did not offer to prove the character of Tate by general reputation.

I quote the following from the report of the Committee on Judicial Administration and Legal Reforms, adopted by the West Virginia Bar Association, at its annual meeting held at Grafton this year, on the question whether or not the death penalty should be inflicted for any cause at the hands of the state, for the purpose of showing that the courts are considered, by the bar, to be largely responsible for the laxity that exists in the administration of criminal justice, viz.: "The percentage of murders throughout this nation exceeds that of any civilized land. The figures are not at hand, but it is notorious that, not only is the proportion of such crimes higher than abroad, but the proportion of convictions are fewer. The trouble with us is, not that the penalty is so severe, but that the guilty so often escape. The contrast between our country and England is very strong, both as to the rareness of crimes of blood and the certainty of the death penalty in murder of first degree."

And, to show the impression made upon the legally trained mind of a highly cultured and closely observant Englishman, after sojourning for some time in the United States, and witnessing the way in which justice is administered in the courts of the various states, and comparing it with the administration of justice by the courts of his own country, I quote the following from James Bryce's "American Commonwealth," in his chapter on "State Judiciary," page 204, viz.: "All crimes, except such as are punishable under some federal statute, are justiciable by the state court; and it is worth remembering that in most states there exist much wider facilities for setting aside the verdict of a jury finding a prisoner guilty, by raising all sorts of points of law, than are permitted by the law and practice of England. Such facilities have been and are abused, to the great detriment of the community."

TENNESSEE COAL, IRON & R. CO. v. GEORGE. (No. 3,846.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 5, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. COURTS (§ 8) — JURISDICTION — LAW OF OTHER STATE.

Section 906 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 677), which was enacted to carry into effect article 4, § 1, of the federal Constitution, requires the courts of the several states to enforce any transitory cause of action created by a statute of a sister state, not opposed to the settled policy of the state wherein the cause of action is sought to be enforced. But neither the Constitution of the United States nor any act of Congress passed in pursuance thereof authorizes the Legislature of one state to deny to one having a transitory cause of action originating in that state under one of its statutes the right to appeal to the courts of another state for the enforcement of his cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 18, 19; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 969*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF COURT—POLLING JURY.

In civil cases it is discretionary with the trial judge whether he will permit the jury to be polled; and the reviewing court will interfere only in a clear case of abuse of discretion. There was none such in the present case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3845-3848; Dec. Dig. § 969.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Under the facts of this case, it was not error, requiring the grant of a new trial, to permit the plaintiff to testify that there was nothing he could have done which he did not do to prevent the injuries he received.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Wiley George against the Tennessee Coal, Iron & Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff brought his action by attachment in the city court of Atlanta, claiming damages for personal injuries, alleged to have been received by him while in the defendant's employ as a locomotive engineer in the state of Alabama. The plaintiff pleaded, as the basis of his right to recover, section 3910 of the Code of Alabama of 1907. That section provides that, when a personal injury is received by a servant in the service of business of his master, the master is liable in damages to the servant as if he were a stranger, and not engaged in the service of the master, in several named cases, among which are the following: (1) When the injury is caused by reason of any defect of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the master; (2) when the injury is caused by reason of the negligence of any person in the employment of the master, who has any superintendence intrusted to him while in the exercise of such superintendence; (3) when such injury is caused by the negligence of any coemployé of the master to whose orders or directions the injured servant was, at the time of the injury, bound to conform, and did conform, if such injuries resulted from obedience to such orders; (4) when the injury is caused by reason of the act or omission of any servant in the service or employment of the master done or made in obedience to the rules or regulations of the master, or in obedience to particular instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the master; (5) when the injury is caused by reason of the negligence of any person in the employment of the master, who has charge or control of any signal, locomotive, or other named appliance of the master. It is further provided in the section that the master is not liable, if the servant knew of the defect causing the injury, and failed in a reasonable time to give information thereof to the master, or to some person superior to himself, unless the master or such superior already knew of the defect; nor is the master liable under subdivision 1 of the section, unless the defect arose from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the master, or of some person in the service of the master and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, and other named appliances were in proper condition; provided, that in no event shall it be contributory negligence or an assumption of the risk on the part of a servant to remain in the employment of the master after knowledge of the defect or negligence causing the injury, unless he be a servant whose duty it is to remedy the defect, or who committed the negligent act causing the injury complained of.

The plaintiff was injured while undertaking to repair a locomotive, and on account of certain defects in the locomotive, which are set forth in detail in the petition. In defense to the action, the defendant pleaded, among other things, section 6115 of the Code of Alabama of 1907, which is in the following language: "All actions brought under sections 2486 and 3910 must be brought in a court of competent jurisdiction within the state of Alabama and not elsewhere." Upon motion of the plaintiff, the court struck this plea, and this is the primary error assigned in the record. A verdict in favor of the plaintiff was returned, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled.

In this court the plaintiff in error expressly abandoned those grounds of its motion in which complaint is made that the verdict is not authorized by the evidence and is excessive. The only ground insisted upon here is the overruling of its objection to the following question propounded by the plaintiff's attorney to the plaintiff, while testifying in his own behalf: "Was there anything else you could have done to keep the engine still when you were under it?" The objection was that the question called for an expression of an opinion on the part of the witness in reference to a matter which was solely for decision by the jury. The witness answered the question as follows: "Nothing on earth that I know of." There is a further assignment of error in the bill of exceptions as follows: After the verdict of the jury had been announced, and before the jury were dispersed and the verdict had been recorded, defendant's counsel made the following statement and motion: "Having reason to suspect a practice with the juries in this county of arriving at verdicts in illegal ways, such as by agreements in advance to abide by the vote of less than the whole 12 as to whether the finding should be in favor of the plaintiff or the defendant, and by agreements in advance to fix the amount of recoveries as damages as the average arrived at by totaling the amounts expressed by each individual juror and dividing the sum by 12, and thus producing a quotient or speculative verdict, I respectfully request on behalf of the defendant, that this jury be polled, and each juror interrogated as to whether the verdict rendered is his individual verdict, unaffected by any agreement among the jurors in advance of arriving at it, by which it was found to be in favor of the plaintiff, and independent of any agreement with the other jurors in advance of arriving at it, by which the amount of it was fixed by any calculation of averages of the estimates of individual jurors." The court overruled this motion and declined to propound the questions suggested by counsel, though it seems from a statement in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error that the court was willing to permit the usual question to be propounded to each of the jurors, "Is this your verdict?"

Smith, Hammond & Smith, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. R. R. Arnold and Lamar Hill, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Both in the trial court and in this court, the plaintiff in error, in support of its plea that the action could not be maintained because of the provisions of section 6115 of the Code of Alabama of 1907, invoked article 4, § 1, of the Constitution of the United States, which is in the following language: "Full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state; and the Congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effects thereof." Section 6115 was adopted, with the Code of 1897 in solido, some time after the passage of the act contained in section 3910, and in the argument for the defendant in error some importance is attached to this fact. We prefer, however, to deal with the point as if the restriction of the right to sue to the courts of competent jurisdiction in Alabama had been part and parcel of the statute creating the cause of action. It is broadly contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution would compel courts of Georgia to give effect to the limitation contained in section 6115, and to refuse to take cognizance of a suit based upon the provisions of section 3910. In other words, it is insisted that the state of Alabama has the power to create a right and limit its enforcement to the courts of that state. Counsel for the defendant in error reply that the laws of Alabama can have no extra-territorial effect; that, while any condition or limitation prescribed by the Legislature of that state, which goes merely to the manner in which the right shall be exercised, is binding upon the courts of that state, yet that all conditions or limitations which affect merely the remedy have no force beyond the limits of the state, but are matters as to which the lex fori controls.

It is, of course, well settled that the courts of one state will enforce any transitory cause of action arising in another state which is not opposed to the settled policy of the state wherein it is sought to enforce the right. The question therefore presented for our determination is whether or not the Legislature of one state can create a statutory right which gives rise to a transitory cause of action, and at the same time localize the right, so as to prevent its enforcement beyond the limits of the state. In the early history of this country, Congress passed acts in execution of the constitutional grant of power, above quoted, which provided that the acts of Legislatures of the several states should have such faith and credit given to them in every state of the United States as they have by law and usage in the courts of the state in which they were enacted. 1 Stat. at Large, c. 11, p. 122 (U. S. Compilation of Stats. 1901, p. 677). Does the provision of this act of Congress, construed in connection with section 1 of article 4 of the federal Constitution, compel the courts of Georgia to give effect to section 6115 of the Code of Alabama, denying to a person injured in the state of Alabama, on account of negligence of one domiciled in that state the right to maintain an action under the provision of section 3190 of the Code of that state in any court other than the courts of competent jurisdiction of that state?

This court has twice had under consideration the identical question presented by this assignment of error. In Sou. Ry. Co. v Decker, 5 Ga. App. 21, 34, 62 S. E. 678, in referring to section 6115 of the Code of Alabama of 1907, it was said: "Even if this statute had been in force at the time the suit was instituted, it would have been the duty of the courts of this state to disregard it. Our own sense of justice, subject to the guidance of the lawmaking power of this state, determines solely and alone what laws, domestic or foreign, we will enforce; and this discretion is subject to neither limitation nor extension by the Legislature of any other state." This language was quoted approvingly in Sou. Ry. Co. v. Robertson, 7 Ga. App. 154, 162, 66 S. E. 535. In neither of the cases just cited was the question directly involved, and we are called upon now for the first time to make an authoritative ruling upon the point presented. Prior to the passage of the act of Congress in execution of the full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution, the question as to whether laws of a foreign state would be enforced by the courts of another state was determined largely as a matter of comity between the states. As was said by Judge Nisbet, in Cox v. Adams, 2 Ga. 164: "The laws of a country, as a general principle, have no binding force beyond its territorial limits. Their authority is admitted in other states, not ex proprio vigore, but ex comitate; not on account of any inherent force in the law itself beyond the limits of the state which enacts it, but because of the comity of nations. Each state has the unquestioned right to legislate upon the rights and obligations of its own citizens, according to its own views of right and expediency. So, also, every independent state will judge for itself how far it shall or shall not admit the force of foreign laws within its own territory. These principles, as well as those we shall further declare in this opinion, are applicable to the states of our own Union, so far as they are not modified by our peculiar system—so far as the Constitution of the Union does not limit, restrain, or alter them."

Generally speaking, any transitory cause of action authorized by the law of one state would, by comity, be enforced by the courts of another, if not opposed to the settled policy of the latter state. Since the passage of the act of Congress, the question has become one upon which the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are binding upon the several states; and the courts of this state are bound to yield respect and obedience to an authoritative ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the question as to what effect should be given to an act of the Legislature of one state when a right thereunder is set up or claimed in the courts of another state. In our opinion, the question is settled authoritatively against the contention of the plaintiff in error by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Atchison R. Co. v. Sowers, 213 U. S. 55, 29 Sup. Ct. 397, 53 L. Ed. 695. In that case a statute of the territory of New Mexico was involved. That statute provided, "Whereas, it has become customary for persons claiming damages for personal injuries received in this territory to institute and maintain suits for the recovery thereof in other states and territories, to the increased annoyance and manifest injury and oppression of the business interests of this territory, and the derogation of the dignity of the courts thereof," it was enacted that after the passage of that act no civil liability, under either the common law or any statute of the territory, on the part of any person or corporation, for personal injuries or death caused by such person or corporation in the territory, should be enforced in any court other than the district court of the territory in and for the county of the territory where the claimant or the person against whom the claim was asserted resided, or, if a corporation, in the county in which the corporation had its principal place of business. It was further prescribed by the act that there should be certain conditions precedent to suit, such as service upon the person or corporation against whom the damages were claimed, within 90 days after the injury and 30 days before the commencement of the suit, of an affidavit by the claimant, stating his name and address and the name of the person receiving the injuries, the character and extent of the injuries, the way or manner in which the injuries were caused, and the names and addresses of all the witnesses to the happening of the facts causing the injuries; also that all of the conditions therebefore mentioned, including the bringing of the action within one year in a court within the territory, must be complied with, and "that such right of action is given only on the understanding that the foregoing conditions precedent are made a part of the law under which the right to recover can exist for such injuries," except as otherwise provided in the act.

An action was brought in one of the courts of Texas by a person who had sustained personal injuries in the territory of New Mexico, and the statute of New Mexico, above referred to, was pleaded as a defense to the action. The Court of Civil Appeals of Texas refused to sustain the defense, and held, in substance, that, while all the conditions precedent to suit, as prescribed by the act of New Mexico, in reference to giving of notice, furnishing the list of the witnesses, making an affidavit, etc., would be enforced by the courts of Texas, those courts were not bound to recognize and respect an act of the territory of New Mexico which limited the right to suit to the courts of that territory. In the course of the opinion, that court said: "The state of Texas is bound, under section 1, art. 4, of the Constitution of the United States, to give full faith and credit to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state; but it is not required to recognize a statute of any state that seeks to fix the jurisdiction of its courts and prevent the citizens of other states from using its courts, if they so desire, in the enforcement of their rights. The jurisdiction of our courts must and will be prescribed by the constitutional and legislative authority of our state, and not by that of any other state. A law attempting such interference is null and void, and, as such, does not come within the constitutional provision aforementioned. There is nothing in the contention that a void statute is binding on the courts of Texas until the territorial courts declare the law invalid. In the very nature of things, the question will probably never be presented to the territorial courts; and in the next place, their decision could not give vitality to a void statute respecting the jurisdiction of the courts of this state. We do not question the authority of the laws of New Mexico, so far as they apply to its own affairs; but we repudiate them when they attempt to regulate the affairs of other states. The right of injured parties to recover damages from the negligent inflicter of the injuries is recognized in New Mexico, although recognition carries with it burdensome and vexatious conditions, of which, however, if its citizenship is willing to endure them, no one is in a position to complain. But the citizens of other states cannot be forced into its courts by a legislative provision that such suits can be instituted and prosecuted in the courts of no other state." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Sowers, 99 S. W. 192.

The decision of the Court of Civil Appeals of Texas was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of error; and that court held that a federal question was presented by the writ of error, and announced its ruling upon the constitutional question presented, as follows: "The full faith and credit demanded by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 906 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 678) is given by the Texas courts to the New Mexico act of March 11, 1903, providing that an action for personal injuries received in that territory will not lie unless certain requirements as to the making of an affidavit and the bringing of suit within a specified time are observed, where a recovery is permitted in those courts subject to such restrictions, although the statute also undertakes to make the suit maintainable only in the district court of the territory." The view entertained by that court will be seen by an inspection of the opinion of the majority, written by Mr. Justice Day, from which the following excerpts are taken: "It is, then, the settled law of this court that in such statutory actions the law of the place is to govern in enforcing the right in another jurisdiction; but such actions may be sustained in other jurisdictions, when not inconsistent with any local policy of the state where the suit is brought. * * * 'Each state may, subject to the restrictions of the federal Constitution, determine the limits of the jurisdiction of its courts, the character of the controversies which shall be heard in them, and, specifically, how far it will, having jurisdiction of the parties, entertain in its courts transitory actions, where the cause of action has arisen outside its borders.' St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Taylor, 210 U. S. 281, 285 [28 Sup. Ct. 616], 52 L. Ed. 1061, 1064. The territory of New Mexico has a right to pass laws regulating recovery for injuries incurred within the territory. Martin v. Pittsburg & L. E. R. Co., 203 U. S. 284 [27 Sup. Ct. 100], 51 L. Ed. 184, 8 Ann. Cas. 87. It has a right, under section 906 of the Revised Statutes, to require other states, when suits are therein brought to recover for an injury incurred within the territory, to observe the conditions imposed upon such causes of action, although otherwise controlled by common-law principles. But, when it is shown that the court in the other jurisdiction observed such conditions, and that a recovery was permitted after such conditions had been complied with, the jurisdiction thus invoked is not defeated because of the provision of the statute referred to." Mr. Justice Holmes, with whom concurred Mr. Justice McKenna, dissented, holding that, inasmuch as the territory of New Mexico could have refused to create the right of action altogether, if it had seen fit, when it adopted the common-law liability upon certain conditions precedent, one of which was that the party injured should sue in the territory, this condition was binding, and no suit could be maintained in the courts of any other state.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error argue that the distinction between the case of Atchison R. Co. v. Sowers, supra, and the one now under consideration is that in the former case the substantive cause of action existed at common law, and did not depend upon statute. They contend that, while a state would not have the right to restrict to its own courts the enforcement of a common-law liability, it does have the right to so limit a liability created by its statutes; in other words, that, as the state need not have created the liability, it has a right to prescribe the forum in which the cause of action should be enforced. It seems to us that this distinction cannot be sustained, and that the purpose and intent of the decision of the United States Supreme Court was to hold broadly that the courts of each state have a right to determine for themselves, subject only to the limitations of the federal Constitution and the acts of Congress passed in pursuance thereof, what transitory causes of action they will enforce; and that it is beyond the power of the state creating the cause of action to deny the right to enforce it in the courts of another state. It seems to us inaccurate to say that the limitation sought to be imposed by the Legislature of Alabama is a condition affixed to the right created by the statute. It is really a limitation or restriction which goes merely to the remedy. Remedy for the enforcement of a right embraces not only the procedure for its enforcement, but also the forum in which it shall be enforced. The forum in which a right must be enforced is no part of the right. A right might be created, and no tribunal be erected in which to enforce it. But the right would none the less exist. It would simply be inoperative or remain in abeyance until a tribunal was invested with jurisdiction to enforce it. It is much like the case where an act is prohibited by law, but no penalty is prescribed. One who commits the act violates the law, even though no penalty be attached to the violation. The Constitution of the United States requires a state to deliver up a fugitive from justice from another state. The fact that no method is prescribed for compelling obedience to this mandate does not destroy or affect the right of one state to demand the surrender of the fugitive, or the obligation of the state to which the fugitive has fled to deliver him up. The right will be enforced in the courts of Georgia in strict accordance with the statute of Alabama, and every condition of that statute which relates to the right will be enforced by our courts. In other words, when suit is brought in one of the Georgia courts under the Alabama statute, the Georgia court is substituted for the Alabama tribunal, and will enforce the right in the same way, according to the same principles and to the same effect, as it would be enforced in the state of Alabama.

More than this, we will construe the statute as it is construed by the highest court of the state of Alabama, and we will give due effect to all of the laws of Alabama which affect the right created by the statute. The statute of Alabama is the source of the right on which the jurisdiction acts; but it is not the source of the jurisdiction itself. We look to the act to determine the right; but we refuse to look to the law of Alabama to determine what rights the courts of this state will enforce, or to fix the jurisdiction of its tribunals. Cases are tried in Alabama upon the settled principles of the common law, and they are tried in Georgia upon the same principles and substantially according to the same procedure. While the common law is presumed to be of force in nearly all of the American states, there is no such thing as a common-law liability, except as such liability may be recognized by statute. While the right may be founded upon the common law, and the origin of the right may be derived from the common law, it is none the less statutory, since the common law has no force and effect in the several states, except as it may have been adopted by statute. Alabama has as much right to withhold its sanction of a right existing at common law as it has to withhold legislative recognition of a new right, not existing at common law. It is true that the right created by the Alabama statute now under consideration did exist at common law, although there are certain statutory incidents and qualifications which were not recognized at common law. But without reference to this, even if the right itself had been one which did not exist at common law, if the statute creates a transitory cause of action, not opposed to the settled policy of this state, the courts of Georgia will not close its doors to one claiming a right under the statute, notwithstanding the amendment to the law, which seeks to confine the right to sue to the courts of competent jurisdiction within the state of Alabama. Our opinion is that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, above referred to, is absolutely controlling on the question presented, and that the trial court properly declined to sustain the defense based upon the provisions of section 6115 of the Code of Alabama of 1907.

[2] 2. In criminal cases the defendant has an absolute right to poll the jury; but in civil cases it is discretionary with the court whether the losing party shall be permitted to exercise this privilege. Bell v. Hutchings, 86 Ga. 562, 12 S. E. 580; Black v. Thornton, 31 Ga. 641; Smith v. Mitchell, 6 Ga. 458; Rutland v. Hathorn, 36 Ga. 380. Upon authority of these decisions, even if the defendant had requested the presiding judge to permit the polling of the jury in the usual way by simply asking each juror if the verdict returned was his verdict, it would have been discretionary with the judge to permit or refuse the request. It may be seriously doubted if the trial judge had the right to propound to the jury the question suggested by the counsel for the defendant, even if he had been disposed to do so. The request was based upon an ex parte statement of counsel that he had reason to suspect that the juries of Fulton county were in the habit of returning what is termed a "quotient verdict" in suits for damages. There was no suggestion that this particular jury had adopted this course in arriving at their verdict, or that there was any irregularity in the manner in which the verdict had been reached.

In addition to this, the practical effect of an answer from the jurors as to the manner in which the verdict had been arrived at would have been to permit them to impeach their own verdict. No juror would have been allowed to disclose to the court that the verdict had been arrived at in an illegal manner; and if he had been permitted to answer that there had been an agreement among the jurors in advance of arriving at the verdict, as to the manner in which it was to be determined, and that the agreement was that the verdict was to be reached by a calculation of the average of the estimates of individual jurors, this would have been in effect to allow the juror to impeach his own verdict. The usual way of polling the jury is to ask each individual juror whether he consented to the verdict, or, as it is usually put, "Is this your verdict?" If he says it is, and that he consented to it, the law closes his mouth as to the manner in which the verdict was arrived at; and its irregularities must be shown to the court by other evidence than that derived from the jurors themselves. If he answers that the verdict is not his, and he did not consent to it, he should not be interrogated as to his reasons for not consenting, and the verdict should not be received. We know no procedure in this state which would have justified the trial judge in granting the request of counsel for the defendant; and certainly it was no abuse of discretion to refuse to do so.

[3] 3. Nor do we think the assignment of error which complains of the admission of testimony of the plaintiff constituted any sufficient reason for granting a new trial. Plaintiff had testified in detail as to his conduct in reference to the transaction under investigation, and it necessarily follows, from his testimony, that there was nothing else he could have done to have kept the engine still while he was under it. All of the circumstances indicated that it was through no fault of his that the engine moved; and, while it was a question for the jury, upon the defense presented, as to whether or not the plaintiff was at fault, and whether or not the moving of the engine was due to his own negligence, still, under the facts testified to by the plaintiff, the jury would have been bound to find that he had done everything which he could have done to prevent the engine from moving. It was altogether harmless, therefore, to permit the plaintiff to testify in the language complained of. We find no error in the record, and the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al.
(No. 3,873.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 10, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 357*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK—CARE REQUIRED.

It is a sound and wholesome rule of law, conservative of human life and limb, that, without regard to the question whether a person killed or injured by a railroad train was a trespasser or licensee upon the track, those in charge of the running of the trains are bound to exercise ordinary care and diligence in approaching any point where people may be expected to be upon the track, or where the road-bed is constantly used by pedestrians.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1235; Dec. Dig. § 357.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 355*)—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK—CARE REQUIRED.

While a railroad company is entitled to the exclusive use of the tracks in its switchyards, and there can be no implied license to the public to use such tracks, inconsistent with this exclusive right, yet this rule applies to switchyards proper, and has no application to a case where there is only one track, which is the main track of the company, although this track may be partly within the yard limits, and is occasionally used in connection with the switchyard.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1220-1227, 1235; Dec. Dig. § 355.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 400*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK—QUESTION FOR JURY—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where a railroad company has laid planks across its trestle, or permitted the planks to be laid there, and people have used these planks as a footway across the trestle for years, it is not negligence per se for a pedestrian to use them for that purpose. It is a question for the jury to determine whether or not the extent of the use of the trestle as a footpath, and the length of time such use has continued, have been sufficient to impose upon those operating the trains of the company the duty of anticipating the probable presence of persons on the track, and in approaching that particular point, to exercise ordinary care and watchfulness to avoid injury to them; and it was for the jury to determine whether, under all the facts and circumstances, the plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as would bar his right to recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1305-1381; Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

(Syllabus by Pottle, J., dissenting.)

4. CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

To attempt to walk across a long, high, and narrow railway trestle, without ascertaining that a train is approaching, is so obviously and inherently dangerous as to prevent a recovery for an injury received as a result of a mere omission of the engineer to be on the lookout. Even if an invitation to so use a railway trestle will ever be implied, the mere presence thereon of a narrow plank, upon which a pedestrian can walk across with apparent safety, is not sufficient to authorize the inference that pedestrians are invited to use the plank as a footway, and impose upon the employes on the locomotive the duty of anticipating at a given time the presence of a trespasser upon the trestle.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by T. L. Williams, by next friend, against the Southern Railway Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Thomas L. Williams, a minor, by his next friend, sued the Southern Railway Company and W. B. Robinson, an employe of the company, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him in jumping from a trestle on the railway right of way, within the yard limits of what is known as Armour Station, in Fulton county. He was endeavoring to cross the track over the trestle, and to prevent being run over by a train of the defendant company, the locomotive of which was being operated by Robinson, he jumped from the trestle and received his injuries. The petition alleges, in substance, that Robinson, the engineer, could easily have seen the petitioner on the track of the railway company for 200 yards before reaching the point where he was compelled to jump from the trestle in order to save his life, and that if Robinson had been performing his duties as engineer, in running the engine with proper care and diligence, he would have seen the petitioner in ample time to have stopped the engine before reaching him, or before it became necessary for him to jump from the trestle. It also alleges that Robinson was under the duty at the time to look out for pedestrians on the trestle, and to use ordinary care to prevent running them down or injuring them, and it is charged that the railway company and Robinson were negligent (1) in running the engine at too great a speed across the trestle and within the yard limits of Armour Station; (2) in not looking ahead and discovering the petitioner; (3) in not stopping the engine in time to prevent the necessity of petitioner's jumping from the trestle in order to save his life. By an amendment to the petition it was further alleged (1) that the trestle was constantly used by pedestrians at Armour Station, and that this fact was well known by the railway company and Robinson; (2) that Robinson, individually and as an employé of the railway company, was under the duty, at the time petitioner was run down and compelled to jump off the trestle, in passing over the trestle, to look out for pedestrians thereon, and to use ordinary care to prevent running them down and injuring them; (3) that as a matter of fact Robinson saw petitioner upon the trestle when the engine was 600 yards from him, and that, if he had exercised ordinary care, he could easily have stopped the engine in time to prevent the injury to plaintiff.

A general demurrer to the petition was overruled. Plaintiff's evidence made in substance the following case: Between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon of March 17, 1900, he was walking on the trestle of the railway company, going towards Armour Station, which was south of the trestle. The trestle was from 100 to 300 yards in length, passing over Peachtree creek and the tracks of the Seaboard Air Line Railway. The distance from the trestle to the ground below was from 25 to 100 feet. The trestle was narrow at the southern end. The point where the plaintiff jumped from the trestle was about 30 or 40 feet from the ground. There was only one track across the trestle, and this was the main track of the railway company. In the middle of the trestle there was a plank walk, extending entirely across the length of the trestle, with the exceptions of a few feet on both ends. This walkway consisted in some places of two planks, 2x10 or 2x12 inches. In some places, however, there was only one of these planks. This plank walkway had been on the trestle for five years before the injury, but has been taken up since that time. Plaintiff was about half-way across the trestle when he first heard and saw the approaching engine, and in his opinion the engine was then about 300 or 400 yards away. The engine was pulling a freight train, and was running about 25 or 30 miles an hour. The engine was a switch engine. The only signal which the plaintiff heard from the approaching train was the blowing of the whistle four or five times in rapid succession when he was about midway the trestle. North of this trestle, and about 75 yards from the end, there was a deep cut. The track over this cut to Armour Station, going south, was practically straight, there being only a slight curve. The curve was on the right-hand side of the engineer going towards Armour Station, and there was an unobstructed view from the cut to the trestle. As soon as the engineer got out of the cut he could see the whole trestle. About 400 or 500 yards north of the trestle is a public road crossing, known as "Mason's Crossing." The only way to get to Armour Station from this crossing is to cross the trestle or go around on this road, a distance of a mile. Plaintiff did not know anything about the latter way of getting to Armour Station. He was a stranger there, and had never been on the trestle before. He did not know that Armour Station was just south of the trestle. At this point it was impossible to cross the creek, except by way of the trestle, for the reason that the ravine traversed by the trestle was deep, rough, and precipitous.

The country on the north side of the trestle was settled to some extent, and, while there were no houses between the trestle and the crossing, there was a small country settlement just beyond the trestle—about eight houses, occupied by workmen. South of the trestle the country was rather thickly settled with fertilizer plants and dwelling houses. This trestle was used frequently and generally, both by the employés of the fertilizer plants and by other people living on both sides of the trestle. There were about 400 employés at the plant, and the people used this plank footway as a path. This pathway was used more frequently in the mornings and at night by the employés of the plant in going to and from their work, and had been so used for some five years. This trestle is within the yard limits of Armour Station. About 10 or 15 steps from the south end of the trestle there is a switch track running from the main line; and 15 or 20 steps farther on there is another switch track, running parallel with the main track. The switch track proper does not extend across the trestle to the other side; but the railway company, as occasion may require, switches its cars out on and beyond the trestle, and there was a great deal of switching in the yards, the moving of cars being constantly carried on.

At the conclusion of this evidence, counsel for the railway company moved the court for a nonsuit, which, after argument, was granted, and this judgment constitutes the only error to be reviewed.

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson and Geo. P. Whitman, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. McDaniel & Black, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The first legal question arising under the facts is: What relation did the plaintiff occupy to the railway company at the time of the injury, and what corresponding duty did the company owe to him? Was he a trespasser or a licensee? It is insisted by the railway company that he was a trespasser, and by the plaintiff that he was a licensee. The rule of law governing both relations is well settled in this state by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court and of this court. If plaintiff was a trespasser, the only duty which the railway company and its employes operating the train owed to him was not to injure him willfully or wantonly, or by reckless and gross negligence amounting to wantonness; in other words, to observe ordinary care to avoid injuring him after his presence had become known to the employes operating the train. Georgia Railroad Co. v. Fuller, 6 Ga. App. 454, 65 S. E. 313; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Riley, 127 Ga. 568, 56 S. E. 635. If, under the facts, he was a licensee—that is, if the evidence showed that the plank pathway across the trestle had been used constantly by pedestrians for such a length of time as to put the railway company on notice of this use—its employes operating the train were charged with the duty of anticipating their presence thereon, and to use ordinary care to avoid injuring them. Ashworth v. Southern Ry. Co., 116 Ga. 635, 43 S. E. 36, 59 L. R. A. 592; Bullard v. Southern Ry. Co., 116 Ga. 647, 43 S. E. 39; Crawford v. Southern Ry. Co., 106 Ga. 870, 33 S. E. 826; Harden v. Georgia R. Co., 3 Ga. App. 344, 59 S. E. 1122; Georgia R. Co. v. Fuller, supra; Shaw v. Georgia R. Co., 127 Ga. 8, 55 S. E. 960; Macon & Birmingham Ry. Co. v. Parker, 127 Ga. 471, 56 S. E. 616.

It is insisted by counsel for the railway company that a trestle over which a train runs is in itself a place of such great danger that an implied license to walk on it can never arise by mere user of it by the public, and that, even if such implied license could arise as to the use of the trestle, it did not arise in the present case, because the trestle was in the switchyard at Armour Station, and, under the repeated rulings of this court and the Supreme Court, no implied license can ever arise for the public to use railroad tracks in a switchyard, but, to authorize such use, there must be an express license. We cannot agree to the first proposition without qualification. It is true that a railroad trestle may be a place of such manifest danger as not only to preclude any implied license to use it, but to show the grossest sort of negligence in a pedestrian to use it, as, for instance, where the trestle is long and high, and too narrow to permit one to safely stand on the side while a train is running over it, and there is nothing indicating consent, actual or constructive, by the company, to its use by the public as a walkway. But if the circumstances upon which such implied license is claimed indicate some affirmative action on the part of the company, not only inviting its use by the public, but minimizing the danger of its being used as a pathway, we think such implication might arise. If the company placed planks across the trestle to be used as a pathway, not only by its employes, but by the public generally, or if the company permitted the people in the neighborhood to place the planks across the trestle and to use them as a walkway for a long period of time, could it be said that these acts could not amount to a license to pedestrians to so use the trestle?

Some authorities go to the extent of holding that a license to use the tracks of a railroad company applies only to public crossings, or near depots and stations, where, from the frequency of its use by pedestrians, the company has reason to apprehend their presence. But the Supreme Court of this state extends the rule to pedestrians who may be using the tracks longitudinally, and to any place on the track which is habitually used and frequented by the public with the knowledge of the employes of the railway company and those in charge of the running of the train. In Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Meigs, 74 Ga. 857, it was held that the trial court was right in admitting testimony relating to the habit of the public in walking on the tracks of the railroad at and near the place where the injury happened. And in Shaw v. Georgia Railroad, 127 Ga. 8, 55 S. E. 960, where Mr. Justice Atkinson, speaking for the court, reviews the decisions of the Supreme Court on this subject, it is held to be a question of fact, to be submitted to the determination of the jury, as to whether that part of the railroad track which was the locus of the homicide was so frequently used by the public as a pathway, with the knowledge of the railroad company, as to require the servants of the company engaged in operating the train thereon to anticipate the presence of pedestrians. But, after all, there is little substantial difference in the rule of law applicable to trespassers and licensees. If the employes of the railway company, or those in charge of the running of its trains, have knowledge that the public, either as trespassers or as licensees, may be expected to be upon the track at a particular place, it is their duty to anticipate this presence and to use proper care and diligence to avoid injuring them.

As expressed by Judge Thompson in his most valuable treatise on the Law of Negligence: "It is a sound and wholesome rule of law, humane and conservative of human life, that, without regard to the question whether the person killed or injured in the particular case was or was not a trespasser or a bare licensee upon the track of the railway company, the company is bound to exercise special care and watchfulness at any point upon its track, where people may be expected upon the track in considerable numbers, as, for example, in a city where the population is dense, even between streets where the track has been extensively used for a long time by pedestrians, or where the roadbed is constantly used by pedestrians, or at a bridge in a thickly settled community, which the public, in considerable numbers, have used for many years. At such places the railway company is bound to anticipate the presence of persons on the track, to keep a reasonable lookout for them, to give warning signals, such as will apprise them of the danger of an approaching train, to moderate the speed of its train so as to enable them to escape injury, and a failure of duty in this respect will make the railway company liable to any person thereby injured, subject, of course, to the qualification that his contributory negligence may bar a recovery." 2 Thomp. Neg. § 1726. And in the case of Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Meigs, supra, the Supreme Court says: "While this habit [the habit of walking on the railway track], even if acquiesced in by the railroad company, did not prevent the deceased from being a trespasser, it was a circumstance which the jury might properly consider in determining whether or not the persons in charge of the train showed proper diligence at the time the killing occurred. Railroad engineers should observe more caution in running at places where they know persons are likely to be on the track than elsewhere, even if those persons are trespassers; and especially is this true when the company has at least tacitly consented to this otherwise unauthorized use of its property by the public." This language is quoted with approval in Bullard v. Southern Ry. Co., 116 Ga. 644, 43 S. E. 39, and also in the Shaw Case, supra. That eminent jurist and lawyer, to whom the profession is much indebted, Judge Hopkins, in his work on Personal Injuries (section 87), states the rule as follows: "Where no permission is given, but there is a habit on the part of individuals or the public of traveling over the track on foot, and nothing is done to prevent it, that does not modify or change the legal rights or obligations of either the public or the company. By such use the public are not tacitly licensed to go upon the track, and the consent of the company to the use is not implied; but the fact that they do go there enters into the situation as it is known to the company and affects the caution and amount of care required in running the trains."

Let us apply to the facts of this case the rule as thus announced. It is true there was a long and high trestle, and it was narrow, not safely permitting one to stand on its side while a train was passing; but, notwithstanding this dangerous character of the trestle, there were two planks in the middle of the track, used as a pathway by the public. There was no other apparent purpose for which they could have been used. The evidence is silent as to whether they were actually put there by the railway company or by others. But this is immaterial. We are obliged to assume that they were placed there with the knowledge of the railway company, or that they were permitted to remain there and were used with the knowledge of the company, for a period of five years. The evidence does not show that these planks were placed there exclusively for the use of the employes of the company. On the contrary, it does show that they were used as a pathway by the public generally, the people who lived in that neighborhood and the employes of the Armour factory in the mornings and evenings. There was no other way to conveniently cross the ravine and creek. Can it be reasonably denied that these facts did not present a situation where it became the duty of those in charge of the running of the trains to anticipate the presence of pedestrians on the trestle, and consequently to exercise due diligence to avoid injury to them? We conclude that "a sound and wholesome rule of law, humane and conservative of human life," is to impose upon railroad companies the duty of special care where people are to be expected on the tracks, whether as trespassers or licensees. It is the frequency of the use, and not the character of the use, that raises the duty of anticipation and diligence. The evidence relating to this question is not so free from doubt as to demand a legal conclusion. But whether there was such frequent and continual use of the trestle by the public, with the knowledge of the railway company, as to impose upon those who were operating its trains the duty of anticipating the presence of pedestrians at that point, and whether, with such notice and resultant duty, ordinary and reasonable care was exercised by them, should have been submitted to the jury for determination. Bullard v. Southern Ry. Co., supra; Shaw v. Georgia Railroad, supra; Maccon & Birmingham Ry. Co. v. Parker, supra; Smith v. S., F. & W. Ry. Co., 84 Ga. 698, 11 S. E. 455.

[2] 2. The "switchyard doctrine" is invoked by the railway company as a complete bar to the right of recovery. This doctrine is well settled by the decisions of this court and the Supreme Court. There can be no implied license to the public to use switchyards. Georgia R. Co. v. Fuller, supra; Waldrep v. Georgia R. Co., 7 Ga. App. 342, 66 S. E. 1030; Grady v. Georgia R. Co., 112 Ga. 668, 37 S. E. 861. This rule is applicable to switchyards in fact; switchyards interlaced with tracks, used constantly for the storing and switching of cars; switchyards where danger signals are manifest and speaking. As to these the companies have the right to the exclusive use, and the public are affirmatively warned to keep out. But a railroad company cannot use its main track for switching purposes as occasion may require, and thus make the one track a part of the switchyard. If so, they could have switchyards extending for miles, with nothing to put the public on notice of their character. In Grady v. Georgia R. Co., supra (the leading case on the subject), it is said: "In a railroad yard, in which there are several tracks in continuous use for the purpose of storing and switching cars and making up trains and the like, and where the dangerous character of the place is manifest and obvious, there can be no implied license to the public to cross the tracks," etc. As thus reasonably defined, the facts of the present case do not bring it within the switchyard rule. Here there was only the one main track across the trestle, used infrequently for switching purposes, never for storing cars, with nothing whatever to indicate that it was a part of the switchyard, or to put a pedestrian on notice of any unusual danger in this respect in using it.

[3] 3. It is insisted by learned counsel for the company that plaintiff was guilty of gross negligence in going upon the trestle, and that this negligence was the efficient cause of his injury. In support of this contention decisions of the Supreme Court are cited, where it is claimed that the act of going upon a railroad trestle was held to be such gross negligence as would prevent recovery in any case. In these cases there was no question made as to the use of the trestle by the public as a pathway, either as trespassers or as licensees. There was no plank walk across the trestle inviting the public to use it. Pedestrians crossed or attempted to cross by stepping from cross-tie to cross-tie, and in each case there were circumstances emphasizing the negligent use of the trestle. In Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Ry. Co. v. Leach, 91 Ga. 419, 17 S. E. 619, 44 Am. St. Rep. 47, the plaintiff attempted to cross a long, narrow trestle, by stepping on the cross-ties, incumbered with a small boy, and Mr. Justice Lumpkin said: "He had no right to go upon the trestle at all, and in no event could he voluntarily incumber himself in any manner." In Georgia R. Co. v. Richardson, 80 Ga. 727, 7 S. E. 119, plaintiff went upon a trestle in the nighttime, about the time he knew a train was due to pass on the trestle. There was no evidence of any plank walkway across the trestle. In Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Ry. Co. v. Gravitt, 93 Ga. 369, 20 S. E. 550, 26 L. R. A. 553, 44 Am. St. Rep. 145, a suit by a mother to recover for the death of her minor son, the negligence of the boy's uncle, who was in charge of him, in taking him on the trestle, when there was a safe and convenient dirt road parallel with the railroad track, was a controlling fact. In that case it was expressly held that there was no license shown from the company to walk upon the trestle. We deduce from a consideration of these cases, and others of like character, that the Supreme Court has never held that the mere act of using a trestle as a cross-way was itself so grossly negligent as to bar recovery. It depends upon the facts of the particular case, and is ordinarily to be determined by the jury.

Unquestionably the plaintiff was guilty of great negligence. He was a stranger, wholly ignorant of the schedule, had no reason to believe that a train would not pass any moment, saw the long, high, narrow trestle, saw the curve only 75 or 100 yards north, hiding the trestle from the view of the engineer, and yet he ventured to cross. Did he not take the chances? But for the plank walkway inviting him to cross, and giving him the right to assume that his presence would be anticipated, and that the engineer in charge would use care in approaching the trestle, so as to avoid injuring him, we would unhesitatingly hold that he did. There is no evidence whatever that the engineer was guilty of willfulness, wantonness, or reckless negligence amounting to wantonness. Whether he failed in the duty of diligence, in view of the facts, and whether such failure was the efficient predominating cause of the injury, or whether it was the negligence of the plaintiff, are questions which we think can only be safely and justly determined by a jury; and, so believing, the judgment awarding a nonsuit is reversed.

Judgment reversed.

POTTLE, J. (dissenting). The gist of the opinion of the majority may be gathered from the following excerpt from the opinion: "Unquestionably the plaintiff was guilty of great negligence. He was a stranger, wholly ignorant of the schedule, had no reason to believe that a train would not pass any moment, saw the long, high, narrow trestle, saw the curve only 75 or 100 yards north, hiding the trestle from the view of the engineer, and yet he ventured to cross. Did he not take the chances? But for the plank walkway inviting him to cross, and giving him the right to assume that his presence would be anticipated, and that the engineer in charge would use care in approaching the trestle, so as to avoid injuring him, we would unhesitatingly hold that he did. There is no evidence whatever that the engineer was guilty of willfulness, wantonness, or reckless negligence amounting to wantonness." This being the court's view, the discussion in reference to the frequency of the use of the trestle as a footway by others is entirely academic, and the evidence of such use wholly immaterial. I do not challenge the correctness of the principle that, if the employees in charge of a railway train have reason to anticipate the presence of a trespasser on the track at a given time and place, a duty arises, based upon "a sound and wholesome rule of law, humane and conservative of human life," to use ordinary care to prevent injury to such trespasser. This does not change, but is merely an application of, the general rule, repeatedly announced by the Supreme Court and by this court, that the only duty owing a trespasser is not to injure him wantonly or willfully; for, if an engineer has reason to suspect the presence of a trespasser on the track, failure to use ordinary care for his protection would be such gross negligence as to amount to wantonness. The Shaw Case, 127 Ga. 8, 55 S. E. 900, cited by the majority, is authority for the proposition that the frequent use by pedestrians of a railway track longitudinally at a given point "enters into the situation as it is known to the company, and affects the caution and amount of care required in running the trains." That case does not rule that such use of the track raises an implied license or right of user, for the court quotes approvingly from Judge Hopkins as follows: "By such use the public are not tacitly licensed to go upon the track, and the consent of the company to the use is not implied."

The decision in the Shaw Case was placed upon the ground that the defendant company knew of the frequency of the use of the tracks by pedestrians at the place of injury, and with this knowledge was guilty of negligence in failing to keep a lookout for trespassers. In the absence of knowledge by the company of such use of the tracks, manifestly no duty to anticipate the presence of a trespasser can arise. Upon this idea the case of Comer v. Hill, 101 Ga. 340, 28 S. E. 856, was decided. In that case the wife of the defendant's bridgekeeper was killed on a trestle. She had been in the habit of using the trestle as a means of reaching her house.

The court held that the company was not shown to have been under any duty to keep a lookout, because of the absence of proof that the employees connected with the running of the train knew of the habit of the deceased to use the trestle, although it appeared that employees in charge of the roadbed did have such knowledge. The court held: "The plaintiff's wife, therefore, being upon the trestle without authority and without the knowledge of the defendants, the only duty which was owing to her was to use all ordinary care to prevent harm coming to her after her presence upon the trestle was discovered." There being no evidence that the defendant's employees knew of the habit of pedestrians to use the trestle as a footway, the frequency of such use affords no ground for recovery by the plaintiff.

[4] The opinion of the majority is predicated solely upon what it assumes to have been an implied invitation to use the trestle. So far as I am aware, this is the first time any court has held that an invitation to use as a footway a long, high, narrow railway trestle will be implied from the mere presence on the trestle of a means or instrumentality by the use of which passage may be effected with apparent safety. In my opinion, there is no authority in the decisions of the Supreme Court for such a conclusion. The plank was about a foot wide and did not extend across the trestle at either end. On the contrary, there were a few feet of open space at each end of the trestle before the planks were reached. The trestle was 450 to 500 feet long, about 50 feet high, and too narrow to enable a person to remain thereon safely while a train was passing. There was some evidence that a notice was posted warning persons not to go upon the trestle. The plaintiff could read, but says he did not see the notice. He had no right to assume that he had permission to walk across the trestle merely because a plank was there on which he could walk. Doubtless the plank was placed there for use by the road hands in connection with their duties in inspecting and repairing the trestle. The company was under no duty to provide a plank for the plaintiff, and yet, if as the majority hold, the plank was an invitation to walk, the company would have been liable if the plank had broken and the plaintiff had in consequence been injured.

Carried to its logical conclusion, the principle announced by the majority would prevent any master from employing means to make a dangerous instrumentality safe for his servants, for fear some stranger might accept the presence of the means as an invitation to use the instrumentality and be injured thereby. What right had the plaintiff to assume that the planks were put there for his benefit, rather than for use by the railroad employees at a time when their presence there was known and precaution taken for their safety? In my opinion, the only thing he had a right to assume was that he might be able to cross with less likelihood of falling than if he walked on the ties. In going upon the trestle without ascertaining that a train was approaching, the plaintiff assumed the risk of injury, and is not entitled to hold the company liable for a consequence resulting, not from any breach of duty to him, but solely from his own rash act.

GREER v. TURNER COUNTY et al.

TURNER COUNTY et al. v. GREER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 155*)—COLLECTION OF FUNDS—EXECUTION—AUTHORITY TO ISSUE—CHAIRMAN OF BOARD OF ROADS AND REVENUES.

The chairman of the board of roads and revenues of Turner county has authority to issue an execution against any person holding county funds collected by the county for any purpose.

(a) It is not essential to the validity of such an execution that it be set out therein from whom the defendant in fi. fa. received the money, what particular money it was, or how it was county money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 223-225; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

2. COUNTIES (§ 155*)—COLLECTION OF COUNTY FUNDS—PERSONS SUBJECT TO EXECUTION.

The execution may be issued against any person, whether an official or not, holding county money, and without suit or notice of any kind.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 223-225; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

3. COUNTIES (§ 75*)—CLAIMS—SUBMISSION—TIME.

Civil Code, § 6001, requires claims in behalf of the officials therein specified, for public services in relation to which existing laws provide no compensation, to "be submitted to the grand juries of the superior courts of the respective counties of the spring term." This means at the spring term immediately succeeding the year during which such public services were rendered. Therefore a grand jury, at a term subsequent to such spring term, has no legal power to pass upon and allow such claims, and to thereby authorize the county treasurer to pay them. Accordingly such a payment would be invalid, and an execution would lie in behalf of the county against the official or person receiving the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 116, 117, 134; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

4. COUNTIES (§ 75*)—CLAIMS OF OFFICIALS—COSTS AND ATTORNEY'S FEES.

As it appears from the face of the account presented to and allowed by the grand jury (there being no other evidence on the subject) that the items for expenses and attorney's fees incurred by the ordinary of Turner county in responding to a rule issued against him by the prison commissioners were not connected with any public service rendered the county by him, the grand jury were not legally authorized to allow such items.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 116, 117, 134; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

5. COUNTIES (§ 75*)—CLAIMS OF OFFICIALS—ALLOWANCE.

The amount claimed by such ordinary as compensation for services rendered during the year 1908, in performing the duties imposed upon him by the adoption of the alternative road law system for Turner county, was duly allowed by a grand jury as the statute provides, and, under the circumstances of the case, was promptly paid by the county treasurer, and therefore the county commissioners were not authorized to issue an execution against the ordinary for the sum so paid him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 116, 117, 134; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

6. STATUTES (§ 76*)—SPECIAL LEGISLATION—COUNTY OFFICERS—PAYMENT FOR SERVICES.

The special act for Turner county, approved August 18, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 459), in so far as it is thereby attempted to provide a different method from that established by the general law embodied in Civil Code, § 6001, for the compensation of certain officials where no fees are fixed by law, is void, because in conflict with that provision of the Constitution declaring that "no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 77½-78½; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

Error from Superior Court, Turner County; Frank Park, Judge.

Proceeding by W. A. Greer against Turner County. From a judgment denying the recall of a fi. fa. issued in favor of the county, petitioner brings error, and the county sued out a separate bill of exceptions, assigning error on so much of the judgment as found that petitioner was entitled to $500 embraced in his account for services rendered as ordinary between specified dates. Affirmed.

W. A. Greer was the ordinary of Turner County during the years 1907 and 1908, and as such officer performed during those years certain extra public services and incurred certain expenses in behalf of the public, in relation to which the existing laws provided no compensation. He rendered an itemized bill for such services and expenses, properly verified, to the grand jury of such county at the spring term of the superior court, 1909. That grand jury made the following recommendations: "In view of the fact that our county finances are deficient several thousand dollars, we hereby recommend the issuing and selling of $40,000 of bonds for the following purposes: For public roads, $5,000.00; for paupers, $1,200.00; for present indebtedness, $25,000.00; for jail, $1,500.00; for bridges, $3,000.00; for general purposes, $4,300.00. We also recommend that W. A. Greer, ex-ordinary, be paid the sum of $1,000 for services rendered in 1907 and 1908 in overseeing roads of this county, and the sum of $40 for expenses incurred in going to Atlanta in response to rule nisi issued by the prison commission of Georgia, and also the sum of $50 paid for attorney's fees in connection with said rule nisi. 'Exhibit 1,' hereto attached, contains a statement of these amounts, and we recommend that the county commissioners pay the same out of the general funds as mentioned above in connection with the issue of bonds." The attached exhibit showed an item of $500, due December 31, 1907, for one year's service attending to the duties imposed by law upon W. A. Greer, ordinary, by the adoption of the alternative road law system, and a like amount, due December 31, 1908, for similar services rendered during that year; also items of $40 and $50 due September 9, 1908, for expenses and attorney's fees in respect to the matter as stated in the foregoing recommendation. Subsequently to such recommendation, it not appearing that the bonds were issued by the county, the board of commissioners of roads and revenues, after levying taxes for all necessary and proper purposes, levied a sufficient amount, under the head, "To pay any other lawful charge against the county," to pay the amount of Greer's claim and all other similar charges; and there was, for the purpose of paying "any other lawful charge against the county," a sufficient amount of taxes collected and paid into the treasury of the county to cover the claim of Greer and all other similar charges. Afterwards Greer presented his claim to the treasurer of the county and demanded payment thereof; and the "treasurer, having the said fund in his hands and being satisfied that [Greer's claim] was a lawful charge against said fund, without further order paid" Greer, on December 27, 1909, the amount of his claim, viz., $1,090, he giving the treasurer a receipt for the same. On April 5, 1910, an execution was issued by the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of the county against Greer for the sum paid him by the treasurer, with interest thereon from the date of payment, which amounts, the execution recited, "at our court of the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of said county, to wit, on the 5th day of April, 1910, Turner county, as plaintiff, recovered against said W. A. Greer, of said Turner county, as county money in his hands and collected for county purposes, and which sums the said W. A. Greer fails and refuses to pay over, although having been, on the 21st day of March, 1910, notified in writing and commanded to pay the same, and the said W. A. Greer refused to do so."

After the levy of the execution upon property of Greer, he filed a written motion in the office of the clerk of the superior court to quash the execution and to dismiss the levy on various grounds. He also filed an affidavit of illegality, which was demurred to by the plaintiff in fi. fa., which also traversed the grounds of the same. Upon the trial the court overruled the motion to quash the execution and to dismiss the levy, sustained the demurrer to some of the grounds of the affidavit of illegality, and overruled it as to others. By agreement of counsel the case was submitted to the judge of the superior court without the intervention of a jury, upon an agreed statement of facts, the substance of which is above stated. The court rendered a judgment "that the plaintiff recover of and from the defendant the sum of five hundred and ninety ($590.00) dollars; that is to say, the $500.00 allowed for extra services during the year 1907, and the $40.00 allowed for expenses in going to and from Atlanta and remaining there in response to the rule nisi of the prison commission, and the $50.00 paid out as attorney's fees in connection with the said rule nisi, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date the same was paid to him by the treasurer, and all costs of this case; and the execution levied is ordered to proceed accordingly for these amounts." Greer excepted, assigning error upon the overruling of his motion to quash the fi. fa. and to dismiss the levy made thereunder, upon the sustaining of certain grounds of the demurrer to the affidavit of illegality, and upon the judgment of the court ordering the fi. fa. to proceed against him for the sum of $590. The county of Turner sued out a separate bill of exceptions, in which it assigned error upon the sustaining of the illegality to the extent of $500, and so adjudging that Greer was entitled to that sum as embraced in his account against the county for extraordinary services rendered by him as ordinary from January 1, to December 31, 1908.

W. H. McKenzie, of Cordele, and J. H. Tipton, of Sylvester, for plaintiff in error. A. J. Davis and W. T. Williams, both of Ashburn, and Perry, Foy & Monk, of Sylvester, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. We will first deal with the assignment of error made by Greer upon the overruling of his motion to quash the execution and to dismiss the levy made thereunder. The grounds of this motion were in substance as follows: (1) Because the execution was issued and signed by "D. H. Davis, Chairman of Board of Roads and Revenues of Turner County, Georgia," and no sufficient facts were set forth in the execution to show any authority or jurisdiction either in Davis, as chairman of the board, or in the board itself, to issue the execution, (2) Because the execution fails to set forth sufficient facts to show Greer's liability to Turner county for any portion of the sum for which the execution was issued, in that it does not appear from the execution in what way or on what account the sum of $1,090 was due by Greer to the county, and that it does not appear from whom Greer received the money, nor what particular money he received, nor that the money was county money, nor for what county purposes he collected it. (3) Because the execution was illegal upon its face as having no foundation in law nor in fact.

Civil Code, § 522, gives ordinaries authority to compel persons having county money in their hands, collected for any purpose whatever, to pay over the same; and section 523 provides that ordinaries shall issue executions against such persons and their securities, if any, for the full amount appearing to be due, as the comptroller general issues executions against defaulting tax collectors. The act of 1908 creating the board of commissioners of roads and revenues for Turner county (Acts 1908, p. 354) gives to such board jurisdiction over all county matters, vested by law, at the time of the passage of the act, in the ordinaries of the various counties of the state having no board of commissioners of roads and revenues. The act also authorizes the chairman of such board, as such, to issue an execution of the character of the one involved in this case. See, also, County of Pulaski v. Thompson, 83 Ga. 270 (3), 9 S. E. 1065. The commissioners had authority to issue an execution against any person holding county funds. Code sections above cited; Hobbs v. Dougherty County, 98 Ga. 574, 25 S. E. 579. The execution recited that the sum for which it was issued was due by Greer to Turner county "as county money in his hands and collected for county purposes." It was not necessary that the execution should set out in detail from whom Greer received the money, what particular money it was, or why and how it was county money. There was no merit, therefore, in the motion, and the court did not err in overruling it.

[2] 2. Did the court err in sustaining certain grounds of demurrer to the affidavit of illegality? These grounds were in substance as follows: (1) Defendant had never had his day in court, had never been served with any process or other notice of the pendency of any suit whereon the execution was based, nor did he waive service, nor appear and defend any suit; and, moreover, no suit of any kind has ever been brought against him for the money for which the execution was issued. (2) At the time the execution issued against him, defendant was a private citizen, and was not a county official of Turner county, nor as such the holder of any money belonging to the county. The other grounds of illegality which were stricken involved the same points upon which we have ruled on the motion to quash the execution and dismiss the levy. The court properly sustained the demurrer to the two grounds of the illegality above stated. Under Civil Code, §§ 522, 523, 525, an execution may be issued against any person, whether an official or not, holding county money, and without suit or notice of any kind. Price v. Douglas County, 77 Ga. 163, 3 S. E. 240. "Prima facie such an execution is to be taken as expressing and representing a real debt for the county taxes; and it is not for the county to support it by evidence, but for the defendant or defendants to meet and overcome it by evidence." Bridges v. Dooly County, 83 Ga. 275, 9 S. E. 1065. As we have already stated, such an execution may be issued against any person, whether he be an official or not, who has in his hands county money collected by the county for any county purpose. Civil Code, §§ 523, 525. In Hobbs v. Dougherty County, supra, it was held that it was not necessary for the person holding such county funds to be an official of the county, to authorize the issuance of an execution against him, and that accordingly, upon the refusal of a banker to pay over money which had been "collected for any county purpose whatever" and deposited with him, either on general or special deposit, by the county treasurer or tax collector, the ordinary or other proper county authorities could, under the Code section cited above, issue an execution against the banker for the purpose of collecting from him the amount so placed in his hands, and he stood upon the same footing as such officers upon refusal to pay the funds to the county when demanded of him.

[3] 3. Did Greer, the defendant in fi. fa., under the facts of the case, have in his hands any county money, collected for any county purpose, which he refused to pay upon demand? The answer to this question depends upon whether, in the circumstances, he was legally entitled to receive from the treasurer the money paid him. Civil Code, § 6001, declares: "The ordinaries of this state, who by law are vested with the management of the county business, and for whom no compensation is provided, and the sheriffs and clerks of the superior courts, for public services in relation to which existing laws provide no compensation, shall be compensated as follows, to wit: Such officers shall state their respective claims in writing and make affidavit of the correctness and justice thereof, which so made out and verified shall be submitted to the grand juries of the superior courts of the respective counties at the spring term, and said grand juries may, in their discretion, require other proof of the justness and correctness of said claims, and, when satisfied that such claims are just and correct, may allow the sum claimed, or so much thereof as they may deem right and proper: and when so allowed, the ordinary of said county, or other authority levying county taxes, shall assess so much with the other county taxes as will pay the same, which, when collected and paid over to the county treasurer of such county, shall be paid by him to the parties entitled thereto, without further order, he taking a proper receipt therefor. The compensation provided for in this section shall be in full of all compensation of said officers for such services." Greer's account against Turner county was for what he claimed to be services rendered by him for the county during the years 1907 and 1908, in relation to which no existing law provided compensation. He submitted the account in writing and properly verified to the grand jury of the superior court of that county at the 1909 spring term thereof, when such jury recommended the payment of the entire account, but further recommended "that the county commissioners pay the same out of the general funds as mentioned above in connection with the issuance of bonds." This same grand jury had recommended the issuance and sale by the county of bonds to the amount of $40,000, for certain specified purposes, among which was an item of $4,800 "for general purposes." In our opinion, the recommendation by the grand jury that Greer's account be paid sufficiently indicated the allowance by them of the sum claimed by him. The first item of his account was as follows: "Dec. 31, 1907. To one year's service attending to duties imposed by law upon said W. A. Greer by adoption of alternative road law system, beginning January 1, 1907, and ending December 31, 1907, $500.00." The section of the Code quoted above requires claims, in behalf of the officers therein specified, for public services in relation to which existing laws provide no compensation, to "be submitted to the grand juries of the superior courts of the respective counties at the spring term." This evidently means at the spring term immediately succeeding the year during which such public services were rendered, as for various good reasons such claims should not be allowed to accumulate against counties, and such we believe was the intention of the General Assembly in enacting the statute. It follows that the grand jury, at the 1909 spring term of the court, had no power, under the statute, to pass upon and allow the claim for services which were rendered in 1907. It appeared from the face of the account that the grand jury which allowed it had no legal authority to do so; and the treasurer who paid such account was bound to know, when it was presented to him for payment, that the allowance of it by that grand jury was unauthorized. This being true, the payment by the treasurer was illegal, and therefore Greer received $500 of county money to which he was not legally entitled under the proceedings in accordance with which it was paid him; and the trial court properly held that the execution should proceed for this amount.

[4] 4. Two other items of the account were as follows: Sept. 9, 1908. To expenses incurred in going to and from Atlanta and remaining there in response to rule nisi issued by the prison commissioners of Georgia to show cause why convict camp of Pinson & Conoly should not be abolished, $40.00." "Sept. 9, 1908. To amount paid to attorney in the matter of rule nisi issued from prison commission of Georgia to show cause why convict camp of Pinson & Conoly should not be abolished, $50.00." The record entirely fails to disclose more as to the nature of the proceedings before the prison commission than appears upon the face of these items of the account, and from them it is shown that the proceeding was to abolish a designated convict camp of named individuals, presumptively for some alleged reason affecting the legality or propriety of such camp, and not for the purpose of depriving the county of convicts. It follows that, as the expense and attorney's fees embraced in the account appear not to have been connected with any public service rendered by Greer, as ordinary, for the county, the grand jury was without legal authority to allow them; and the court below properly held, also, that the execution should proceed for the sum of such items.

[5] 5. The remaining item of the account was: "Dec. 31, 1908. To one year's services attending the duties imposed by the adoption of the alternative road law system from January 1, 1908, to December 31, 1908, $500.00." The grand jury, at the spring, 1909, term of the court, was legally authorized to pass upon this claim, and, if satisfied from the evidence submitted to them that it was just and correct, to allow it. This they did, though they recommended its payment out of the amount "of the general funds" to be raised, together with other amounts for specified purposes, by the issuance and sale by the county of bonds in a given sum. The grand jury went beyond their province and authority in recommending that the account be paid out of any given fund. The statute provides that, after such a claim has been allowed, the county authority whose duty it is to levy county taxes "shall assess so much with the other county taxes as will pay the same, which, when collected and paid over to the county treasurer of such county, shall be paid by him to the parties entitled thereto, without further order, he taking a proper receipt therefor." Civil Code, § 6001. No county bonds were issued, and the county commissioners, after the allowance of Greer's account, and after levying taxes for all necessary and proper purposes, levied a sufficient amount, under the head, "To pay any other lawful charge against the county," to pay the amount of Greer's claim and all other similar charges, and there was, for the purpose of paying "any other lawful charge against the county," a sufficient amount of taxes collected to cover the claim of Greer and all other similar charges. Out of the fund raised for such purpose the treasurer paid Greer's account upon presentation, after it had been allowed by the grand jury, as already stated. We hold that this item of $500 for services rendered during the year 1908 was properly paid by the treasurer to Greer; and the court below did not err in so ruling in sustaining the illegality as to that sum. Our decision in this respect does not conflict with anything held in Lumpkin County v. Williams, 94 Ga. 657, 21 S. E. 849, or in White County v. Bell, 98 Ga. 400, 25 S. E. 558, since, after this claim was passed on and allowed by the grand jury, the county commissioners, after levying taxes for all necessary and proper purposes, levied a sufficient amount, under the head, "To pay any other lawful charge against the county," to pay the amount of this claim of Greer and all other similar charges, and there was a sufficient amount of taxes collected under this head to pay all such claims and charges.

[6] 6. Counsel for the county of Turner contend that the item of $500, with which we have just been dealing, was paid to Greer without authority of law, for the reason that the act of August 18, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 459), requires that payment for such services as were embraced in this item should be made by the treasurer of the county on a warrant drawn by the ordinary, and that no such warrant was issued. Civil Code, § 6001, is a general law making provision for the compensation of certain officials where no fees are fixed by existing law. The special law for Turner county, above referred to, in so far as it seeks to provide a different method from that established by such general law for the payment of such compensation, is in conflict with the declaration that "laws of a general nature shall have uniform operation throughout the state, and no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing law." Civil Code, § 6391; Atkinson v. Bailey, 135 Ga. 336, 69 S. E. 540.

MAYNARD et al. v. ARMOUR FERTILIZER WORKS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1912.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 237*) — RIGHT TO SUE—REMEDY AT LAW.

Where creditors obtained judgments against a common debtor, and had executions issued, on which entries of nulla bona were made, they could file an equitable petition against the debtor and grantees to whom the debtor had executed a deed, attacking such conveyance as fraudulent, and made to delay or defraud them and other creditors, and seeking to subject said property. Such a petition, with proper allegations, would not be demurrable on the ground that the plaintiffs had an ample common-law remedy, without invoking equitable relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 674-680, 684-686; Dec. Dig. § 237.*]

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 253*)—PARTIES—JOINDER OF PLAINTIFFS.

Nor would it be demurrable on the ground that there was a misjoinder of plaintiffs, in that several judgment creditors of the same debtor joined therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 740; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

3. ACTION (§ 50*)—JOINDER OF CAUSES OF ACTION—PARTIES AND INTERESTS INVOLVED.

Nor on the ground that a judgment held by one of the plaintiffs was against the common debtor, and also against her husband, who was alleged to be insolvent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 511-547; Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 263*)—BILL TO SET ASIDE—REQUISITES—DEMURRER.

The petition filed was demurrable. It nowhere alleged that the grantees in the deed attacked participated in a fraudulent plan (if it existed) to prevent the plaintiffs from collecting the amounts due them, or had notice thereof. The deed attacked bore date before the creation of the debts on which the judgments were founded. There was no distinct charge that it was not then executed. There was some suggestion that the valuable consideration recited in the deed was not paid, but there was no direct allegation to that effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 771-774, 776-779, 781; Dec. Dig. § 263.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 17*)—BILL—ALLEGATIONS—DIRECTNESS AND POSITIVENESS.

If it was intended to charge that the grantees had no means with which to pay the recited consideration, or did not in fact pay it, such allegation should have been directly made, and not by mere inference from pleading collateral facts, which might possibly have an evidential value, and then drawing conclusions therefrom.

(a) Certain specified paragraphs in the petition are held to have been subject to special demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; N. V. Whipple, Judge.

Bill by the Armour Fertilizer Works and others against Mrs. L. M. Maynard and others. General and special demurrers to the petition having been overruled, defendants excepted, and bring error. Reversed.

The Armour Fertilizer Works and others filed their equitable petition against Mrs. L. M. Maynard and her two daughters, Myrtle Maynard and Lillie Mae Maynard, alleging in substance as follows: Plaintiffs were creditors of Mrs. Maynard; their debts having been created in 1906 beginning in the early part thereof. One of them held the note of Mrs. Maynard and her husband, but the latter was hopelessly insolvent, and had been so for several years. They reduced their claims to judgment, executions had been issued, and entries of nulla bona made thereon. The earliest of these judgments was dated in May, 1907, and the others bore later dates in that year. J. D. Maynard, the husband of Mrs. Maynard, always managed her business affairs for her, and in the years 1905, 1906 and 1907 he was her general agent. In 1906, when the debts of the plaintiffs were created, she was in possession of a considerable amount of property, including certain lots in the town of Abbeville and certain farm property, and she returned such property for taxation as her own. Mrs. Maynard lived on a part of the property situated in town, and her two children lived with her. There has never been any apparent change in the possession thereof. She had title to all of the property described in the petition, "except such title as may have passed out of her by the three deeds hereinafter set forth." During the year 1906 she became heavily indebted, and also before and since that time contracted various debts, some of which have been reduced to judgment. She became indebted to the Chickamauga Trust Company in the sum of $3,000. She made a deed to her farm near Abbeville, for the purpose of securing the debt. She made to her brother, T. L. Shepherd, a deed dated January 3, 1907, for a purported consideration of $4,000. This was recorded on November 20, 1907. On the same date there was filed for record a deed purporting to have been made on February 21, 1905, for an alleged consideration of natural love and affection and $500, whereby she undertook to convey all of her property described in the petition, except the farm. She now claims that she has no real estate, and plaintiffs have been unable to find any other property. Various allegations were made in regard to Shepherd, such as that he resided in the city of Savannah and was engaged in no occupation, in so far as plaintiffs were able to ascertain, and made no tax return for the year 1906. There were also some allegations in regard to the estate of his father, made for the purpose of showing what amount of money he probably received from that source. In 1907 the farm was under the control and direction of J. D. Maynard, as it had been for a number of years previously, and this continued during the year 1908, and still continues, so far as plaintiffs are able to ascertain. The deed from Mrs. Maynard to her two daughters purports to have been made for love and affection and a consideration of $500, although the property therein described is worth from $3,500 to $4,000. If $500 were paid at all, this was an inadequate consideration. The grantees are the only children of Mrs. Maynard, and have all their lives resided with their parents, and still do so. They have been engaged in no business during the past four or five years, "so far as your petitioners are able to ascertain, and therefore have no means for making money." So far as the plaintiffs by diligent inquiry can ascertain, they have not inherited money or property from any source. Unless plaintiffs can subject the real estate described for the payment of their debts, they will not be able to realize thereon. The deed made by Mrs. Maynard to her daughters was not made in good faith, but was made to hinder and delay plaintiffs and other creditors, and so likewise was the deed which was made to Shepherd. Plaintiffs bring this petition in behalf of themselves and other creditors in like circumstances who may see fit to join in the litigation. The petition then closed with this allegation: "Your petitioners charge that both of said deeds, the one to T. L. Shepherd and the one to Myrtle Maynard and Lillie Mae Maynard, were a part and parcel of a well-laid plan to prevent petitioners from collecting the amount due them as aforesaid, and that, although said deeds are [not?] near each other in apparent date, yet your petitioners charge the fact to be that the said two deeds were executed at one and the same time, or at all events near the same time." The prayers were that the deed from Mrs. Maynard to her two daughters be declared to be fraudulent, and be set aside and canceled as against the rights of the plaintiffs, that it be declared that the property was subject to the plaintiffs' executions, and that process issue. General and special demurrers to the petition were overruled, and the defendants excepted.

Haygood & Cutts, of Fitzgerald, and M. B. Cannon, of Abbeville, for plaintiffs in error. Hal Lawson, of Abbeville, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Creditors, having reduced their claims to judgment, and having had entries of nulla bona made on the executions, filed an equitable petition seeking to subject certain land which had been conveyed by the debtor to her two daughters, and to have the deed canceled. The presiding judge overruled a demurrer to the petition, and the defendants excepted. One of the principal contentions on the part of the plaintiffs in error is that the defendants in error had a complete remedy at law, by levying their executions, and that there was no equity in a petition which sought to set aside a conveyance made by the debtor on the ground that it was fraudulent. This contention is unsound. Where the remedy at law is not as complete as in equity, equitable relief may be had. It has long been a recognized rule that, where judgment creditors cannot obtain payment of their judgments by levy and sale, and it is necessary to set aside fraudulent transactions, they may resort to a court having equitable jurisdiction. Formerly the more frequent contention advanced was that the creditor could not go into equity until after he had reduced his claim to judgment, and sometimes, it was said, not until after he had had an entry of nulla bona made. This was changed by the uniform procedure act of 1887, under which a creditor may at once proceed to obtain judgment on his claim, and to have a decree subjecting property fraudulently conveyed away by his debtor. De Lacy v. Hurst, 83 Ga. 223, 9 S. E. 1052. But the enlarging of the right of a creditor without judgment did not operate to destroy the pre-existing right of a creditor with a judgment. The former argument that one without a judgment and execution could obtain no equitable relief as against fraudulent conveyances is now reversed, and the contention is made that plaintiffs who have obtained judgments are entitled to no such relief. I omit reference to lien creditors other than by judgment. The plaintiffs in this case alleged that they had obtained judgments and had caused executions to be issued, and that the proper officer had made an entry of nulla bona thereon. This is sufficient to show that they have obtained an adjudication that they are entitled to payment and have procured executions to issue, but the levying officer can find nothing upon which to levy. They find confronting them a conveyance made by the debtor. Should they levy upon the property, they could not compel the daughters of the debtor (the grantees in the deed) to interpose a claim, or other proceeding, under which the title could be tested and an adjudication had that the property was subject, so that it might be sold free from the cloud cast over it by such deed. Should the grantees see fit to do so, they might let the property be sold for some small amount, and then contest the title with the purchaser. The executions of the plaintiffs amount to a considerable sum, and it is not certain whether, under such conditions, the property would bring enough to pay them, much less other executions outstanding, the holders of which may be made parties under the invitation contained in the petition, and may make a contest for the fund. With proper allegations, these judgment creditors might seek equitable relief, and their petition would not be demurrable on the ground that they had an ample remedy at common law by levy and sale, and were therefore not entitled to institute any equitable proceedings. Thurmond v. Reese, 3 Ga. 449, 48 Am. Dec. 440; Stephens v. Beal, 4 Ga. 319; Lathrop v. McBurney, 71 Ga. 815; Conley v. Buck, 100 Ga. 187, 190, 28 S. E. 97.

[2, 3] 2, 3. There was no error in overruling the ground of the demurrer which set up that there was a misjoinder of plaintiffs. All the plaintiffs had a common interest in setting aside the alleged fraudulent conveyance and subjecting the property conveyed by one of the defendants to the others as tenants in common for the payment of their claims. Neither was there any merit in the contention that there was a misjoinder of causes of action, because the petition showed that one of the plaintiffs had a judgment against Mrs. L. M. Maynard and her husband, J. D. Maynard, while the others held judgments against Mrs. Maynard alone. It was alleged that J. D. Maynard was hopelessly insolvent and nothing could be made out of him. His being named as a defendant in one of the judgments, therefore, did not preclude the plaintiff who held such judgment from joining in the effort to subject property of the other defendant, or render such action a misjoinder of parties plaintiff or of causes of action.

[4] 4. Having held that the plaintiffs in execution might, with proper allegations, maintain an equitable petition for the purpose of subjecting certain property alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed by the defendant in execution to her daughters, and would not be prevented from so doing on the ground that there was an ample common-law remedy, the next question which presents itself is whether the petition contained proper allegations so as to bring it within the ruling thus made. We do not think that it did. It alleged that a conveyance was made by Mrs. Maynard to her two daughters and one to her brother, and charged that these deeds "were part and parcel of a well-laid plan to prevent the petitioners from collecting the amount due them as aforesaid"; but it nowhere alleged directly that the two daughters took any part in such plan, or had any notice of the existence of the fraud, if there was one. It showed that the deed to the daughters was dated about a year before any of the debts held by the plaintiff were contracted, and that the deed to Shepherd bore date after such debts were contracted, but before judgments were obtained. It was alleged that, "although such deeds are [not?] near each other in apparent date, yet your petitioners charge the fact to be that said two deeds were executed at one and the same time, or at all events near the same time." Whether that time was the year before the debts to the plaintiff were created, or afterwards, does not appear. There was some intimation that the plaintiffs doubted whether any consideration was paid by the daughters to the mother, but there was no direct allegation that such payment was not made. It was alleged that the purported consideration of $500, if paid at all, was very inadequate; but this was not a direct allegation that there was no consideration, or that the deed was in fact a voluntary conveyance. If it was intended to make such a charge, the vagueness of the allegation in regard to the time when the deed was executed becomes all the more subject to demurrer, because there is quite a difference between the making of a voluntary conveyance before a debt is created and after its creation. First Nat. Bank v. Bayless, 96 Ga. 684, 23 S. E. 851.

[5] 5. In several paragraphs of the petition the plaintiffs set out collateral evidential facts, which the jury might perhaps believe point in the direction of fraud on the part of the grantees; but it is not good practice to plead evidence, instead of directly alleging an issuable fact. Legitimate inferences may be drawn from evidence in favor of the introducer. Such is not the rule as to pleadings. Thus, in the sixty-seventh paragraph of the petition, it is alleged: "Petitioners show that the said Myrtle and Lillie Mae Maynard have been engaged in no business whatever during the last four or five years, so far as your petitioners are able to ascertain, and therefore have no means for making money." Suppose that the defendants should deny the allegations of this paragraph, what would be put in issue? Would the issue be that the two daughters named had been engaged in no business, or would it be that the plaintiffs had not been able to ascertain that they had been so engaged, or would it be whether, from their inability to so ascertain, they drew a legitimate conclusion that "therefore the two daughters had no means for making money"? If the plaintiffs intended to charge that the two daughters had no means of making money, and had no money, or that they did not in fact pay the $500 stated as a consideration in the conveyance to them, it should have been alleged directly, and not inferentially; because the plaintiffs had been unable to ascertain that the daughters had been engaged in any business. Several of the other paragraphs are of the same character. Without reciting them in full, it is sufficient to say that paragraphs 51, 52, 67, 68, and 69 of the petition should have been stricken on special demurrer, and the general grounds of the demurrer should have been sustained.

One ground of the demurrer undertakes to attack certain paragraphs in the petition in regard to Shepherd, and to refer to such paragraphs by number, but fails to state the numbers of the paragraphs to which reference is made, leaving them blank, and we therefore give it no further consideration. It cannot be said generally that all references to Shepherd were irrelevant. The other grounds of the special demurrer were without merit.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

SHEPHERD et al. v. ARMOUR FERTILIZER WORKS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 263*)—SUIT BY CREDITORS—BILL.

The decision in Maynard v. Armour Fertilizer Works, 75 S. E. 582, decided to-day, in large part controls the present case. Here there is a similar lack of direct allegation of fraud on the part of the grantee in the conveyance attacked, or of notice of fraud, if any existed, as in that case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 771-774, 776-779, 781; Dec. Dig. § 263.*]

2. CREDITORS' SUIT (§ 27*)—REDEMPTION OF LAND CONVEYED—PARTIES—PLEADING.

Where an owner of land made a conveyance for the purpose of securing a debt, and thereafter became indebted to others, and then made a conveyance of the land subject to the security deed, and judgment creditors of such debtor filed an equitable petition to subject the interest conveyed by the latter deed, and to have it decreed that they were entitled to pursue the remedy pointed out by the statute (whereby creditors may redeem property which has been conveyed for the purpose of securing a debt and subject it to their claims), but did not attack the security deed, or the indebtedness secured thereby, or seek to affect the rights of the holder thereof, the petition was not demurrable, at the instance of the debtor and the holder of the deed attacked, on the ground that the grantee in the security deed was not made a party defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Creditors' Suit, Cent. Dig. §§ 100-109, 112, 113; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

3. CREDITORS' SUIT (§ 39*)—REDEMPTION OF LAND CONVEYED AS SECURITY—BILL.

In an equitable petition filed for the purpose indicated in the last headnote, allegations to the effect that the debtor, who was a married woman, conveyed to her two unmarried daughters all of her property except that covered by the last deed, which was made to her brother, and thus conveyed away her property from which creditors could realize payment, were not demurrable as irrelevant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Creditors' Suit, Cent. Dig. §§ 154-164; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 218*)—IMPROPER FACTS—SPECIAL DEMURRER.

Certain paragraphs of the petition, alleging facts not proper to be set out in the pleadings, should have been stricken on special demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 549-566; Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Suit by the Armour Fertilizer Works and others against T. L. Shepherd and others. From a decree overruling a demurrer to the bill, defendants bring error. Reversed.

Haygood & Cutts, of Fitzgerald, and M. B. Cannon, of Abbeville, for plaintiffs in error. Hal Lawson, of Abbeville, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. [1] 1. This is the companion case to that of Maynard v. Armour Fertilizer Works, 75 S. E. 582, this day decided. In that case the plaintiffs sought to subject to the payment of their executions land conveyed by Mrs. Maynard to her two daughters. In this case they are seeking to set aside a deed made by her to her brother, conveying her interest in certain land which she had previously conveyed to a trust company to secure a debt, and to have it decreed that such interest could be subjected to their executions by the creditors upon paying the debt secured by the deed which she had previously made, in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Code, § 6038. What has been said in that case is largely controlling in this. The plaintiffs alleged certain collateral facts, but did not distinctly allege the main fact, which those facts might perhaps have been admissible in evidence as tending to prove. They did not directly allege, either that Shepherd did not pay for the land, or that the deed to him was not made at the time when it bore date, or that he participated in any fraud, or had notice thereof. They charged that the deed was made, not in good faith and for a valuable consideration, but for the purpose of defrauding, hindering, and delaying them; but they failed to connect Shepherd with such alleged fraud by any proper allegation.

[2] 2. The plaintiffs did not seek to obtain a decree which would affect the rights of the trust company, to which a deed had been made to secure an indebtedness, or the rights of the holder of such indebtedness. They did not attack this indebtedness, or its priority, but sought to set aside a conveyance of the equity or interest remaining in Mrs. Maynard after the making of such deed, and to have a decree rendered which would give them the right, as between Mrs. Maynard, her brother, and themselves, to pursue the remedy pointed out in the statute, whereby creditors may redeem property which has been conveyed for the purpose of securing a debt. Whether or not the trust company would have been a proper party, under the allegations and prayers of this petition, it was not a necessary one.

[3, 4] 3, 4. The contention set up by the demurrer, that the allegations in regard to the conveyance made by Mrs. Maynard to her two daughters were irrelevant, is not sound in its entirety. It was competent for the plaintiffs to allege that she had conveyed to her two daughters all of her property, except the equity or interest remaining in her, which she conveyed to her brother, and which by the petition in this case it is sought to subject to the plaintiffs' execution. Such an allegation was legitimate, to show that she had denuded herself of all of her property, and also that the plaintiffs were without adequate legal remedy, and had a right to invoke equitable aid to subject the interest which had been conveyed by the defendant in fi. fa. to her brother. While this is true, as said in the companion case, extended allegations in regard to what the plaintiffs had been able to learn as to whether the daughters had been in business or not, or had inherited money, and the like, were not competent, and should have been stricken on demurrer. Likewise, allegations in regard to the county in which the brother of Mrs. Maynard had lived for many years, the contents of the will of his father, and the details of the settlement of the estate, were not proper to be set forth in extenso in this pleading. If it was intended to charge that he did not pay the consideration set out in the deed to him, and that he had not the means of so doing, it should have been distinctly charged. No discovery was prayed. Under our statute, the cause of action should be plainly, fully, and distinctly set forth. It may not be easy to lay down any fixed rule as to the point where allegations of fact are proper, and where allegations go into the domain of setting out evidence and inferences in detail. But in this case we hold concretely that a number of the plaintiffs' allegations did not raise issues of fact, or make proper statements of fact to elucidate the distinct issue made. Without going into details on this subject, it is sufficient to say that the general grounds of demurrer should have been sustained, and also the special grounds of demurrer to paragraphs 31, 51, 52, 63 to 69, inclusive, and 71, and to so much of paragraph 30 as related to the daughters of Mrs. Maynard. All the other grounds of the demurrer were properly overruled.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

HELMKEN v. MEYER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 29*)—IMPROVEMENTS—RIGHT OF COTENANT.

A cotenant, acting in good faith and for the purpose of honestly bettering the property, and not for the purpose of embarrassing his cotenants, or incumbering the estate, or hindering partition, will be entitled to compensation to the extent that his substantial and useful improvements have added to the value of the common property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 89-92, 94; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

2. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 29*)—IMPROVEMENTS—CLAIM TO COMPENSATION.

Such claim for compensation is an equitable charge upon the land, and not a title or interest in the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 89-92, 94; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

3. DOWER (§ 16*)—IMPROVEMENTS ON COMMON PROPERTY.

In this state a widow is only dowerable in lands of which her husband died seized and possessed. Therefore the widow of an improving cotenant is not entitled to have assigned, in addition to dower in her husband's undivided share in the whole premises, also a dower estate in the improvements placed there by her husband, although in a partition of the premises by sale the husband would be equitably entitled to be compensated for his improvements to the extent they may have enhanced the common property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 61; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by Catherine Meyer against Mary Helmken, as guardian, etc., for the assignment of dower. From a judgment for the plaintiff, defendant brings error. Modified and affirmed.

Osborne & Laurence and E. H. Abrahams, all of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. R. R. Richards and E. S. Elliott, both of Savannah, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. Amelia Meyer died seised and possessed of two contiguous lots of land in the city of Savannah. Together the lots measured 69 feet in width and 114.6 feet in depth. At the time of her death the lots were unimproved. These lots passed by inheritance to her husband, George Meyer, and their two children. In the center of these lots George Meyer at his own expense erected a dwelling house 65 feet in width and 50 feet in depth, and in the rear of the lots an outhouse 12 by 69 feet. He married a second wife, from which marriage two children were born. With his wife and children he occupied the house as a family home until his death. His widow applied for dower, claiming that in the assignment of her dower the improvements were to be considered as the sole property of her deceased husband. The two older children, by their guardian, while admitting that the widow was dowable in one-third of the land, contested the widow's claim that the improvements were to be regarded as the sole property of her deceased husband.

[1] The first step in the solution of the legal proposition presented by the foregoing facts is to ascertain whether George Meyer, at the time of his death, on partition proceedings would be entitled to compensation for the value of the improvements erected by him on land owned in common by himself and the two children of the first marriage. Where land owned by several cotenants is capable of division in kind, and valuable improvements are made by one of them, in a partition between the owners, equity will allow the improving cotenant the benefit of his improvement, if it is practicable to do so. In dividing the land the court may take into consideration the improvements, and assign to the improving cotenant that portion of the land on which they are situated; the division being made on the basis of the unimproved value, if the nature of the land and the improvements permit such a division, and it can be done without injury or injustice to his cotenants. Smith v. Smith, 133 Ga. 170, 65 S. E. 414. It is said, however, that the rule is different where the land is not susceptible of a division in kind, or is rendered so by the erection of the improvements, and that in such cases the improving tenant will not be compensated for his improvements, though the common property is thereby enhanced in value. The reason of the rule for allowing compensation to the improving tenant in common is that when his improvements enhance the value of the common estate, and his cotenants are not injured in any way, or hindered from having partition, they should not be permitted to take advantage of improvements which enrich the common property and to which they have contributed nothing.

The original cost of the improvement is not to be allowed, because it might result in the owners being improved out of their property by an extravagant or unbusiness-like cotenant, and the improvement may have depreciated at the time of the partition sale. Moore v. Williamson, 10 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 323, 73 Am. Dec. 93; Ward v. Ward, 40 W. Va. 611, 21 S. E. 746, 29 L. R. A. 449, 52 Am. St. Rep. 911. The extent of the improving tenant's right to compensation is the enhanced value of the property, due to the improvement. There can be no difference in principle between allowing the equitable claim of a part owner for his improvement in cases where partition may be had in kind, and where a partition can only be accomplished by a sale of the common property. The right of the improving tenant to compensation is not dependent on the divisibility of the land in kind, but upon that broad principle of equity "that a cotenant, acting in good faith and for the purpose of honestly bettering the property, and not for the purpose of embarrassing his cotenants, or encumbering the estate, or hindering partition, will be entitled to compensation to the extent that his substantial and useful improvements have added to the value of the common property." 6 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 719; Hall v. Piddock, 21 N. J. Eq. 314; Moore v. Thorp, 16 R. I. 655, 19 Atl. 321, 7 L. R. A. 731.

In determining whether an improving cotenant should be recompensed for his improvements, as reflected in the increased value of the common premises, all the circumstances attending their erection, their nature, and their relation to the estate improved and to the other cotenants are to be considered. Where it appears that the improvements are permanent and useful to the common estate, and the cotenants are not excluded from the enjoyment of their property, nor has their interest in the property been diminished in value, we see no reason why the improving cotenant should not be equitably entitled to the increased value of the estate caused by the improvement. In the instant case the evidence discloses that Mr. Meyer was a man of small means. He was sole owner of one piece of property and joint owner with his two minor children of an unimproved and unproductive city lot. He sold the property which he owned in severalty, and built a family home on the lot owned by himself and children. These children lived with their father, until his death, in this family home. They were not excluded from their property. Under these circumstances we think that at the time of his death, in an equitable partition of the premises by sale, he would have been entitled to the increased value of the premises due to the improvement.

[2] Is the widow dowerable in this increased value? A widow is entitled to dower in lands held by her deceased husband as a tenant in common, and partition need not precede the setting aside of the dower. Ross v. Wilson, 58 Ga. 249. So that the inquiry is whether this right of her husband to the increased value is appurtenant to his ownership of a part of the estate, so as to impress it with all of its legal incidents, or whether it is only an equitable charge upon the land. By improving land held in common, the cotenant does not enlarge his legal title to the land. His fractional interest in the title to the premises remains unchanged. What he acquires is an equitable right to have an accounting for the increased value of the premises caused by his improvement, in a partition between him and his co-owners. Such a claim is rather an equitable charge upon the land improved than a right, title, or interest in or to it. Curtis v. Poland, 66 Tex. 512, 2 S. W. 39.

[3] In this state a widow is not dowerable in an equity. She is entitled to a dower only in lands of which her husband died seised and possessed; that is to say, lands to which the husband had legal title, or a perfect equity, which is its legal equivalent. Harris v. Powers, 129 Ga. 74, 58 S. E. 1038, 12 Ann. Cas. 475, and cases cited. The widow, therefore, is not dowerable in any equity which her husband might have asserted against his cotenants on a partition of the property. The commissioners assigned to the widow as dower "an undivided one-third of an undivided one-third interest in [the lots described], and also the undivided one-third of the entire improvements upon said lots of land, consisting of the dwelling house and outbuildings thereon, occupied by the said George Meyer as a dwelling at the time of his death." The return of the commissioners was made the judgment of the court. The judgment is erroneous to the extent that the widow should have dower in the improvements as such, and direction is given that so much thereof as allows a dower in the improvements as such be stricken.

Judgment affirmed, with direction. All the Justices concur.

HENDRIX et al. v. BAUHARD BROS.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 14, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 330*)—INDORSEMENT—GUARANTY—EFFECT—TRANSFER OF TITLE.

Where the payees in a promissory note payable to order wrote on the back of it the words, "For value received we hereby warrant the makers of this note financially good on execution," and signed their names after such entry, and negotiated and delivered the note for value, such indorsement was sufficient to transfer title to the note, and, if made before maturity to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of any defense, he would be protected from any defenses which the maker might have except those expressly allowed by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 794-804; Dec. Dig. § 330.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 354*)—MOTION TO STRIKE.

Where the holders of such a note so indorsed brought suit upon it against the makers, and alleged that they bought it from the payees for value before due and without notice of any defense, and the defendants made no denial of such allegation, but sought to set up certain defenses which would not be good against a negotiable note in the hands of an indorsee before due for value and without notice of any defense, there was no error in striking the answer and directing a verdict for the plaintiffs, upon the introduction of evidence.

(a) No question was raised as to whether a verdict should have been taken, or a judgment entered without a verdict.

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 287*)—"INDORSEMENT."

Where a payee of a negotiable note writes his name on the back, such writing constitutes an "indorsement."

Error from Superior Court, Cherokee County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by Bauhard Bros. against L. R. Hendrix and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

P. P. Du Pre, of Canton, for plaintiffs in error. E. W. Coleman, of Canton, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Bauhard Bros. brought suit against the makers of a promissory note payable to the order of Bridges & Flora, a firm. On the back of it was this entry: "For value received, we hereby warrant the makers of this note financially good on execution. Bridges & Flora." The defendants demurred to the petition on the grounds that it set out no cause of action, that it showed on its face that the plaintiffs had no legal title and were not bona fide holders for value, and that the entry on the note by the payees was not a formal indorsement, but only a guaranty that the makers of the note were good for the amount thereof. The presiding judge overruled the demurrer. The defendants filed an answer to the petition, denying its allegations; but they withdrew the denial to the paragraph in which the plaintiffs alleged that they bought from the payees the note for value before due and without notice of any defense. The presiding judge thereupon, on motion, struck the answer, and, after the introduction of evidence, directed a verdict for the plaintiff. Defendants excepted.

[1] 1. It was not denied that the plaintiffs purchased the note from the payees for value before due and without notice of any defect or defense. The controlling question is whether the entry on the back of the note constituted an indorsement transferring title thereto to the purchasers, with the protection which belongs to bona fide holders for value before due and without notice, or whether it was a mere contract of guaranty, and was insufficient to operate as an indorsement. Let it be assumed that in order to transfer the legal title to a promissory note payable to order, and cut off defenses which the maker would have against the payee, it should be indorsed. Farris v. Wells, 68 Ga. 604; Benson v. Abbott, 95 Ga. 70, 22 S. E. 127; Haug v. Riley, 101 Ga. 372, 375, 29 S. E. 44, 40 L. R. A. 244. On the subject of indorsements like the one here involved there are two conflicting lines of authority. On the one hand, it has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States and some inferior federal courts, and by the courts of two or three states, that an entry of a guaranty, followed by the signature of the payee on the back of a note payable to order, does not amount to such an indorsement as to carry title and cut off defenses existing against the paper. Central Trust Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 68, 25 L. Ed. 876; Edgerly v. Lawson, 176 Mass. 551, 57 N. E. 1020, 51 L. R. A. 432 (though some of the earlier decisions in Massachusetts seemed inclined to take a contrary view). The leading case on this side of the question (discussing it with reference to the common law) is the one decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. It cites the Snevely Case, 1 Watts & S. (Pa.) 203, and two cases from New York. The reasoning on which this class of cases is based is that the indorsement is not in blank, but is filled up; that it expresses fully the contract, and can raise no implication of another. Opposed to this view are the decisions in a very large number of states. Numerically, the latter class of decisions greatly preponderates, and we think the reasoning on which they are based is sounder than that contained in the class first mentioned.

At common law (though not so under the statute of this state) the general rule was that choses in action were not assignable, so that the assignee could sue in his own name. He acquired only an equitable title, had to sue in the name of the assignor for his use, and was subject to the defenses which could be made against the assignor. Growing out of the necessities of commerce, there was an exception to this rule in favor of negotiable instruments. They were transferable by indorsement and delivery, and the indorsee could sue in his own name. Those payable to bearer required no indorsement. A bona fide indorsee for value before maturity and without notice of any defense was protected. No particular form was necessary to constitute an indorsement. The mere signing of the name of the person to whose order the note was payable, upon the back of it, was sufficient. In 2 Parsons on Notes and Bills, 14, it is said: "Although it is generally true that no particular and precise form of words is necessary to constitute a note or bill, or an indorsement, yet this principle must be regarded as subject to some qualification. So far as the matter of transfer is concerned, the proposition is almost absolutely true. But as to the obligations cast upon the indorser by the act of indorsement, it is clear that these may vary with the form of the indorsement." This recognizes clearly the fact that no particular form is necessary for the transferring of title, although the obligation of the indorser may be varied. In Dunham v. Peterson, 5 N. D. 414, 67 N. W. 293, 36 L. R. A. 232, 57 Am. St. Rep. 558, the opinion was well reasoned. It was held that where a person to whose order a note was payable wrote on the back thereof a contract of guaranty of payment, and signed it, he became an indorser with enlarged liability, and that the mere writing of a guaranty above his name did not affect the character of his act as indorser. The indorsement there considered was, "For value received I hereby guaranty the within note, waiving notice of protest and demand," beneath which was signed the name of the payee. In the opinion it was said: "The inquiry is two-fold: (1) Was the note so transferred as to pass the legal title to it at common law? (2) Does the manner of the transfer indicate a purpose to destroy negotiable character of the instrument? The extent of the liability of the payee who indorses the note is not a decisive test. Indeed, it is no test at all. He may incur no liabilities whatever, as indorsing without recourse, and yet in such a case the note has been negotiated to an indorsee within the law merchant, and the latter is protected as a bona fide purchaser if the other elements necessary to such protection exist. Indeed, the payee need not indorse at all to entitle the purchaser to protection if the note be payable to bearer, or to the payee by name or bearer. Tescher v. Merea, 118 Ind. 586, 21 N. E. 316. This is also true after it has been indorsed generally by the person who is named as payee. His indorsee may, without himself indorsing it, transfer it, and cut off all defenses. On the other hand, it is elementary that the indorser may enlarge his liability without destroying the right of his indorsee to protection as an innocent purchaser. * * * He may incur more liability, or less liability, or no liability at all; and yet the purchaser may be an indorsee, and protected as such. Nor is the form of the indorsement material. It is an indorsement, although it is in terms an assignment. This was held at an early time in England. Richards v. Frankum, 9 Car. & P. 221. And, with the exception of two states, it appears to be the law in this country." See, also, 2 Randolph on Com. Paper (2d Ed.) § 704; 2 Daniel on Neg. Instr. (5th Ed.) § 1781 et seq.; Partridge v. Davis, 20 Vt. 499; Bissell v. Gowdy, 31 Conn. 47; Judson v. Gookwin, 37 Ill. 286; Robinson v. Lair, 31 Iowa, 9; Kellogg v. Douglas County Bank, 58 Kan. 43, 48 Pac. 587; Williams v. Hagar, 50 Me. 9; Elgin City Banking Co. v. Zelch, 57 Minn. 487, 59 N. W. 544; Buck v. Davenport Sav. Bank, 29 Neb. 407, 45 N. W. 776, 28 Am. St. Rep. 392; Heard v. Dubuque County Bank, 8 Neb. 10, 30 Am. Rep. 811; Delsman v. Friedlander, 40 Or. 33, 66 Pac. 297; Barrett v. May, 2 Bailey (S. C.) 1; Donnerberg v. Oppenheimer, 15 Wash. 290, 46 Pac. 254; National Exchange Bank v. McElfish Clay Mfg. Co., 48 W. Va. 406, 37 S. E. 541; Walker v. O'Reilly, 7 U. C. L. J. 300.

[3] We now come to consider more particularly the statute and decisions in this state. By Civil Code, § 4275, it is declared that "any person indorsing or transferring a negotiable instrument may limit his own liability upon such indorsement or transfer, by express restrictions therein." This declares a general rule, and expressly recognizes the right in this state of a person indorsing a negotiable instrument to limit his liability. If there is no limitation, but a mere indorsement in blank, the general liability resulting therefrom applies. No reason appears why an indorser may not enlarge his liability, as well as limit it. The writing of his name upon the back of a negotiable note by the payee thereof constitutes an indorsement. The addition of a limitation or enlargement of liability does not make it cease to be an indorsement sufficient to carry title to the note, although it may restrict or enlarge the liability of the indorser. From an early date it has been recognized in the decisions of this court that no express form of words was necessary to constitute an indorsement which would operate to convey title. There is, strictly speaking, a difference between an indorsement and an assignment; but in Vanzant v. Arnold, 31 Ga. 210, it was held that, where defendants negotiated notes with the following entry on the back: "For value received we assign the within notes to A., J. & H., and H. E. D. & Co., waiving demand and notice, and guarantee the payment of the same"—they were liable as indorsers. In Gelser Mfg. Co. v. Jones, 90 Ga. 307, 17 S. E. 81, on the back of a note payable to the Gelser Manufacturing Company, or order, Jones & Toole, who were neither makers, nor the payees, made and signed this indorsement, "For a consideration not herein named, we guarantee the payment of this claim to the Gelser Manufacturing Co." and it was held that the making of this entry by such third parties on the back of the note did not constitute them indorsers, but guarantors. In the opinion, Chief Justice Bleckley said: "By its very nature a contract of indorsement cannot be entered into with the payee of a promissory note as indorsee; but a contract of guaranty may be made with him as well as with any subsequent holder. Nor does the mere indorsement of a contract upon a note render the signer of the contract an indorser, within the legal and proper meaning of the term. It is true that in a physical sense he is an indorser by the mere position of his name upon the paper; but we apprehend that the Constitution intends by the term 'indorser' to refer to a person who has entered into a contract of indorsement as distinguished from contracts of a different class. Had the Gelser Manufacturing Company, the payee of these notes, signed a contract upon them with a third person in the terms of that placed thereon by Jones & Toole, and had then or afterwards negotiated them to such third person, the Gelser Company could, under our law, be sued and made answerable as indorser."

It has been suggested that the last sentence, as to what would have been the effect of signing such a contract on the back of the note by the payees thereof, was obiter dictum. Perhaps it was so; but it was a dictum of a great and learned judge, and correctly states the law of Georgia. Nor do we think that this statement was in conflict with the rest of the decision. The difference between an indorsement on a promissory note by one who is not the payee thereof, who has no title to transfer, and who cannot indorse the note to the promisee of it, in the legal meaning of that term, and a similar indorsement placed on the note by the payee thereof in the progress of negotiating it, is great. In Patillo v. Alexander, 96 Ga. 60, 22 S. E. 646, 29 L. R. A. 616, a promissory note was executed and payable in the state of Tennessee to a named payee or order. It was presumed that the common law was in force there, and the case was considered in the light of that law. The payee wrote on the back of the note above his signature these words: "I guarantee attorney's fees up to 10 per cent. If this note has to be collected by law, on [and?] its prompt payment." It was held that this agreement having been made for the purpose and in the course of negotiation, by its terms the payee became an indorser and liable as such, with a superadded liability for such reasonable sums, not exceeding 10 per cent., as might be expended for attorney's fees by the holder in the collection of the note, and, further, that in order to hold such indorser for the payment of the note it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove presentation and notice of nonpayment by the maker. If that indorsement in the course of negotiation made the payee liable as an indorser, with a superadded liability, and imposed upon the purchaser the duty of treating him as an indorser, surely it was a sufficient indorsement to transfer the title to the note, and accordingly to afford to the holder, if he took before maturity for value and without notice, the protection against defenses applicable to such a situation. After an extended discussion for the purposes of establishing the ruling above stated, the case of Trust Company v. National Bank, 101 U. S. 68, 25 L. Ed. 876, supra, was cited. Doubtless, in consideration of the high authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, some effort was made to differentiate the case then under consideration from the one cited. But, whether this was successfully done or not, the whole trend of the opinion establishes the principle which has been above announced. There were also some suggestions as to possibilities in cases of a different character. These were not authoritative rulings, and we need not discuss them.

In connection with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case mentioned, attention may be called to the case of Snevily v. Ekel, 1 Watts & S. (Pa.) 203, supra, which was there cited as authority. In that case a promissory note was made by John Smull, payable to John Snevily or order. On the back of it were written the words, "I transfer the within note to John Ekel and guarantee the payment of the same," after which was signed the name of John Snevily, and below it the name of John Ekel. It was held that this was a special guaranty of payment, and could not be treated as a blank indorsement, so as to enable any holder to sue the guarantor in his own name. If this ruling was based on the ground that it was a transfer, and contained a guaranty of payment, it was directly in conflict with the ruling of this court in Vanzant v. Arnold, supra. Note, also, Dunning v. Heller, 103 Pa. 269, 272. In Baldwin Fertilizer Co. v. Carmichael, 116 Ga. 762, 42 S. E. 1002, an entry was made on the back of a note by the payee thereof, or his attorney, in these words: "For value received, I transfer the within note to Baldwin Fertilizer Co., and guarantee it as free from any defense that could be made under section 2785 of the Code of Georgia, and also guarantee payment in full on the day it is due." It was held that this was a contract of indorsement. In the opinion, Mr. Justice Cobb said: "Under the former decisions of this court, the contract sued on seems to be one of indorsement. It was made, according to the allegations of the petition, for the purpose of transferring the note to the plaintiff in satisfaction of a claim held by it against the defendant, and the mere use of the word 'guarantee' will not make the contract one of guaranty. The case of Patillo v. Alexander, 96 Ga. 60, 22

It has been suggested that an indorsement of the character of the one now under consideration, accompanied by a physical transfer of the paper, may operate to pass title to the instrument, and give the holder the right to treat the payee as an indorser, with a prescribed liability, but that such an indorsement, without express words of transfer or assignment, does not constitute the holder such a purchaser for value as to protect him from defenses already accrued to the maker against the original payee. In this distinction we cannot concur. An entry on the back of a note payable to order, signed by the payee, is either an indorsement, or it is not an indorsement, in the legal sense of the term. Of course, an entry may be physically indorsed or written on the back of a note, without being in the legal sense an indorsement; but we are unable to accede to the proposition that it may be both an indorsement and not an indorsement. If it is such an indorsement of a negotiable note as will pass the legal title to it upon delivery, and will place on the indorsee the duty of recognizing the indorser as such and of treating him as an indorser under the law merchant, it would be peculiar if it were an indorsement to the holder for burdens, but not for benefits. We cannot concur in the argument that the indorsement under consideration is an indorsement sufficient to carry legal title upon delivery, but not sufficient to give the corresponding benefit to him who thus acquires it, arising from being a bona fide taker before due and for value. In some of the cases before this court, and other courts, the question has been, not whether the addition of words of transfer or assignment and warranty to the indorsement aided it, but whether they prevented its being an indorsement in the legal sense, on the ground that they were not words strictly descriptive of that relation. Of course, there must be delivery of the instrument in order to carry title, even with the most formal or general indorsement.

The note now under consideration was payable to the order of the payees. When they wrote upon the back of it that for value received they warranted the makers of the note financially good on execution, and sold and delivered it for value to a third person with no other indorsement (save an entry of a credit), it must be assumed that they intended to accomplish something by so doing. They did not intend to warrant to themselves the financial standing of the makers, nor did they mean that they had received value from themselves for so doing. If not to themselves, then to whom did they make such warranty? Clearly to some other person, who should be the owner of the note. Moreover, the statement that the financial status of the makers was warranted "good on execution" indicates the expectation that execution would issue in favor of some person other than themselves against the makers. But, unless this indorsement and delivery for value carried the legal title to the note to the person to whom it was so delivered, it would remain in the payees, and no execution could issue in favor of another person. Nor can we agree with the statement made in Lamourieux v. Hewitt, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 308, which is cited by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Trust Company Case, to which reference has already been made, that the payee making such an indorsement on a note would be liable upon his guaranty, not as an indorser of negotiable paper, but as a party to a special contract, "which might have been written on a separate piece of paper as well as on the back of the note." In that clause adheres the fallacy of the argument. There is a wide difference between writing on a separate piece of paper and a payee's writing something over his name on the back of a promissory note. If he should simply write his name on a separate sheet of blank paper, it would bind him to nothing; but if he writes his name on the back of a promissory note payable to his order, he becomes an indorser. So, if he should write an assignment, or a guaranty, or some other agreement, on a separate sheet of paper, and sign it, that would be a distinct contract; but when he writes his name upon the back of a note payable to his order, the addition of words which either limit or enlarge the usual liability on his part which would arise from a blank indorsement does not destroy the fact that the entry is an indorsement upon a negotiable paper, or prevent its efficacy as a method of passing the legal title upon negotiation, at least unless there is something in the indorsement to show an intention to destroy the negotiable character of the paper.

[2] 2. What has been said above practically controls the entire case. The plaintiffs alleged that they bought the note from the payees for value before due and without notice of any defense. The defendants first denied this in their answer, but they withdrew their denial. This left it to be taken as true, and they evidently placed their reliance upon the question of the sufficiency of the indorsement to pass the legal title, so as to cut them off from certain defenses which they claimed to have as against the original payees. These defenses were not of a character which, under the statute, could be set up against a bona fide holder for value before maturity and without notice. It follows from what has been said that the legal title to the note passed to the plaintiffs, and that there was no error in striking the answer and directing a verdict in their favor, under the evidence. No question was raised as to whether a verdict or a judgment without a verdict was proper.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

JEWELL v. FRANKLIN LIFE INS. CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DISCOVERY (§ 96*)—BOOKS AND PAPERS—DUTY TO PRODUCE—DEFENSES.

Where a notice to produce books and papers served on a nonresident defendant is too extensive in range, necessarily including a great mass of irrelevant matter, and it appears that their production will be at great expense and inconvenience, and to the serious injury of the party's business, and he offers in open court to accord the opposite party the right to inspect and make copies of such parts as is desired, and shows that some of the papers demanded are beyond his power to produce, it is not error for the court to refuse a peremptory order requiring their production on penalty of dismissing the party's plea to the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Discovery, Cent. Dig. § 123; Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

2. VERDICT—EVIDENCE.

A verdict for the defendant was demanded by the evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

Suit by M. T. Jewell against the Franklin Life Insurance Company. From an order denying a motion to compel defendant to produce books and papers, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

H. H. Dean, of Gainesville, for plaintiff in error. Jones, Jones, Hocker & Davis, of St. Louis, Mo., and W. A. Charters, of Gainesville, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. This is a suit by M. T. Jewell against the Franklin Life Insurance Company, of Springfield, Ill., on three insurance policies, similar in form and provisions, on the life of the plaintiff's husband. The company pleaded that the policies had lapsed from nonpayment of premiums at the time of the death of the insured. The plaintiff served the defendant with a notice to produce its charter, by-laws, resolutions showing dividends earned and not paid out, all the company's books since its incorporation, including minute books, cashbooks, journals, day-books, and all books of original and final entry, showing the disbursements and earnings of the company, books containing an entry of all the company's property and its appraised value, and of all its assets, books containing a list of its policy holders, and also all notes, mortgages, bonds, choses in action, and all other assets of the company. The defendant answered that it would produce its charter and by-laws, but to comply with the demands of the notice to transport all of its records would be destructive of its business, and would expose all of its records to the possibility of loss in transportation; that the books were daily needed at the home office, and to comply with the notice to produce all of its books and records since its incorporation would work irreparable injury to the company; that the books were open to inspection of the plaintiff or her counsel, or any agent she might appoint, at the home office of the company, and copies could be made of such as the plaintiff wished; that it was unable to comply with the notice as to the resolutions as to dividends, because no such resolutions existed; and that it was unable to comply with the notice to produce all of its notes, mortgages, etc., as the greater part of them were held in trust by the superintendent of the insurance department of the state of Illinois. The defendant also demurred ore tenus to the sufficiency of the notice, on the ground that it was too vague and indefinite. The plaintiff's counsel stated in his place that he expected to prove, by the documentary evidence referred to in the notice to produce, that the defendant company was a mutual company, and that sufficient profits had been earned to extend the policy of the insured beyond his death, and moved for a peremptory order requiring the production of the documents within a reasonable time, or, in default thereof, that the defendant's plea be dismissed. The court denied the motion. The case proceeded to trial, and a verdict for the defendant was directed. The plaintiff sued out a bill of exceptions, complaining of these two rulings.

[1] 1. The form of the policy was similar to that construed in the case of Black v. Franklin Insurance Company, 133 Ga. 859, 67 S. E. 79. The insured did not advance the cash to pay the full premium provided by the policy, but only three-fourths of it; the remaining fourth being paid out of a loan made to him by the company. In the Black Case it was held that this loan was an indebtedness on account of the policy, and fell within the provision of the policy that, "should there be any indebtedness on account of this policy at the time of default in the payment of any premium, the value of the several options of settlement stated in the foregoing table will be correspondingly reduced." The option applicable to the present case relates to continued insurance. In the instant case the plaintiff's purpose was to show that the amount due on each policy as dividends earned at the time of the default of the insured in paying his premiums was more than sufficient to extend the policies beyond the date of the death of the insured, after deducting all indebtedness on account of the policy. In order to prove this contention, it was asserted that all the books and papers of the plaintiff company were necessary. Now, it is manifest that in this immense mass of documentary evidence there must be much that is irrelevant and immaterial. The notice calls for every book and record since the organization of the company. The description of them is most vague and indefinite. All minute books, all books of original and final entry, showing the disbursements and earnings of the company, are called for. It was not stated by counsel that the books would show that a dividend had been declared which was sufficient to extend the insurance policy, but that a dividend had been earned and should have been allotted to these policies, and which would have been large enough to extend the policies beyond the date of the insured's death. In other words, an accounting of the internal affairs of a foreign corporation is desired; and in order to accomplish this result the entire books and papers must be brought from a distant state, at great risk of loss, at great expense, and with the result of a temporary suspension of the company's business. The answer also developed that some of the papers demanded were in the custody of the insurance commissioner of the state of Illinois and beyond the power of the party to produce. No traverse was made to the response to the notice. Where a notice to produce books and papers, served on a nonresident defendant, is too extensive in range, necessarily including a great mass of irrelevant matter, and it appears that their production will be a great expense and inconvenience, and to the serious injury of the party's business, and he offers in open court to accord the opposite party the right to inspect and make copies of such parts as is desired, and shows that some of the papers demanded are beyond his power to produce, it is not error for the court to refuse a peremptory order requiring their production on penalty of dismissing the party's plea to the action. See, in this connection, Parish v. Weed, 79 Ga. 682, 7 S. E. 138; Georgia Iron Company v. Etowah Iron Company, 104 Ga. 395, 30 S. E. 878; Condon v. Mutual Reserve etc., Association, 89 Md. 99, 42 Atl. 944, 44 L. R. A. 149, 73 Am. St. Rep. 169; Clark v. Association, 14 App. D. C. 154, 43 L. R. A. 390.

[2] 2. The only deduction to be legally drawn from the evidence is that the policies had lapsed prior to the death of the insured, and there was no error in directing a verdict for the defendant.

TOMPKINS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia, Aug. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 278)—GRAND JURY (§ 17*)—QUALIFICATIONS.

By Penal Code, § 824, grand jurors who have served at one regular term of the superior court are declared ineligible for jury duty at the next succeeding regular term.

(a) In such a case a challenge to the array of the grand jury, made before the indictment is found, should be sustained by the trial judge.

(b) Likewise a plea in abatement, filed after the indictment is found and before arraignment of the defendant, based on substantially the same ground, should be sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 638-642; Dec. Dig. § 278;* Grand Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-47, 52; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)2. GRAND JURY (§ 5) — GRAND JURORS — SERVICE—ELIGIBILITY.

Pen. Code 1910, § 824, provides that any juror who has served as a grand or traverse juror at any session of the superior court shall be ineligible for duty as a juror at the next succeeding term of the superior court, providing that nothing contained therein should prevent any traverse juror from serving as a grand juror at the next term of the superior court of his county. Section 822 declares that at the close of each term the judge shall draw the grand jurors; but this was changed by Act Aug. 15, 1911 (Laws 1911, p. 81), creating the Dublin circuit, which, after stating the times for holding court in each of the counties of the circuit, declares that the grand juries of the counties of that circuit shall not be convened, except for the spring and fall terms of the court, unless in the discretion of the presiding judge it shall be deemed expedient to call a special session of the grand jury at some other term. Held that, in order to make such latter provision conform to section 824, it should be construed only to authorize the judge to call a special session of the grand jury at some other term at which under the general law it is competent to call in the same grand jury, and did not authorize the same jurors to serve at the succeeding regular term.

Error from Superior Court, Laurens County; K. J. Hawkins, Judge.

Steve Tompkins was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Reversed.

S. P. New, Geo. B. Davis, and Fred Kea, all of Dublin, for plaintiff in error. E. D. Graham, Sol. Gen., of McRae, and T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., for the State.

HILL, J. Steve Tompkins was indicted on the charge of murder, and was found guilty by the jury, without recommendation. Before the indictment was found true, the defendant challenged the array of the grand jury, on the ground that the same grand jury had served at the regular term of the superior court next preceding that at which the jury was impaneled. The court overruled the challenge. After the indictment was returned, the defendant filed a plea in abatement on various grounds, but substantially on the same grounds as the challenge to the array. This plea was also overruled by the court. After verdict, a motion for a new trial was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

[1] Under the system as it existed before the Dublin circuit was created, Laurens county was in the Oconee circuit, and the terms of its superior court were in January and July. Acts 1910, p. 1332. In July, 1911, a grand jury was drawn, which normally would be impaneled at the following January term, 1912. On August 18, 1911, the act was approved which created the Dublin circuit. It did not expressly provide at what term the grand jury which had been previously drawn should be impaneled. It created quarterly sessions for the courts in the Dublin circuit. In Laurens county the sessions were to begin on the fourth Mondays in January, April, July, and October. Acts 1911, p. 81. If nothing more was said, the grand jury would naturally stand for the January term, 1912, at which next following term the grand and traverse jurors would be impaneled according to the general law. Penal Code, § 822, declares that at the close of each term the judge shall draw grand jurors; but the act creating the Dublin circuit undertook to change this general law. After stating the times for holding court in each of the counties of the circuit, it then contained this clause: "Provided, however, that the grand juries of the counties of this circuit shall not be convened except for the spring and fall terms of the court, unless in the discretion of the presiding judge it shall be deemed expedient to call a special session of the grand jury at some other term." Acts 1911, p. 81, § 6. It appears that the grand jury which had been previously drawn was actually impaneled and charged, and served at the January term, 1912, of Laurens superior court. For the April term, 1912, no new grand jury was drawn, but in vacation preceding that term the presiding judge ordered the grand jury which had served at the January term to return and serve at the April term. They were not resworn, or reimpaneled, or recharged, but all served, with the same foreman, except that, there being two vacancies, two talesmen were sworn to fill up the jury.

[2] What possible constructions can be placed upon the proviso of the act of August 18, 1911, as applicable to the grand jury drawn in July of that year? The act not expressly stating at what term they should be impaneled, and they having been drawn for the January term before the new circuit was created, it may be held that they were properly impaneled and sworn, and served at that term, which was the next after they were drawn; or, under the terms of the act, inasmuch as it is declared that the grand juries of the counties of the circuit shall not be convened except for the spring and fall terms of the court, unless under certain contingencies, it is possible to construe this as meaning the grand jury which had been previously drawn, the grand jury for the spring term. If by virtue of the fact that the grand jury had been drawn in July for the next succeeding term, and by reason of the fact that the act makes no special provision for the session of the previously drawn grand jury, it would take the usual course and be the grand jury for the term succeeding its drawing, then it was the grand jury for the January term and was regularly impaneled at that term. If this be so, and they were legally impaneled and served at that term, then Penal Code, § 824, declares that "any juror who has served as a grand or traverse juror at any session of the superior courts, county courts, or city courts in this state shall be ineligible for duty as a juror at the next succeeding term of said superior court, county court, or city court, in which he has previously served: Provided, nothing herein contained shall prevent any traverse juror from serving as a grand juror at the next term of the superior court of his county." So that, if the grand jury were legally impaneled at the January term of Laurens superior court (which seems to be the more probable construction), it was directly in the teeth of the statute if they served at the next succeeding regular term, unless the general law is to be treated as overridden by the last clause in the proviso of the act of August 18, 1911, above quoted. Section 796 of the Penal Code of 1910 does not help the situation. It only make provisions for adjourned and special terms; and the April term of Laurens superior court was neither, but was a regular term, held at the time fixed by law.

If it should be held that the Legislature contemplated that the grand jury which was drawn in July, 1911, were not to be impaneled at the January term, or then serve, but that the precepts were to be returnable to the April term, then their whole session in January was unlawful, and the impaneling and service were without authority of law; and inasmuch as they were not reimpaneled and sworn at the April term, they were never lawfully impaneled, sworn, or authorized to serve and find indictments. The proviso, which says that the grand jury shall not be convened, except for "the spring and fall terms of the court," unless upon a contingency, we take to mean the April and October terms, because these are the only two terms which are held in the spring and fall, respectively, and the act evidently contemplates that something is excluded by the limitation to the spring and fall terms. Thus we arrive at the conclusion, either that the grand jury was not lawfully impaneled at the January term, or that it was. If it was not lawfully impaneled, then it has never been impaneled, because there is no claim that the jurors were reimpaneled, or resworn, at the April term, and grand jurors who have not been lawfully impaneled or sworn have no more authority to find bills of indictment than the same number of citizens outside of the courthouse. They are not a grand jury in law. Or else, if they were lawfully impaneled and lawfully served at the January term, under the express provisions of the general law they could not serve at the next succeeding term. The proviso of the act of August 18, 1911, says: "Unless in the discretion of the presiding judge it shall be deemed expedient to call a special session of the grand jury at some other term." What does this mean? Does it mean that, after the grand jury has been lawfully impaneled at the spring and fall term, the judge may call a special session of them at some other term of the same character? Or does it mean that he may call a session of the same grand jury at some other term? Or does it mean that he can summon a grand jury in the regular way at another term, and what terms are meant? Does it mean that in the face of the general law he can, in the Dublin superior courts, have the same grand jury to sit at successive terms? Or does it mean that he can call them at some special or adjourned term, in harmony with the general law?

The Constitution declares that, so far as regulated by law, the practice in all courts of the same grade or class shall be uniform. Civil Code, § 6527. We do not see how it can possibly be held to be uniformity of practice to prohibit by general law every superior court in the state from allowing the same grand jury to sit at successive regular terms of the court, and yet by the act creating the Dublin circuit to establish that the judge thereof, in his discretion, may have the same grand jury to sit at successive terms of court. The general law says it shall not be done; and if we give that construction to this law, it says it shall be done. It is not easy to harmonize this proviso with the general law in any manner; but it is a well-established rule of construction that if an act of the Legislature can properly be given one construction which upholds its constitutionality, and another which would render it unconstitutional, the former is rather to prevail. Perhaps this should be carried a step farther, so as to give the act as near a constitutional construction as possible. At any rate, it more nearly approximates the general law to hold that the provision that the judge can call a special session of the grand jury "at some other term" means some other term at which, under the general law, it is competent to call in the same grand jury. At least, to hold that under this law the same grand jury can serve at successive regular terms of court, when this is positively forbidden by the general law, would be to give to this provision in the act creating the Dublin circuit a construction which would render it clearly unconstitutional. So that, whatever construction may be given it, it seems to us that the indictment found by the grand jury in the present case was unlawful, and that the judge erred in not sustaining the challenge to the grand jury, and, after overruling it, likewise erred in overruling the plea in abatement.

This decision is not based upon a mere technicality, but upon a substantial violation of the plain terms of the statute, which declares that no grand juror shall serve the next succeeding term of court to that at which he has already served as a grand juror. In McFarlin v. State, 121 Ga. 329, 330, 331, 49 S. E. 267, this court, speaking through Justice Lamar (now Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States), in reference to the provision of law that grand jurors shall not render consecutive service, said: "The language of the statute and the public policy to be subserved apply as well to grand as to petit jurors. It is intended as a relief, and to equalize jury duty. But it is also intended to prevent the same persons from constantly serving, whether they wish to or not. One grand jury may return no bill. Grand juries are charged with many important public duties. The same facts in both classes of subjects may come before the succeeding body, and the public is entitled to a complete change of membership from term to term. Such is the language of the law; and where the objection is seasonably made, advantage can be taken of the fact that the body has not been duly constituted." And in Finnegan v. State, 57 Ga. 427, where the judgment was reversed because the court sustained the demurrer filed to a plea in abatement based on an alleged illegal drawing of the grand jury, Chief Justice Warner (at page 430) said: "Whenever the state undertakes to deprive one of its citizens of his life or liberty, it is the duty of the courts to see that it is done in accordance with the laws of the land, and not otherwise. In the administration of criminal law, judicial discretion should not be tolerated. The law, as it is prescribed by the supreme power of the state, should be the rule of conduct for the courts as well as for the citizens." It follows, from what has been said above, that the court erred in overruling the challenge to the array of the grand jury and the plea in abatement.

The ruling here made makes it unnecessary to consider the other assignments of error, inasmuch as it renders the whole proceeding in the court below nugatory.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

ATKINSON, J. I concur in the result, but not in all that is said in the opinion.

ADAMS EXPRESS CO. v. MELLICHAMP.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 153*)—EXPRESS COMPANIES—LOSS OF GOODS—LIMITED LIABILITY.

Under the facts hypothetically stated in the first question propounded by the Court of Appeals to this court, the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the express company on account of the negligent loss of a diamond ring while in transportation. The measure of his recovery would be the value of the property lost, and would not be limited to $50 by reason of the fact that the prepared form of express receipt contained a clause which provided that, "in consideration of the rate charged for carrying said property, which is regulated by the value thereof and is based upon a valuation not exceeding $50 unless a greater value is declared, the shipper agrees that the value of said property is not more than $50, unless a greater value is stated herein, and that the company shall not be liable in any event for more than the value so stated, nor for more than $50 if no value is stated herein."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 687-690; Dec. Dig. § 153.*]

2. EXPRESS COMPANIES—LIMITED LIABILITY—PRIOR DECISION—STARE DECISIS.

Substantially this case is covered by the decision in Southern Express Co. v. Hanaw, 134 Ga. 445, 67 S. E. 944, 137 Am. St. Rep. 227, and there is no valid distinction between that case and the one at bar, because in the latter the shipper, as the agent of the consignee, himself filled out the express receipt and failed to disclose to the carrier the actual value and contents of the package consigned; nor does this fact, in connection with the other facts hypothetically stated by the Court of Appeals, differentiate the case at bar from that above stated.

3. CARRIERS (§ 148*)—EXPRESS COMPANIES—LIMITED LIABILITY—NEGLIGENCE—INTERSTATE COMMERCE AND ELKINS ACTS.

So far as it concerns the right of the plaintiff to recover of the common carrier and the extent of such recovery, the case at bar is neither controlled nor affected by the Interstate Commerce Act (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 379 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3154]), as amended June 29, 1906 (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, 34 Stat. 584 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1288]), "and especially section 10 thereof," or by the act of Congress known as the "Elkins Act" (Act Feb. 19, 1903, c. 708, 32 Stat. 847 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1309]), as amended June 29, 1906 (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, 34 Stat. 584 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1288]). Nor, in view of the provisions of those acts of Congress, does any reason appear why the decision of this court in Southern Express Co. v. Hanaw, supra, should be overruled or modified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 660, 686; Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

Certified Questions from Court of Appeals.

Action by A. P. Mellichamp against the Adams Express Company. On certified questions by the Court of Appeals.

The Court of Appeals certified the following questions:

"1. Upon the facts hereinafter stated, is the plaintiff entitled to recover; and, if so, should his recovery be limited to $50, or can he recover the actual value of the goods lost? The Adams Express Company issued, in the city of New York, an express receipt for a small package about 1½ by 2 inches in size, and sealed at the time it was delivered to the carrier. The package contained a diamond ring worth $175 to $300. The shipper was a jeweler in New York, and for many years had been in the habit of making shipments by express through the defendant in the same manner this shipment was made, to wit: The shipping clerk would fill out an express receipt containing the following clause: 'In consideration of the rate charged for carrying said property, which is regulated by the value thereof and is based upon a valuation of not exceeding $50 unless a greater value is declared, the shipper agrees that the value of said property is not more than $50, unless a greater value is stated herein, and that the company shall not be liable in any event for more than the value so stated, nor for more than $50 if no value is stated herein.' On the receipt was a blank space for the value of the article to be written. The clerk had general instructions not to value an article shipped unless expressly authorized to do so by his employer. On the occasion in question the value was not declared; but the carrier's agent called at the jeweler's place of business, as was the custom, and received from the clerk the package and the receipt, with all the blanks filled in except that for the value of the article, which was left open. The receipt was stamped by the carrier's agent, 'Value asked and not given.' But in point of fact the carrier's agent did not in the particular instance in question ask the clerk to declare the value of the article, and was not informed as to the contents of the package. The shipper knew that the express charges were based on the value of the article shipped, and that an article of the value of $50 would be carried for about one-third the rate of an article of the same size and weight worth $300, and for about one-half of the rate of such an article worth $175. The shipper had sent several thousand packages of jewelry over the lines of the defendant company during the last 25 or 30 years. Sometimes he would declare the value of the packages, and sometimes he would not. Sometimes the carrier would ask that the value and the contents of the package be disclosed, and sometimes it would make no inquiry as to these matters. The package in question contained a diamond ring that had been previously sent to the jeweler in New York by the plaintiff's husband to be repaired, and it was consigned by the New York jeweler to the plaintiff's husband. The husband knew that under the published authorized rates the express charges would be greater upon an article worth from $175 to $300 than upon one of the same size and weight worth $50. The article was lost in transit, and no express charges were ever paid by or demanded from either the shipper or the consignee by the carrier. The owner has sued the carrier for the value of the goods lost.

"2. Is there any valid distinction between the case in hand and that of Southern Express Co. v. Hanaw, 134 Ga. 445, 67 S. E. 944, 137 Am. St. Rep. 227, because in that [this?] case the shipper, as the agent of the consignee, himself filled out the express receipt and failed to disclose to the carrier the actual value and contents of the package consigned; and does this fact, in connection with the other facts above stated, differentiate the case at bar from the case just referred to?

"3. To what extent is the case in hand controlled and affected by the Interstate Commerce Act as amended June 29, 1906, and especially section 10 thereof, and by the act of Congress known as the 'Elkins Act,' as amended June 29, 1906; and in view of the provisions of these acts of Congress, should the decision of the Supreme Court in the case above referred to be overruled or modified?"

McDaniel, Alston & Black and E. A. Neely, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Moore & Pomeroy, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. [1] 1. The answers to the questions propounded by the Court of Appeals in this case are in large part controlled by the decision in Southern Express Co. v. Hanaw, 134 Ga. 445, 67 S. E. 944, 137 Am. St. Rep. 227. In some states the delivery by a common carrier and acceptance by a shipper of a receipt containing a limitation on the liability of the carrier, such as that here involved, is sufficient to make a valid contract. Under the statute and decisions of this state, it is not. It is permissible to make a bona fide valuation of goods. But even the most express contract to arbitrarily limit the liability of a common carrier for the results of negligence, which is but another form of contracting against liability in part for negligence, is prohibited as against public policy. The provision in the receipt under consideration is not a valuation of the particular article to be shipped, but an effort to limit liability in case no valuation is made. It attempts, by means of a printed form of receipt prepared by it in advance, not to arrive at the actual value of any article, but to say that, in the absence of this, "the shipper agrees that the value of said property is not more than $50, * * * and that the company shall not be liable in any event for more than * * * $50 if no value is stated herein." It is not even stated that, in the absence of valuation, the value shall be fixed at $50, if that would do, but only that it is agreed that the value is "not more than" that amount—whether that sum or less is left open. Likewise it states that the company shall not be liable "for more than $50"—whether for that sum or less is not stated. How can it be said that an agreement which undertakes to fix neither the value nor the amount of the liability, but merely to put a limit upon them, is a bona fide valuation? It is plainly an agreement to limit liability, not to definitely fix value, and it is that which our statute and decisions declare cannot be done, as to the negligence of the carrier.

In the Hanaw Case, above cited, we dealt with the effect of goods having been shipped in New York for transportation into and delivery in Georgia, of the construction placed by the courts of that state on the effect of such a receipt, and of the right of this state to uphold its own public policy, and prohibition of an attempt to contract against the liability of a common carrier for the results of negligence. In the opinion attention was called to the expression in Civil Code 1895, § 2290, that "the carrier may require the nature and value of the goods delivered to him to be made known," as tending to show that the right of a carrier to require disclosure did not indicate a universal duty to disclose on the part of the shipper, in the absence of such requirement, on pain of being declared guilty of fraud for that reason alone, and relieved from all liability. We do not hold that a shipper might not use such artifices or be guilty of such conduct as to amount to a fraud on the carrier, although no inquiry was made by the latter. If the shipper practice any artifice to give a box containing things of value, such as costly jewels, a mean appearance, and thereby to induce the carrier to think it of little or no value, and so prevent him from making inquiries, or deceive him, it may constitute a fraud, although no inquiry is made. So, where a diamond breastpin was put in a paper box, tied with a cotton string, and unsealed, addressed to a young woman at a college for girls, and was sent to the express company's office by a little negro boy 10 or 12 years of age, who did not know the contents of the box, and no information was given as to its contents, and only the sum of 25 cents was paid for the carriage, these facts were held to be for submission to the jury on the question of fraud, though no inquiry was made. Southern Express Co. v. Everett, 37 Ga. 688. In Walker v. Jackson, 10 Mees. & Wels. 160, 168, Parke, B., said: "I take it now to be perfectly well understood, according to the majority of opinions on the subject, that, if anything is delivered to a person to be carried, it is the duty of the person receiving it to ask such questions about it as may be necessary. If he ask no questions, and there be no fraud to give the case a false complexion, on the delivery of the parcel, he is bound to carry the parcel as it is." Story, Bailments (9th Ed.) § 567.

In the Matter of Express Rates, Practices, Accounts, and Revenues, recently under consideration, the Interstate Commerce Commission were discussing a rule, not of the Commission, but of the express company, which provided that a receipt should be given in a prescribed form, that the shipper should be required to state the value of the shipment, which must be inserted in the receipt, and that, if he declined to state the value of the shipment, the agent should write or stamp on the receipt, "Value asked and not given." It was said: "The use of the rubber stamp, although it appears not to have been intentionally provided for that purpose, has resulted in the careless habit on the part of some of the carriers' agents of neglecting to notify the shipper of the necessity for declaring valuation in order to protect his rights, and in the failure to collect the proper charges." It would seem from this that the Interstate Commerce Commission considered that the duty of giving such notice or making inquiry as to the value rested upon the carrier, rather than that a duty of volunteering information as to value in all events rested upon the shipper. In the case at bar it is stated that the carrier's agent stamped upon the receipt, "Value asked and not given," though in point of fact he did not ask the value. It may be pertinently inquired why did the carrier provide such a stamp, and why did its agent stamp upon the receipt that value had been asked and not given, when this was not the fact, if it thought there was no necessity whatever for inquiry on its part, and that, without this, a failure to state the value would constitute a fraud on the part of the shipper, which would relieve it from liability entirely, or limit its liability so as not to exceed $50?

Counsel for plaintiff in error seem to think that the ruling in the case of Magnin v. Dinsmore, 70 N. Y. 410, 28 Am. Rep. 608, was overlooked by this court in deciding the case of Southern Express Co. v. Hanaw, because of a remark made in the opinion that in some jurisdictions a delivery and acceptance of a receipt containing printed words like that under consideration would be held to create a contract, but that we had found no case in which it had been held to constitute a fraud by the shipper. An inspection of 134 Ga. 455, 456, 67 S. E. 944, 137 Am. St. Rep. 227, will show that reference was made to the much-litigated case of Magnin v. Dinsmore, as reported both in 62 N. Y. 35, 20 Am. Rep. 442, and 70 N. Y. 410, 28 Am. Rep. 608, and that the reference to the latter decision was accompanied by a criticism upon it. In that case it was not held that there was a fraud releasing the company from liability, but that from the receipt arose a contract to some extent, and beyond that an estoppel by silence. We cannot agree with that decision, or others like it. If a carrier had no notice of the nature or value of goods shipped, and a shipper made representations on the faith of which the carrier acted in fixing its charges, it might be that the shipper would be estopped, or held to be guilty of fraud, if the representations were untrue. But this makes a very different case from merely not filling a blank in the carrier's receipt by the insertion of a value. If there were other facts showing fraud on the part of the shipper, the omission to fill the blank, or not giving information, might be a circumstance admissible in evidence. But merely omitting to fill the blank left for a statement of value is neither sufficient to prove fraud nor to raise an estoppel against the shipper. If the shipper knew that the charge for carriage was affected by increase in valuation, did not the carrier know it also? Did its agent not know that the value was not written in the receipt? Shall the shipper or consignee be precluded from recovery, because of not filling the blank, but the carrier, knowingly receiving the goods to be carried for hire, escape liability by not making inquiry? In addition to the authorities cited in the Hanaw Case, 134 Ga. 445, 67 S. E. 944, 137 Am. St. Rep. 227, see Adams Express Co. v. Green, 112 Va. 527, 72 S. E. 102 (6), and Stringfield v. So. Ry. Co., 152 N. C. 125, 67 S. E. 333.

In the case now before us there was no misrepresentation on the part of the shipper, no artifice to conceal the character of the shipment, or to give it a mean appearance, or throw the carrier off its guard, or tend to prevent inquiry. The shipper was known to the carrier to be a jeweler in New York, who had shipped thousands of parcels during a series of years. The carrier sent its agent to his place of business on this occasion in order to receive the package for shipment, as had been its custom. A diamond ring was shipped in a small package, which was sealed. The carrier's agent thus either knew or was put on notice that the package probably contained jewelry. He made no inquiry as to its value though the place for inserting the value was left blank. To hold that the facts stated in the question relieved the carrier, under the name of a contract or of an estoppel, from liability beyond $50, or that it would prevent the shipper from recovering at all on the ground that he was guilty of fraud, would be in one breath to lay down the rule that the carrier could not by notice in receipts, or even by express contracts, relieve itself from liability for loss arising from negligence, and in the next to practically destroy the effect of the rule.

The loss in transit is stated, and it does not appear that there was any evidence to exculpate the carrier from negligence. The effect of the Interstate Commerce Law will be more particularly referred to in a later division of this opinion. In answer to the first question propounded by the Court of Appeals, we hold that, under the facts therein hypothetically stated, the plaintiff is entitled to recover in a proper form of action, and that his recovery should not be limited to $50, but he can recover the actual value of the goods lost.

[2] 2. From what has been said above, it follows that, in answer to the second question propounded by the Court of Appeals, we hold that there is no valid distinction between the case in hand and that of So. Express Co. v. Hanaw, 134 Ga. 445, 67 S. E. 944, 137 Am. St. Rep. 227, on the ground that in the case at bar the shipper as the agent of the consignee, filled out the express receipt, except as to the blank left for stating the value of the article shipped, and failed to disclose to the carrier the actual value and contents of the package consigned; and we further hold that this fact, in connection with the other facts stated in the first question propounded, does not differentiate the case at bar from the case cited, so as to produce a different result.

[3] 3. The third question propounded inquires as to the extent to which the case in hand is controlled or affected by the Interstate Commerce Act as amended in 1906, and especially by what is known as the "Elkins Act," as amended in 1906, and whether, in view of the provisions of those acts of Congress, the decision of this court in the case of Southern Express Co. v. Hanaw, supra, should be overruled or modified. To this question we respond that there is nothing in the acts of Congress mentioned in the question propounded which controls or affects the case in hand, or which requires a modification or overruling of the decision cited. In Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. Hughes, 191 U. S. 477, 24 Sup. Ct. 132, 48 L. Ed. 268 (decided in 1903), it was held that, "while Congress under its power may provide for contracts for interstate commerce, permitting the carrier to limit its liability to a stipulated valuation, it does not appear that Congress has, up to the present time, sanctioned contracts of this nature; and, in the absence of congressional legislation on the subject, a state may require common carriers, although in the execution of interstate business, to be liable for the whole loss resulting from their own negligence, a contract to the contrary notwithstanding. There is no difference in the application of a principle based on the manner in which a state requires a degree of care and responsibility, whether enacted in a statute or resulting from the rules of law enforced in its courts." In that case a horse was shipped from Albany, N. Y., to a point in Pennsylvania. The bill of lading contained a limitation of liability to a valuation of $100, which it was conceded would have been held valid in New York, but not in Pennsylvania. Suit was brought in the latter state, a recovery was had for $10,000, and this was sustained. We may assume, therefore, that the Interstate Commerce Law, as it then stood, did not prevent the application of the state law to the validity of such agreements or to the right of recovery in spite of them.

The act of Congress regulating interstate commerce was passed February 4, 1887. 24 Stat. 379; 1 Supp. to Rev. Stat. 529. By the second section thereof it was declared that if any common carrier subject to the provisions of the act should, directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons greater or less compensation for transportation of passengers or property than from any other person or persons for a like service, the carrier should be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, which was prohibited and declared unlawful. By section 3 it was declared unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of the act to give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage. Section 10 prescribed the penalty for a violation of the act. By the act of March 2, 1889, the original act was amended. Act March 2, 1889, c. 382, 25 Stat. 855, 1 Supp. to Rev. Stat. 684 (U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1292). The tenth section of the original act was so amended as to declare that the willful causing to be done, or suffering or permitting to be done, anything in the act prohibited or declared unlawful, or aiding or abetting therein, or willfully omitting or failing to do any act, matter, or thing in the act required to be done, or causing or willfully suffering or permitting anything so directed or required by the act to be done not to be done, or aiding or abetting any such omission or failure, should be a misdemeanor. It was further amended by declaring that if any common carrier, or any officer or agent thereof, if a corporation, by means of false billing, false classification, false weighing, or false report of weight, or by any other device or means, should knowingly or willfully assist, or willingly suffer or permit, any person or persons to obtain transportation for property at less than the regular rates, such carrier, officer, or agent should be guilty of a misdemeanor. The amendment further declared that any person and any officer or agent of any corporation or company, who should deliver property for transportation to any common carrier subject to the provisions of the act, or for whom as consignor or consignee any such carrier should transport property, who should knowingly and willfully, by false billing, false classification, false weighing, false representation of the contents of the package, or false report of weight, "or by any other device or means, whether with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier, its agent or agents, obtain transportation for such property at less than the regular rates then established and in force on the line of transportation, shall be deemed guilty of fraud, which is hereby declared a misdemeanor." It further declared that inducing a common carrier or its officer or agent to unjustly discriminate in rates, or aiding or abetting the common carrier in unjust discrimination, should be a misdemeanor. With these provisions in the law, the decision in Pennsylvania Railroad v. Hughes, supra, was rendered, and it was declared that they did not interfere with the administration of the state law in regard to prohibiting limitations of liability for losses arising from negligence.

What is commonly known as the Elkins Act of February 19, 1908 (32 Stat. 847), had also been enacted before the decision mentioned above was rendered, though after the case arose. That act and the amendment of 1906 to the Interstate Commerce Act, to which the Court of Appeals calls attention (84 Stat. 584), did not serve to change the law in respect to contracts limiting liability, as declared in the decision above cited. They extended the provisions of the law. By the act of 1906 express companies were included as common carriers within the meaning of the law. It was declared that it should be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation to offer, grant, or give, or to solicit, accept, or receive, any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect to the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce by any common carrier subject to the act, whereby any such property should by any device whatever be transported at a less rate than the tariffs published and filed. This amendment was somewhat broader than the original act and the amendment of 1889, but dealt with the prohibition of unjust discrimination. It did not permit a limitation by contract of the liability of a common carrier. On the contrary, so far as any intimation might be drawn from its terms, such intimation would be in opposition to permitting such contracts. They could easily be made devices for the avoidance of the prohibitions made by Congress. It was argued that if the shipper, who failed to fill the blank in an express receipt left for the statement of the value, were permitted to recover the actual value of the property lost, it might be used as a means of avoiding the terms of the act. We think there would be much more danger of this, if shippers and carriers were permitted to make contracts limiting liability without regard to actual value, or if carriers could accomplish the same result because of a printed form of receipt and the leaving unfilled of a blank for the insertion of the value, regardless of actual value. But whether or not the shipper or the company, or both, may be subject to the penalties provided by the act, this does not prevent the shipper from recovering the value of his property lost by reason of the negligence of the carrier.

By section 7 of the act of 1906 (84 Stat. 595) a common carrier receiving property for interstate transportation is required to issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor, and it is declared that the initial carrier shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof "for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it, or by any common carrier, railroad or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass, and no contract, receipt, rule or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed: Provided, that nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under existing law." It can hardly be contended that this provision authorized any limitation of liability by the initial carrier which it did not previously have a right to make. It has been contended that the declaration that the initial carrier shall be liable for "any loss or damage" caused by it or a connecting carrier cut off any pre-existing right, if there were any, to make a contract for the limitation of liability. But the majority of courts which have passed upon this question have held that the purpose of the act was to require the issuance of through bills of lading and to prevent the limitation of liability of the initial carrier to a loss occurring on its own line. Congress was doubtless aware of the conflicting decisions which had been made in regard to the right to limit liability of a common carrier by contract, especially for a loss occurring by a carrier's own negligence, and of the fact that there were different statutes on the subject. Apparently, lest there might be a claim that this section interfered with the pre-existing state laws, the last clause was added, distinctly providing that "nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under existing laws." Considering the act of 1906 as a whole, we are of the opinion that it did not confer upon a common carrier any right to limit its liability by contract; nor did it interfere with the status of the state laws and the right of recovery under them, as announced in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Hughes, supra.

It was contended that the use of the word "fraud" in the act of Congress of 1889 was in conflict with the ruling of this court in the Hanaw Case. But this is clearly negatived by the fact that the acts declared unlawful by Congress and punishable as a fraud were stated to be so, whether they were done with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier. It was a fraud relatively to the public to evade the requirements of the law, and was a public offense. But between the shipper and the carrier it was not intended to declare that an act was a fraud on the part of the former, releasing the latter from liability for damages, whether done with or without its connivance and consent. This legislation was dealing with rates and charges of common carriers, and fraudulent efforts to evade the law in regard to them. It did not set up a new rule by which a carrier could claim to be released from its liability to a shipper. See Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. Solan, 169 U. S. 133, 18 Sup. Ct. 289, 42 L. Ed. 688. In the Matter of Released Rates, 18 I. C. C. 550; Merchants' Cotton Press, etc., Co. v. Insurance Co. of North America, 151 U. S. 368, 14 Sup. Ct. 367, 38 L. Ed. 195; Latta v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 172 Fed. 850, 97 C. C. A. 198; Hughes v. Atlanta Steel Co., 136 Ga. 511, 71 S. E. 728, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 547; L. & N. R. Co. v. Warfield & Lee, 6 Ga. App. 550, 553, 65 S. E. 308. The amendment of 1910 was enacted after this case began, and was not mentioned in the questions propounded by the Court of Appeals. But what has been said would doubtless apply also to it.

It appears in the statement of facts made in connection with the first question propounded by the Court of Appeals that no express charge had been paid or demanded. It may be that the carrier is not precluded from collecting a proper charge. But this would not affect the question of the liability under consideration. All the Justices concur.

ADAMS EXPRESS CO. v. CHAMBERLIN-JOHNSON-DU BOSE CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 13, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 129*)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT—VIOLATION—LOSS OF GOODS—OFFENSES.

The provisions contained in section 10 of the Interstate Commerce Act approved February 4, 1887 (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 382, 8 Fed. Stat. Ann. 835 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3160]), declare it to be a fraud and make it a penal offense for any person, delivering property for transportation to any common carrier subject to the provisions of that act, knowingly and willfully, by "false billing, false classification, false weighing, false representation of the contents of the package, or false report of weight, or by any other device or means, whether with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier," to obtain transportation for such property at less than the regular rates then established and in force on a line of transportation. It also makes it a penal offense for any person to induce any common carrier subject to the provisions of the act, or any of its officers or agents, to discriminate unjustly in his favor as against any consignor or consignee in the transportation of such property. By the amendment of the Interstate Commerce Law (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, 34 Stat. 584, Fed. Stat. Ann. 1909, Supp. 262 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911,

p. 1288) it is made a misdemeanor for any person to offer, grant, or give, or to solicit, accept, or receive, any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect to the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce by any common carrier subject to the act regulating interstate commerce and acts amendatory thereof, whereby any such property shall, by any device whatever, be transported at a less rate than that named in the tariffs published and filed by the carrier, as required by the act to regulate commerce and acts amendatory thereof, or whereby any advantage is given or discrimination practiced. Held, although such practices upon the part of consignors of freight to be moved by a carrier from one state into another are made penal, that fact will not prevent a consignator from recovering damages on the common-law liability of the carrier for loss of freight resulting from a violation of its duties as a carrier. 2 Hutchinson on Carriers, § 547; Moore on Carriers, § 13; Insurance Co. v. Delaware Mutual, etc., Co., 91 Tenn. 537, 19 S. W. 555; Merchants' Cotton, etc., Co. v. Insurance Co., 151 U. S. 368, 14 Sup. Ct. 367, 38 L. Ed. 195; Pon-Decker Lumber Co. v. Spencer, 86 Fed. 846, 30 C. C. A. 430. In re T. H. Bunch Co. (C. C.) 180 Fed. 519; In the Matter of Released Rates, 13 Interst. Com. R. 550. See, also, Hughes v. Atlanta Steel Co., 136 Ga. 511, 71 S. E. 728, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 547; Southern Express Co. v. Hanaw, 134 Ga. 446 (8), 459, 67 S. E. 944, 137 Am. St. Rep. 227.

2. CARRIERS (§§ 148, 153, 158*)—TRANSPORTATION OF MERCHANDISE—EXPRESS COMPANIES—RECEIPT—VALUATION—PUBLIC POLICY—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

Where no value is put upon goods shipped by an express company, and no effort is made to arrive at a valuation, the mere fact that in the prepared form of receipt issued by the carrier to the shipper there is contained the statement that, "in consideration of the rate charged for carrying said property, which is regulated by the value thereof, and is based upon a valuation of not exceeding $50 unless a greater value is declared, the shipper agrees that the value of said property is not more than $50, unless a greater value is stated therein, and that the company shall not be liable in any event for more than the value so stated, nor for more than $50 if no value is stated herein," will not suffice to limit the liability of the company to $50, regardless of the value of the property shipped. Such a statement in the receipt is not a valuation, but an arbitrary limitation sought to be placed upon the liability of the carrier.

(a) If such a statement should be held to constitute an agreement between the parties fixing an arbitrary valuation of the property, and should be a valid contract under the laws of New York, where executed, it would be contrary to the public policy of this state, and unenforceable in Georgia.

(b) Inasmuch as an express contract of the character mentioned would be unenforceable in Georgia by reason of its being contrary to the public policy of this state, the mere fact that at the time the property was delivered to the carrier for transportation the consignor presented a form of receipt filled out, the same being so tendered for the purpose of having it signed by a representative of the carrier, and it was signed by him, would not render the agreement enforceable in Georgia.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 650, 663-667, 686, 687-690, 699-703½, 708-710, 718, 718½; Dec. Dig. §§ 148, 153, 158.*]

3. FORMER DECISIONS—APPLICATION TO REVIEW AND OVERRULE.

The rulings announced in the second head-note result from an application of the decision rendered in Southern Express Co. v. Hanaw, 134 Ga. 445, 67 S. E. 944, 137 Am. St. Rep. 227. The motion to review and overrule that case is denied. All of the rulings are supported and elaborated in Adams Express Co. v. Mellichamp, 75 S. E. 596.

4. ANSWER—DISALLOWANCE OF AMENDMENTS.

In view of the rulings above announced, the court below did not err in striking certain portions of the answer filed by the express company, and in disallowing certain amendments offered to the answer.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by the Chamberlin-Johnson-Du Bose Company against the Adams Express Company. From an order striking certain portions of defendant's answer, and disallowing certain amendments offered thereto, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Robert C. & P. H. Alston and E. A. Nealy, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Smith, Hammond & Smith, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., disqualified.

RICHARDS et al. v. SHIELDS et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING (§§ 199, 210*) — PETITION—MOTION TO DISMISS — SPECIAL DEMURRER — TIME.

The motion, made upon the trial of the case, by the defendant below, to dismiss the petition, was in the nature of a special demurrer, and therefore came too late. Moreover, it was largely speaking in its character.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 464-469; Dec. Dig. §§ 199, 210.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 518*) — RECORD—PLEADING—ANSWER—AMENDMENT.

An amendment offered to an answer, which was disallowed by the court, cannot be brought to this court as part of the record in the case, but must be brought up as a part of the bill of exceptions, either set out therein, or attached thereto as an exhibit, properly identified, and made a part of the bill of exceptions. McGarry v. Seiz, 129 Ga. 296, 58 S. E. 856; Id., 136 Ga. 849, 72 S. E. 243; Bowen v. Neal, 136 Ga. 859, 72 S. E. 340. The mere fact that such an amendment was filed in the office of the clerk of the court, without an order of the judge allowing it to be so filed, and prior to its disallowance by the judge, does not alter the rule. Branan v. Baxter, 122 Ga. 224, 50 S. E. 45.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2342-2355; Dec. Dig. § 518.*]

3. BANKRUPTCY (§ 421*) — DISCHARGE—EXEMPT PROPERTY—LIABILITY FOR DISCHARGEABLE DEBT.

After a debtor has been discharged in bankruptcy, a debt unsecured by lien, provable in bankruptcy, and not falling within any of the exceptions specified in the bankruptcy act, cannot be enforced in equity by a proceeding in rem against an exemption set apart to the bankrupt in the bankruptcy proceedings, where he pleads his discharge in bankruptcy, and that plaintiff was given due notice of the bankruptcy proceeding, and where there is proof sustaining such plea. Bowen v. Keller, 130 Ga. 31, 60 S. E. 174, 124 Am. St. Rep. 164.

(a) This case was of the nature just above indicated. The defendant pleaded his discharge in bankruptcy after due notice to the plaintiff. The plaintiff's debt was evidenced by promissory notes, and was unsecured by any sort of lien. There was nothing to indicate that the debt was not provable and dischargeable in bankruptcy. The plaintiffs, on the trial, put in evidence the defendant's answer. It follows that the trial judge erred in rendering a judgment in rem against the property exempted to the defendant in bankruptcy proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Cent. Dig. §§ 772-774, 776, 777, 779-781, 783-786, 788-790; Dec. Dig. § 421.*]

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; Price Edwards, Judge.

Action by J. S. Shields and others against W. J. Richards and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

J. S. James, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. James Beall and B. F. Boykin, both of Carrollton, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

GREEN v. GREEN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONTINUANCE—DISCRETION—ABUSE.

There was no abuse of discretion in overruling the motion to continue the case.

2. TRIAL (§ 169*)—DIRECTION OF VERDICT—REFUSAL TO PROCEED TO TRIAL—DISMISSAL.

When the plaintiff failed or refused to proceed with the trial after the overruling of the motion to continue, and offered no evidence, it was error to direct a verdict against them. The proper judgment was one of dismissal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 341, 381-387, 389; Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1175*)—COSTS (§ 231*)—REVERSAL—DISPOSITION OF CASE.

This will not require a reinstatement of the case, or a new trial. But direction is given that the verdict and judgment thereon be vacated, and that in lieu thereof a judgment dismissing the case, with costs against the plaintiffs, be entered.

(a) The plaintiff in error, having obtained a substantial modification of the judgment, is entitled to have judgment for the costs of bringing the case to this court and those accruing in this court.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 349*)

—ORDER OF SALE—CONCLUSIVENESS—ERRONEOUS DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

Where an administratrix applied to the court of ordinary for leave to sell all the real estate of the intestate lying in a certain county, and the order of the ordinary recited such petition and granted leave to sell all of the lands of the deceased in the county named, except the dower estate of the widow, and under this order the administratrix sold and conveyed the lands, in a subsequent attack upon the title claimed under the sale, the order for sale was admissible, although, after the general grant of authority, it undertook to describe the lands of the deceased, and did not do so accurately. Clements v. Henderson, 4 Ga. 148, 152; Davie v. McDaniel, 47 Ga. 195; Coggins v. Griswold, 64 Ga. 323.

MILLEDGEVILLE COTTON CO. v. BACON.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 14, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 40)—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—BREACH—EVIDENCE.

The action was for breach of contract, it being alleged that the plaintiff was employed by the defendants to represent them as a cotton buyer in a named town for a stated period at a given salary, and his expenses when out of town on defendants' business. Defendants' answer admitted the contract of employment and the amount of salary alleged by plaintiff, but denied any agreement to pay expenses as claimed. The answer further admitted that defendants discharged plaintiff from their service about the time alleged by plaintiff, but pleaded justification in so doing, because plaintiff had been derelict in the discharge of his duties, was incompetent, and had violated the trust reposed in him; the particulars being set forth. There was a further plea to the effect that plaintiff was short in his accounts with defendants in a stated sum, for which judgment was prayed against him. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendants excepted to the refusal of a new trial. Held, the verdict was supported by evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 47-49; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

2. INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

There was evidence to authorize the instruction excepted to, in reference to ratification by defendants as to the expenses claimed by plaintiff.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 40*)—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—BREACH—DEFENSES—JUSTIFICATION OF DISCHARGE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The court did not err in instructing the jury to the effect that the burden of proof was on the defendants to establish, to the satisfaction of the jury, by a preponderance of evidence, their plea of justification in the discharge of plaintiff. The burden of proof generally lies upon the party asserting or affirming a fact, and to the existence of whose case or defense the proof of such fact is essential." Civil Code, § 5746. The defense referred to was certainly affirmative, and was, moreover, somewhat in the nature of confession and avoidance; and it is well settled that the burden in such cases is upon the defendant to sustain his plea. See Stewart v. Mynatt, 135 Ga. 637, 70 S. E. 325; Widincamp v. Widincamp, 135 Ga. 644, 70 S. E. 566. This ruling is not in conflict with what was held in Mobley v. Lyon, 134 Ga. 125, 67 S. E. 668, 137 Am. St. Rep. 213, 9 Ann. Cas. 1004, relied on by plaintiffs in error. There the issue was whether the alleged testatrix signed the instrument purporting to be her will; the propounders contending that she did, and the caveators contending that she did not. As the propounders held the affirmative of the issue, the burden was on them to sustain it.

SMALL v. JONES.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 175*)—AGREEMENT TO WAIVE—CONSIDERATION.

An agreement to waive any defense under the statute of limitations, made without consideration after the bar of the statute had attached, is not binding upon the party making the agreement, and will not prevent the debtor, when sued, from setting up the bar of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 662; Dec. Dig. § 175.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 180*)—DEFENSE—GENERAL DEMURRER.

It appearing upon the face of the pleadings in this case that the debt sued on was barred by the statute of limitations, a general demurrer based upon that ground should have been sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 670-675, 681; Dec. Dig. § 180.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 24*)—STATUTE APPLICABLE—WRITTEN CONTRACTS.

Plaintiff, having purchased an interest in a business enterprise which never materialized, sued for the return of the money, and attached to the petition a receipt, signed by defendant, evidencing the receipt from plaintiff of $800, "being part payment for one forty-fourth interest" in a certain patent, and that a note due in four months for $200 completed the payment. Held, that the receipt was not a contract to deliver such interest, binding defendant to repay the money in case of default, and hence plaintiff could not treat the failure to repay the money as a breach of a written contract, subject to the limitations applicable to actions on such contracts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 112-117; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

4. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 28*)—ORAL CONTRACT—BREACH.

Where plaintiff orally contracted to purchase an interest in a business from defendant, and such interest was never delivered, plaintiff's action to recover the amount paid was barred by the four-year statute of limitations.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Action by J. S. Jones against W. E. Small. From an order overruling defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's amended petition, he brings error. Reversed.

On January 17, 1911, J. S. Jones filed suit against W. E. Small to recover the sum of \$800, with interest from July 29, 1904, alleging that on the last-named date he paid to the defendant \$800 on account of the purchase price of a forty-fourth ($\frac{1}{44}$) interest in a business enterprise known as the "Rosevelt Putty Patent"; that said enterprise, for some reason unknown to plaintiff, never materialized; and that plaintiff had made frequent demands upon defendant for the return of his money. Attached to his petition was a copy of a receipt as follows: "July 29, '04. Received of J. S. Jones eight hundred dollars, being part payment for one forty-fourth interest in the Rosevelt Putty Patent. A note payable in four months for two hundred dollars completes the payment. W. E. Small."

The defendant filed a general demurrer, setting up, among other grounds, that the alleged cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. When the demurrer was called for hearing, the plaintiff offered an amendment, in which he alleged: "That complainant's right of action as set out in his original petition, though arising more than six years prior to the bringing of said suit, was not in fact at the time of the bringing of said suit, and is not now, barred by the statute of limitations, for the reason that on the 23d day of July, 1910, the defendant, W. E. Small, executed and delivered to your petitioner a written waiver"—a copy of which is as follows: "Georgia, Bibb County. I, W. E. Small, having been notified by the attorneys representing J. S. Jones of their intention to file suit against me on July 23, 1910, upon an alleged claim growing out of the sale of a one forty-fourth interest in a certain putty patent; and whereas, it appearing that, if said contemplated suit is not filed by the 29th day of July, 1910, the same will be barred by the statute of limitations, and I, the said W. E. Small, desiring time to investigate the merits of said alleged claim, do hereby agree, in the event the said suit is not filed against me within the statutory period, to waive all rights of defense to said suit that I may have by reason of the statute of limitations having run against the same. This 23d day of July, 1910. W. E. Small."

Objection to the allowance of this amendment was overruled, and a demurrer to the petition as amended was also overruled. The defendant excepted.

W. E. Martin, Jr., and J. E. Hall, both of Macon, for plaintiff in error. Ryals, Grace & Anderson, of Macon, and Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). [3] We do not think that the plaintiff could treat the failure to repay the money as a breach of a written contract. The receipt was not a contract for the delivery of an interest in the contemplated enterprise, binding the party executing the receipt to repay the money in default of delivery of the specified interest in the enterprise, so as to make this action analogous to the suit in the case of Hill v. Hackett, 80 Ga. 54, 4 S. E. 856. A comparison of the written instrument sued on there with the receipt given by the defendant in the present case will show the radical difference between the two writings. The writing relied upon in the action of Hill v. Hackett, while acknowledging the receipt of certain tickets, also contained a promise to return the tickets, "or to account for" them, if used. In the present case, the receipt evidencing the payment contains no promise to repay the money in case of failure "to deliver the interest" in the contemplated enterprise. There is no breach, in the instant case, of any express written undertaking, but a failure to perform an implied undertaking—that is, the repayment of the money, or rather the payment of it as money had and received in case the contemplated enterprise was abandoned and the defendant should put himself in a position where he was unable to turn over to the plaintiff the consideration for the money paid by the latter.

[4] It follows, from what we have said above, that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations within four years from the time when it first came into existence against the defendant. In the petition it is stated that plaintiff's right of action as set out in his petition "arose more than six years prior to the bringing of the suit" (though it is not determinable from the facts alleged in the petition when the cause of action actually arose); and as there was less than a year between the time of the execution of the instrument which the plaintiff insists was a valid waiver of the defendant's right of any defense under the statute of limitations and the actual filing of the suit in the case, the bar of the statute had attached at the time of the execution of the instrument relied upon as such waiver.

[1] That being true, in the absence of some showing that the waiver was made for a valuable consideration, it was not binding. Had the instrument containing the waiver contained also a new promise to pay the debt, a new point from which the statute would run would have been created. But the writing relied upon as a waiver contains neither a new promise nor an acknowledgment of the debt, nor does it show that it was based upon any consideration other than the postponement of the bringing of a suit upon the alleged debt; and this postponement could not amount to a consideration, inasmuch as the bar of the statute had already attached, and mere delay in bringing suit did not benefit the defendant nor put the plaintiff in a worse position than that in which he was before. The relation of the parties as debtor and creditor could not be affected by delay in bringing the suit. Under these circumstances the bar of the statute, which had attached, was not removed. See, in this connection, Trask v. Weeks, 81 Me. 325, 17 Atl. 162, Warren v. Walker, 23 Me. 453, and Stockett v. Sasscer, 8 Md. 374.

[2] As the debt sued on was barred by the statute of limitations, the defendant's demurrer based upon that ground should have been sustained, and it was error to overrule it.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 38*)—ORAL LEASE—TERM—TENANCY AT WILL.

An oral lease, not naming any term, but limited to endure until the happening of a contingency, creates a tenancy at will.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 39*)—ORAL LEASE—SUBSEQUENT WRITTEN AGREEMENT.

If, subsequently, the landlord accepts from the tenant the latter's rent note for a definite term, containing a complete and certain agreement for the rent of the same land, and embracing covenants not included in the oral lease, the prior oral contract will be presumed to have been superseded and merged into the writing.

Error from Superior Court, Wilkes County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Suit by C. J. Fortson against the Anthony Shoals Power Company and others. Decree for complainant, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Thos. J. Brown, of Elberton, and W. A. Slaton, of Washington, Ga., for plaintiffs in error. S. H. Sibley, of Union Point, and I. T. Irvin, of Washington, Ga., for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The plaintiff, C. J. Fortson, brought his petition against the Anthony Shoals Power Company and certain other defendants, praying an injunction against interfering with his possession of certain lands. He alleged that the power company owned a large tract of land, on which was an undeveloped water power; that in October, 1909, the power company agreed with him that he should rent the entire land, as long as the same was not flooded by the erection of a dam, at a price of 34,000 pounds of lint cotton per year for each year that he was suffered by the nonerection of the dam to occupy the land, the company having a right at any time to erect the dam and flood the land; that he was to have the right to make such improvements thereon as he wished, at his own risk of loss thereof by the erection at any time of the dam, and to sublet the premises; that in pursuance of this contract he entered upon the land, and for each of the years 1910 and 1911 he gave his rent notes, which have been paid; that on October 10, 1911, in pursuance of his contract, he gave to the power company his note, for the year 1912, for 34,000 pounds of lint cotton; that on the faith of his contract he erected valuable improvements; that the defendants had denied him the right to rent the lands for the next year (1912), had informed his tenants that he had no right to the possession of the farms for the next year, and that they would not be permitted to occupy them, and had stopped his tenants from erecting improvements which they had contracted with him to construct. The power company denied the alleged contract of 1909, averred that it had rented the land to the plaintiff in 1910 and again in 1911, and denied having rented the land for the year 1912. It averred that the plaintiff had cut timber during the years 1910 and 1911 in violation of his contract, and that, unless the plaintiff vacated the premises on the expiration of his term, it would be compelled to take proper proceedings to evict him. On the interlocutory hearing the defendants were temporarily restrained as prayed, provided the plaintiff deposited with the clerk rent notes taken by him for the year 1912 to the extent of 35,000 pounds of lint cotton. Exception is taken to this order.

[1] The tenant's contention is that the landlord made a parol lease of the land to him, to continue until it was flooded, and that in successive years he gave his rent notes in pursuance of the parol contract. The duration of the tenancy, by the express terms of the parol agreement, depended on a contingency. Such a lease, not naming any term, but limited to endure until the happening of a contingency, cannot properly be regarded as a lease for years. 1 Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, § 12. And, even if it could be construed as a lease longer than a year, the contract, being in parol, had only the effect to create a tenancy at will. Civil Code, § 3693. As the term is indefinite, and cannot extend beyond a year solely by vigor of the parol agreement, the plaintiff sustained the relation of a tenant at will. The statute provides for notice to terminate a tenancy at will, and the stipulation that the tenant should rent the land as long as it was not flooded assured to the landlord the right to terminate the tenancy by flooding the land without giving the statutory notice.

[2] The subsequent execution by the tenant to the landlord of a rent note, wherein the contract of tenancy appears to be fully integrated, and which contained additional covenants to those included in the parol contract, impels a conclusion that the prior parol agreement was merged into the writing. The rent note for the year 1911 contained full specifications of a lease contract. It specified that the note was given for the rent of the Anthony Shoals land, and contained covenants by the tenant to pay rent, to keep the premises in repair, to cultivate the land in a farmlike manner, to permit no waste, or cutting of timber, save for the ordinary requirements of the farm; a liability for waste to the value of the depreciation to be collected as rent. It was stipulated that the payee was not to be liable for repairs; that if he or his principal determined to go forward with the construction of a reservoir, he or they might go upon the land and remove any timber, earth, or other thing, without becoming liable for damages or a reduction in rent; and that the crops should be removed by the tenant not later than November 15th of that year, at the direction of the payee or his principal. No copy of the rent note for 1910 is found in the record, but the parol testimony indicates that it was substantially of the same nature.

[5] Ordinarily a promissory note contains only the maker's obligation to pay. If the note does not purport to express the contract in pursuance of which it is executed, and that contract rests in parol, its terms may be proved by parol. Pryor v. Ludden & Bates, 134 Ga. 238, 87 S. E. 654, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267. But where a tenant gives a rent note to his landlord, embracing and reciting a complete and certain agreement of the terms of the lease contract, it will, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, be conclusively presumed that the writing contains the entire contract. Bullard v. Brewer, 118 Ga. 918. Having reduced their contract to writing, all prior oral negotiations and agreements pertaining to the same subject-matter are merged into the writing and superseded by the writing. Weaver v. Stoner, 114 Ga. 167, 39 S. E. 874. It follows, therefore, that the written contract as embraced in the rent note of 1911 superseded the alleged oral contract made in 1909.

[3] In the fall of 1911 Fortson executed to the power company a rent note for the year 1912, and delivered it to the president of the power company. There is a dispute concerning the circumstances under which this note was delivered. The power company insists that the note was left with its president until it could be submitted to its general manager for approval; that it was submitted, and the general manager declined to renew the rent contract, and the note was returned to Fortson on November 10th by mail. Fortson immediately sent the note back to the president. Fortson contends that the general manager approved the rent contract for the year 1912, and afterwards attempted to repudiate it because of some disagreement about the collection of the rent of 1911. The evidence was sufficient to authorize the judge to find that there existed a contract of rental for the year 1912.

[4] This brings us to the question of the remedy of injunction. If a landlord enters into a valid contract to rent his land, with the right to sublet it, and afterwards, in an attempt to repudiate his contract, he interferes with the tenant's possession, so as to prevent him from exercising his privileges under the contract, and the tenant's damages are incapable of ascertainment, equity will enjoin the landlord from so doing. There was evidence to authorize a finding of these facts, and accordingly there was no abuse of discretion in granting an interlocutory injunction.

The CHIEF JUSTICE and Mr. Justice ATKINSON concur in the judgment as based on the last three headnotes.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WATSON & STRICKLAND v. PARIAN PAINT CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING (§ 199*)—DEMURRER—FILING—TIME.

A demurrer to an action brought in the superior court on an open account, on the ground that the items of the account are not sufficiently specific, should be filed at the first term.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 464-469; Dec. Dig. § 199.*]

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 58*)—DEFECTIVE PLEADING.

The open account involved in this case had certain headings, such as "Articles," "Size Package," "Price," and "Amount." Under each head were written certain letters and figures, such as "30 gals., #39, blk., 1.05, $1.50." Accompanying these items were dates. In some cases there were added words descriptive of the articles, such as "stucco," "Pekin br.," and "raw oil." Held, that the suit was not so fatally defective that a defendant, who failed to demur or plead at the first term, after entry of default, could, at the trial term, without moving to open the default, have the case dismissed on motion, on the ground that no itemized account was attached to the suit "that is sufficiently legible and intelligible as to put defendant upon notice of what the suit is intended to cover," and that "the statement of account was so vague and indefinite as that no valid judgment could be rendered on the suit."

(a) Such a motion was properly overruled. Central Ry. Co. v. Motz, 130 Ga. 414, 61 S. E. 1.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 914*)—TRIAL (§ 170*)—DIRECTING VERDICT—SERVICE—REVIEW.

At the trial, no defense having been filed, and the case being in default, there was no error in directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount due on the account. Civil Code, § 5682.

(a) No question having been raised as to the service, and the entry of service not having been brought to this court, it will be presumed that due service was made.

1. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF JURY—NEGLECT.

It is error to instruct a jury that certain enumerated facts constitute negligence, where the law does not declare such to be negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-431, 435; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 122*)—ACTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a suit for a personal injury arising from a negligent tort (where the doctrine known as the master and servant rule does not apply), the burden does not rest on the plaintiff, as part of his case, to show his freedom from negligence, but contributory negligence is matter of defense. It may, however, appear from the evidence introduced by either party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 221-223, 229-234; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

Action by A. J. Casteel, by next friend, against the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Tye, Peeples & Jordan, of Atlanta, and D. W. Blair, of Marietta, for plaintiff in error. Clay & Morris, of Marietta, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. [1] The plaintiff, a youth of 13 years, with three companions, was playing on a turntable of the defendant railroad company, when he was injured. In a suit for the injury he alleged that the railroad company was negligent in maintaining upon its premises, without guard or adequate protection, the turntable, which was dangerous to life and limb, and of a nature to invite the intrusion of children. The defendant denied any negligence in this particular. The court charged the jury: "I give you this rule: Where a railroad company leaves a dangerous machine, such as a turntable, if you believe that the table was a dangerous machine, unfastened in a city on a lot which is not securely inclosed, and where people and children are wont to visit it and pass through it, this is negligence on the part of said company." This instruction contained an expression of opinion that certain acts constituted negligence. The court may not so instruct the jury, unless such acts are declared by law to be negligence. L. & N. R. Co. v. Arp, 136 Ga. 489, 71 S. E. 867.

[2] The court also charged that "the degree or measure of care which the child was required to exercise was that which is ordinarily exercised, and which is to be reasonably expected from a child of his years and experience, under the circumstances he was in, as shown by the evidence; and before the jury can find him guilty of contributory negligence, or lack of due care, you must find that he failed to exercise such care and caution as reasonably might be expected of a child of his years and experience under the circumstances, and the burden of proving such lack of due care is upon the defendant; still that proof may come either from the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, or that introduced by the defendant, or from the evidence of both." In its connection, this instruction was not erroneous. Whenever the defendant's negligence as the cause of the injury is made to appear, the plaintiff's contributory negligence becomes a matter of defense. City Council of Augusta v. Hudson, 88 Ga. 599 (3), 600, 15 S. E. 673. Unless the plaintiff, in making out his case, submits proof of his own negligence, as the contributory cause of his injury, the burden is on the defendant to prove the plaintiff's negligence, if such defense is made to the action. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

B. B. FORD & CO. et al. v. ATLANTIC COMPRESS CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

ACTION (§ 28*)—ASSIGNMENTS (§ 117*)—CONTRACT—BREACH—WAIVER OF TORT—SUIT IN ASSUMPSIT—SUIT FOR USE OF ANOTHER.

Where a contractual relation exists between the parties, such as that of bailor and bailee, so that the latter rightfully obtains possession of the property, a tort arising out of a breach of the bailee's duty imposed by his relation, or by his express contract, may be waived by the bailor and assumpsit maintained.

(a) The action in this case was ex contractu, based upon an alleged refusal of the defendant compress company to deliver cotton upon demand and presentation of its receipts given therefor.

(b) Under the facts alleged, the plaintiff had the right to sue for the benefit of the user named.

(c) The petition was not subject to the demurrers.

against the Atlantic Compress Company. The substance of the petition, now material, is as follows: Ford & Co., between September 17, 1907, and January 30, 1908, delivered to the defendant 234 bales of cotton, taking its warehouse receipts for the same, wherein the defendant obligated itself to deliver the cotton upon the return of the receipts properly indorsed, and the payment of such charges as may have accrued thereon under the current tariff of the defendant company. On February 3, 1908, the receipts were presented to the defendant by Ford & Co. and the delivery of the cotton demanded. Defendant failed and refused to deliver. Continuing tender of the receipts, demand for delivery, and refusal to deliver were alleged. Ford & Co. held a policy of fire insurance on the cotton, issued to them by the Standard Marine Insurance Company, Limited, of Liverpool. On February 12 and 16, 1908, the insurance company paid to Ford & Co. a stated amount of money as the value of the cotton, taking from the latter the receipts for the cotton issued by the defendant, "as well as a subrogation transfer of all the rights of B. B. Ford & Co. as owner of said cotton." The petition further alleged that the defendant, "by reason of its failure and refusal to deliver said cotton on demand, or to pay the value thereof, has become liable to pay petitioners the value of the same, to wit," a stated amount, with interest thereon from February 2, 1908, such amount being the same which it was alleged the insurance company had paid Ford & Co., as above stated.

The petition was demurred to on several grounds, to the effect: (1) It appears from the petition that at the time it was filed neither of the plaintiffs had any right to demand the cotton of the defendant, nor to recover for its refusal to deliver on demand, and that no liability was shown on the part of defendant for the value of the cotton. (2) The action is founded upon an alleged breach of duty to deliver the cotton to Ford & Co., and the petition shows that when it was filed Ford & Co. had no right, title, nor interest in the cotton, having parted with the same to the insurance company, and no right is shown in the insurance company to demand the delivery of the cotton, and sue for refusal to deliver or to pay its value. (3) The suit is not maintainable by Ford & Co. for the use of the insurance company, because the petition shows that, at the time of bringing the suit, Ford & Co. "had parted with said cotton for full value, and had transferred all of its right of every nature therein to the" insurance company. (4) No cause of action is set forth in behalf of the insurance company, as the suit is for tort in the failure to deliver the cotton, and neither demand by it nor failure to deliver to said company is alleged, and no right of action for the alleged tort to Ford & Co. was assignable to the insurance company. (5) So much of the petition as sets forth that the insurance company took from Ford & Co. "a subrogation transfer of all the rights of said B. B. Ford & Co. as owner of said cotton" is demurrable, because the "subrogation transfer" and its terms are not set forth, and because no facts are alleged showing any rights of subrogation in the insurance company. (6) No cause of action is set forth in favor of either of the plaintiffs. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition. The plaintiffs excepted and brought the case here.

Counsel for defendant in error contend that the action is for a tort in the conversion of the cotton, and we assume that the trial judge entertained the same view of the case in sustaining the demurrer. If the action were in tort, the judgment should be affirmed. In our opinion, however, the action was ex contractu. When the cotton was delivered to the defendant by Ford & Co., it gave its receipt for the same, in which the defendant expressly obligated itself to deliver the cotton upon the return of the receipts, properly indorsed. Ford & Co. subsequently presented the receipts to the defendant and demanded of it the cotton, which demand was refused. Clearly then accrued a right of action in favor of Ford & Co. against the defendant for a distinct breach of its express contract. As was said in Bates v. Bigby, 123 Ga. 727, 729, 51 S. E. 717, 718: "Where * * * a contractual relation exists between the parties, such as that of bailor and bailee, so that the latter rightfully obtains possession of the property, a tort arising out of a breach of the bailee's duty imposed by his relation may be waived by the bailor, and assumpsit maintained; the reason being that the relation of the parties, out of which the duty violated grew, had its inception in the contract." To the same effect is De Loach, etc., Co. v. Standard, etc., Co., 125 Ga. 377, 54 S. E. 157. If this right of action for breach of contract continue in Ford & Co. up to the institution of the suit, then they could sue in their name for the use of any person they might designate to take the proceeds of the action, provided, in so doing, they did not cut the defendant off from any defense which it would otherwise have. Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Nisbet, 119 Ga. 316, 46 S. E. 444, and cases cited.

The right of action was in Ford & Co. when the suit was brought, unless they had been deprived of it by the allegations in the seventh paragraph of the petition, which were as follows: "Petitioners show that petitioner, Standard Marine Insurance Company, Limited, of Liverpool, a fire insurance company, carried a policy of insurance against fire on said 234 bales of cotton, issued to B. B. Ford & Co., and that on February 12, 1909 [1908 (?)], and February 16, 1908, said petitioner insurance company paid to the said B. B. Ford & Co. the aggregate sum of $13,591.58, the value of said cotton, taking the receipts of said B. B. Ford & Co. therefor, as well as a subrogation transfer of all the rights of said B. B. Ford & Co. as owner of said cotton." There is no allegation in the petition that the cotton was burned and that the insurance company paid to Ford & Co. the amount stated for the loss, although there appears on the copy of the receipt attached to the petition (which is alleged to be the same in form as all of the other receipts, except as to date, number, number of bales, and marks) a certificate, appearing to have been made by the defendant, that the cotton for which the receipt was given was destroyed by fire February 2, 1908. We do not agree with counsel for plaintiffs in error that such certificate, taken in connection with the allegations of the petition quoted above, shows that the cotton was burned, as the certificate is not referred to in the petition. We do not think, however, that the right of Ford & Co. to bring the action for the use of the insurance company was terminated by the facts alleged, to the effect that, prior to the bringing of the suit, the insurance company had paid them "the value of said cotton, taking the receipts of said B. B. Ford & Co. therefor." Although the insurance company had paid Ford & Co. the value of the cotton, and had taken the receipts which the defendant had issued, it does not appear that the receipts had been indorsed by Ford & Co., and it was expressly stipulated in each receipt that the cotton referred to would "be delivered only upon the return of this receipt properly indorsed," etc. In the absence of an indorsement, the defendant was not bound to deliver the cotton to the insurance company, had it presented the receipts and demanded it of defendant; and this is true, notwithstanding the "subrogation transfer" (whatever it may have been) to the insurance company of all the rights of Ford & Co. as the owner of the cotton.

Under the circumstances, the action was properly brought by Ford & Co. for the use of the insurance company, and the court erred in dismissing the petition on demurrer. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. v. GNANN & DE LOACH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

TRIAL (§§ 251, 260*)—REQUEST TO CHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN—RAILROADS—FIRES—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO ISSUES.

The testimony to which objection was made, when connected with other testimony, as required by the court in his ruling on its admissibility, tended to support the case as laid in the petition, and was not irrelevant. The requests to charge, in so far as they contained accurate statements of law, were covered by the general charge, which in the main applied the rules of law respecting the liability of a railroad company for damages to property proximately caused by a fire negligently set out by the running of its trains, as is clearly and fully defined in Southern Railway Co. v. Thompson, 129 Ga. 367, 58 S. E. 1044. The judgment is reversed, on the exceptions to the charge, that "the measure of diligence which the law places upon the railroad company is ordinary care and diligence in respect to carrying and keeping in repair spark arresters to prevent fire, and the same ordinary care and diligence in keeping the same in good order." The failure to have or maintain in good order spark arresters was not charged in the petition as an act of negligence, and the court erred in charging upon the subject. The charge was harmful, inasmuch as the jury might have found that the sparks would not have been emitted if the engine had been equipped with a spark arrester, and that ordinary care would require such equipment.

Error from Superior Court, Pulaski County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Petition by the Southern Cotton Mills against Ragan and Lovejoy, receivers of the Hawkinsville Cotton Mill, to set aside a judicial sale of the plant of the Hawkinsville Cotton Mill. From a decree dismissing the petition on demurrer, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

In the case of Planters' Bank, Trustee, etc., v. Hawkinsville Cotton Mill, a corporation, Ragan and Lovejoy were appointed receivers for the manufacturing plant of the Hawkinsville Cotton Mill. The Southern Cotton Mills, a corporation, brought its petition against such receivers. The substance of the petition, so far as is here material, is as follows:

"3. That in connection with the said Hawkinsville Cotton Mill Corporation, and attached thereto, was an electric plant of the value of $12,000 or more, consisting of all the machinery and apparatus, together with poles and wires, necessary for the operation of the electric plant, and in connection therewith was a franchise, or what was purported and represented to be a franchise, granted by the city of Hawkinsville, and under a contract with said city of Hawkinsville the said Hawkinsville Cotton Mill was to furnish said city and its inhabitants with electric lights for a term of 10 years.

"4. That the said receivers were authorized and ordered by your honor to dispose of said property by public sale; that they were unable to make a fair disposition of the same by public sale, but your petitioner, through J. C. Cooper, of the county of Fulton, negotiated for the purchase of said property, including the franchise and the contract of the city of Hawkinsville for the lighting of the same; that negotiations proceeded and were consummated by a proposition to purchase on the part of J. C. Cooper, and an acceptance of the same by the said receivers, at private sale; that a report of said proposition and acceptance was submitted by the receivers to your honor, and your honor, in the exercise of your powers as chancellor, authorized the acceptance of the same and confirmed said sale. The order authorizing and confirming the said sale is a matter of record, and the petitioner prays leave to refer thereto as often as necessary.

"5. That in pursuance of said sale, on the 1st day of March, 1909, the said receivers made and executed and delivered to petitioner a deed, a copy of which is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' to which leave of reference is prayed, by which the said receivers purport to convey all of said property, including the 'franchise granted by the said city' to said mills, for the sum of $10,000 in cash and a promissory note for $5,000, dated January 1, 1909, bearing interest at 8 per cent. and $2,000 of the stock of petitioner, and in addition thereto petitioner was to assume payment of fifty 6 per cent. bonds of the Hawkinsville Cotton Mill, each of the value of $1,000, held by said trustee.

"6. That your petitioner paid through J. C. Cooper the said $10,000 in cash, and took possession of said property. * * *

"10. Your petitioner, upon investigation, ascertained that there was no such thing as an electric franchise granted by the city of Hawkinsville to the said mill, which the deed purported to convey; and he also ascertained that under its terms the deed did not really convey the poles and wires which are located along the streets and highways in the city of Hawkinsville and adjacent thereto.

"11. Said electric plant was of the value of $12,000 or more, as shown by the representation of the receivers who offered the same for sale in connection with the manufacturing plant, the said sum being an amount required to construct the said plant; and in addition thereto there was the value of the franchise or contract for the lighting of the city of Hawkinsville. * * *

"13. Petitioner was informed that the money paid by Cooper for it in the purchase of said property is now in the hands of the receivers, with the exception of a small amount which had been paid out; but the said receivers are paying out, and will continue to do so unless enjoined. Petitioner does not undertake to say how it happened that, in the making of the deed, the electric plant and the franchise, with the valuable contract with the city of Hawkinsville, was not conveyed in the deed; but he presents the facts as they exist to your honor, exercising chancery powers in the supervision of the estate in the hands of the receivers appointed by the court.

"14. But petitioner does charge that said deed was not made in conformity with the negotiations, and the same should be canceled and the sale set aside, for the following reasons: (1) Because the receivers never had the franchise which they offered to sell, and which constituted a large element of value in the property purchased by petitioner. (2) That petitioner, in the purchase of said property from the receivers, was largely induced to buy it by the fact that the franchise and electric plant was a part of the property, and he has utterly failed to get a title thereto. (3) The sale is absolutely void, for the reason that the receivers had no title to the property which they purported to convey.

"15. Petitioner shows that by his failure to obtain the property that he purchased he had been injured and damaged in the sum of $20,000. * * *

"17. Petitioner stands ready to account for the earnings of the mill and the electric plant during the operation of the same from the time that it took charge of said plant until it was closed.

"18. The premises considered, petitioner prays: (1) That the receivers be enjoined from disposing of any money paid by petitioner, or J. C. Cooper for petitioner, in the purchase of said property, until further orders of the court. (2) That the deed purporting to convey to petitioner the said manufacturing plant and franchise be canceled, and that petitioner be repaid the money which he has paid for same, or whatever amount be due it upon an accounting of the operations of the plant during its possession of the same. (3) That in any event petitioner should be repaid the value of the franchises and the electric plant, and the contract purporting to be existing between said Hawkinsville Cotton Mill and the city of Hawkinsville for the lighting of said city and the furnishing of light to its inhabitants, to wit, the sum of $12,000. (4) That inasmuch as the manufacturing plant is not now in operation, and the title to the same is involved, and the former receivers in charge of the same are parties defendant to the petition, ask that receivers be appointed to take charge of said property and hold it during the disposition of the issues raised by the petition."

The petition was filed December 22, 1909. It was demurred to, both generally and specially, by the receivers. The demurrers were sustained, and petitioner excepted.

R. L. Berner and J. R. Cooper, both of Macon, for plaintiff in error. W. L. & Warren Grice, of Hawkinsville, and Hardeman, Jones, Callaway & Johnston, of Macon, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1, 2] A sale by a receiver appointed by a court is a typical judicial sale, and the maxim "caveat emptor" applies to such a sale. The purchaser must look for himself as to the title and soundness of the property sold. Civil Code, § 6054; Campbell v. Parker, 59 N. J. Eq. 342, 45 Atl. 116. Such sales are by the court, and there is no one to go back on it if the buyer takes nothing. Fraud will vitiate such a sale; and where it is made to appear, it will authorize the court to set it aside. Folsom v. Howell, 94 Ga. 112, 21 S. E. 186. But in the petition under consideration no fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the receivers in relation to the sale by them was alleged. It is true that the petition alleges that an electric lighting plant was connected with the Hawkinsville Cotton Mill, "and in connection therewith was a franchise which was purported and represented to be a franchise granted by the city of Hawkinsville, and under a contract with said city of Hawkinsville the said Hawkinsville Cotton Mill was to furnish said city and its inhabitants with electric lights for a term of 10 years"; but it does not appear from the petition how this was purported, and who represented it, to be true. The petition further alleges that the petitioner, through Cooper, negotiated with the receivers for the purchase of the property of the Hawkinsville Cotton Mill, "including the franchise and the contract with the city of Hawkinsville for the lighting of the same," and that the proposition made by the petitioner to purchase all of such property was accepted by the receivers under the authorization of the judge, and that the sale made in pursuance thereof was subsequently confirmed. There is nothing, however, in such allegations which shows that the receivers did not in good faith believe that the Hawkinsville Cotton Mill had a franchise for the operation of the lighting plant and a contract with the city of Hawkinsville for the lighting of its streets.

While a court of equity would doubtless relieve a purchaser at a receiver's sale, where it was made to appear, before completion of the sale and purchase, that he had acted in good faith and in the exercise of ordinary diligence, and the relief granted to him would not prejudicially affect the rights of any one, yet a strong case must be presented before such a purchaser would be granted relief, where a sale has been made and confirmed, and the conveyance of the property executed and delivered, and the purchaser put in possession. The petition here presented no such case. The sale was made and confirmed, the conveyance was executed and delivered, and the purchaser was placed in possession of the manufacturing plant of the Hawkinsville Cotton Mill and the electric lighting plant connected therewith, and operated both the manufacturing and the electric plant until November, 1909, being a term of several months' duration. So far as appears from the petition, the purchaser exercised no diligence in ascertaining whether the city of Hawkinsville had granted a franchise to the Hawkinsville Cotton Mill for operating the electric lighting plant, or whether the city had entered into a contract with the Hawkinsville Mill for the lighting of its streets for a given term. An inquiry of the clerk of the city council or an examination of its minutes, either of which could have readily been made, would certainly have developed whether such franchise and contract existed. Furthermore, no reason is alleged for the long delay after the consummation of the sale before the purchaser ascertained that there was no such franchise and contract. Absolutely no excuse is alleged why the purchaser failed to ascertain why the conveyance executed by the receivers did not cover the electric plant, the franchise for operating the same, and the contract with the city of Hawkinsville. A mere reading of that instrument would have disclosed the property conveyed therein, and that it did not convey the electric plant, the franchise for conducting it, and the contract with the city. In this connection, see Wylly v. Gazan, 69 Ga. 506 (5), and citations.

There is not even an offer on the part of the purchaser to return the property purchased to the receivers; but the appointment of other receivers is prayed, which this court, when the case was formerly here, decided that the purchaser was not entitled to. And even if such a prayer could be considered tantamount to an offer to return the property to the court or the receivers it had already appointed, there is nothing in the petition to show that the property was in the same condition or of equal value at the time of the filing of the petition as it was when the sale was consummated and the petitioner put in possession thereof. The petition, on the other hand, discloses the fact that the manufacturing plant had been closed and was not in operation at the time of the filing of the petition. For what cause it was not suggested. While an accounting is prayed between the receivers and the petitioner, the latter merely offers "to account for the earnings of the mill and the electric plant during the operation of the same from the time that [the petitioner] took charge of said plant until it was closed." Certainly the mere earnings made by the purchaser from the property during that time were not what it was bound to account for, even if an accounting such as prayed for could be had. The earnings may have been little or nothing, and solely because of the fault of the purchaser in operating the property. Furthermore, it is not made to appear from the petition that the rights of the bondholders of the Hawkinsville Cotton Mill and its other creditors would not be injuriously affected upon the cancellation of the conveyance made by the receivers. The petition shows that some of the purchase money paid to the receivers has been paid out by them. How much is not alleged.

[3] From what we have said, we find no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the court did not err in dismissing the petition on demurrer.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1194*)—DECISION ON FORMER APPEAL—LAW OF THE CASE.

This case was before the Supreme Court on a former occasion, on exception to a judgment rendered at an interlocutory hearing. Cooper v. Parsons, 136 Ga. 789, 72 S. E. 158. It was then decided: "3. A corporation issued bonds and executed a mortgage to secure them. Under an equitable petition, filed by the trustee named in the mortgage, the property of the mortgagor was placed in the hands of receivers, and a decree of foreclosure was entered.

The receivers sold at private sale the property covered by the mortgage, and, upon confirmation by the court, made a deed and delivered the property; the grantee paying an amount in cash, giving a certain note to the receivers for another amount, and assuming the payment of the bonds and buying subject to the mortgage. Held, that the directors of the mortgagor had no such title or interest as authorized them to file, in their own names as directors, a petition to enforce the contract of purchase from the original receivers, or to seek to foreclose the mortgage, and to have new receivers appointed to take charge of the property sold." Before this decision was rendered by the Supreme Court, the demurrer was heard and overruled by the trial court, and the defendants excepted. Held, that the decision above mentioned extended to the right of the plaintiffs to maintain the action; and, the petition showing upon its face substantially the facts upon which the ruling was predicated, the ruling announced is applicable also to the case on demurrer. Accordingly, the judgment overruling the demurrer will be reversed.

CARRIERS (§ 179*)—TERMINAL COMPANY—DESTRUCTION OF FREIGHT CARS—CARRIER OR BAILEE.

Under the facts of this case, the defendant railroad company, at the time the cars were burned, did not hold them as a common carrier; and, as the defendant was not negligent in respect to the fire, it was not liable for the injury to or destruction of the cars.

Error from Superior Court, Baldwin County; James B. Park, Judge.

Action by the Central of Georgia Railway Company against the Milledgeville Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The Central of Georgia Railway Company brought suit against the Milledgeville Railway Company for damages to two freight cars by fire. By consent of the parties the case was tried before the judge, without the intervention of a jury, upon the following agreed statement of facts, with the right by either party to except to the decision of the judge:

"1. The Milledgeville Railway Company is chartered as a railroad corporation. It has no freight cars of its own, but it operates over its own railroad tracks in and around the city of Milledgeville, Ga., connecting with the Central of Georgia Railway and the Georgia Railroad. It transports, with its own engines and employes, empty freight cars and cars loaded with freight between its junction with the Central of Georgia Railway and stores, warehouses, industries, and other places of business of consignees, located upon or adjacent to its tracks in and around Milledgeville. It charges and collects from the consignees or shippers, as the case may be, the sum of $2.50 per car for each loaded car transported by it in either direction. When loaded cars are received by it from its connection, or from shippers on its line, it makes no charge for the movement of the empty car in the opposite direction; the revenue derived by it from the transportation of the loaded car covering its compensation for the service in moving the empty car.

"2. At the date of the transaction referred to in the petition, and for many years prior thereto, the following custom or understanding existed between the plaintiff and defendant as to the receipt of cars from the Central Railway at Milledgeville, and their return, either empty or loaded, to wit: (a) At the time these cars were burned, defendant had no specific agreement, written or otherwise, with either the Central Railway or the Georgia Railroad. The actual practice was as follows: When the defendant had prospective loading for either line, and also had empty cars in its possession, whether Central's, Georgia's, or belonging to a foreign line, defendant held them and loaded them back to the line from which they had been received. (b) All Central of Georgia Railway system cars which are delivered by it loaded to the Milledgeville Railway, consigned to some point on the defendant's line, to be promptly returned by it when unloaded, except that such cars may be held by the Milledgeville Railway for immediate reloading of freight from some industry or place of business on its line, to be shipped via the Central of Georgia Railway, or if the Milledgeville Railway is advised by one or more of the places of business or industries on its line that in the next day or so a car, or cars, will be needed, to be loaded with freight for shipment to some point on or via the Central of Georgia Railway, the Milledgeville Railway retains or holds such Central Railway cars as are in its possession necessary for this purpose, until it has positive orders from shippers on its line for placing the cars; this being done in order to save both railroads unnecessary work in the switching or movement of empty freight cars. (c) When the Milledgeville Railway had no empty cars of the Central Railway in its possession as above, and such empty cars were desired by shippers or industries on its line (the Milledgeville Railway Company's) for shipment of freight via the Central of Georgia Railway, the Milledgeville Railway would call upon the Central Railway for empty cars, which would be delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, transported by the latter on its tracks to the place of business of the shipper, and returned by the Milledgeville Railway to the Central Railway when loaded.

"3. The cars referred to in the petition and in this statement of facts were received by the Milledgeville Railway from the Central Railway in pursuance of the foregoing custom or understanding.

"4. On March 28, 1907, the Central Railway delivered its system car No. 25440, loaded with lime, to the Milledgeville Railway, at the junction of the tracks of the plaintiff and defendant, for transportation and delivery to the Cook Lumber Company, on the defendant's line at Milledgeville. The loaded car was transported by the defendant and placed at the Cook Lumber Company's lime house on April 6, 1907. Defendant was notified by the consignee that the car was empty April 9, 1907. Defendant thereafter held said empty car in its possession, intending to place it at the clay pit in Milledgeville, a point on its line, on April 10, 1907, to be loaded by a shipper, and thereafter transported and redelivered by defendant to the Central of Georgia Railway. Plaintiff was not advised of the defendant's intended use of the car, and had no knowledge of defendant's intention. There was no agreement or custom requiring such notice.

"5. On March 18, 1907, the Central of Georgia Railway Company placed a foreign car (C., N. O. & T. P. car No. 12251) at the junction of the tracks of plaintiff and defendant, loaded with flour for A. J. Carr Company, whose place of business was on the defendant's line in Milledgeville, Ga. The car was placed by the defendant at the consignee's warehouse on March 20, 1907. It was unloaded by the consignee, and was, on March 21, 1907, moved empty from the said warehouse by the defendant to the Oconee River Mills, a point on defendant's line in Milledgeville, Ga. It was there loaded by the Oconee River Mills with meal, consigned to Athens, Ga., via the Georgia Railroad. It was moved by the defendant from the Oconee River Mills on March 26, 1907, and delivered by the defendant to the Georgia Railroad for transportation to Athens, Ga. It was not known to defendant, at the time the car was placed at the Oconee River Mills, that it was to be loaded for a station on the Georgia Railroad; but the fact that it was so loaded became known to defendant when the car was switched by it to the Georgia Railroad depot to be transported to Athens. Defendant could have ascertained this fact, however, before the car was loaded, if it had inquired of the shipper. Said car was made empty at its destination in Athens, Ga., and was returned empty by the Georgia Railroad to Milledgeville, April 7, 1907. The defendant thereafter held said car in its possession, intending to place it at the Oconee River Mills, a point on its line, on the morning of April 10, 1907, for loading with meal to be routed via the Central of Georgia Railway from Milledgeville. Plaintiff was not advised of defendant's use of the car, and had no knowledge thereof. There was no agreement or custom requiring such notice.

"6. Central of Georgia system car No. 25440 was entirely destroyed by fire, and the foreign car (C., N. O. & T. P. No. 12251) was damaged by fire, while in the possession of the Milledgeville Railway, under the foregoing circumstances, on April 10, 1907; the amount of said loss and damage aggregating the sum of $619, of which sum $444 was for the destruction of Central of Georgia car No. 25440, and $175 for damage to C., N. O. & T. P. car No. 12251."

It further appears from the record that the defendant, prior to the suit, agreed in writing with the plaintiff that the claim for damages to the C., N. O. & T. P. car No. 12251, delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, might be joined in the action for damages to the car belonging to the plaintiff. Judgment was rendered for the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted.

H. W. Johnson, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. Joseph B. & Bryan Cumming, of Augusta, for defendant in error.

FISH, O. J. (after stating the facts as above). As will be seen from the foregoing agreed statement of facts, the only question in this case is whether the Milledgeville Railway Company (hereinafter referred to as the defendant), at the time of the fire, held the cars as a common carrier, and was therefore liable as such for their injury or destruction. We are aware of no decision of this court which throws any light upon the point. It has been held in other jurisdictions that railroad companies are bound to transport the cars of other companies, and, while so transporting and in complete control of them, are liable as common carriers for any injuries to them. New Jersey R., etc., Co. v. Penn. R. Co., 27 N. J. Law, 100; Mallory v. Tloga R. Co., 39 Barb. (N. Y.) 488; Vermont, etc., R. Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co., 14 Allen (Mass.) 462, 92 Am. Dec. 785; Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Chicago & Alton Ry. Co. (C. C.) 25 Fed. 317; Peoria, etc., Ry. Co. v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 109 Ill. 135, 50 Am. Rep. 605; East St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Wabash, etc., Ry. Co., 123 Ill. 594, 15 N. E. 45; Peoria, etc., Ry. Co. v. United States Rolling Stock Co., 136 Ill. 643, 27 N. E. 59, 29 Am. St. Rep. 348; Pittsburg, etc., Ry.

Co. v. City of Chicago, 242 Ill. 178, 89 N. E. 1022, 134 Am. St. Rep. 316. In some of these cases it appears that the owner of the cars was liable for the charges for transporting them; and we think it fair to assume that such was a fact in all of them, except in Peoria, etc., Ry. v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 109 Ill. 135, 50 Am. Rep. 605, where it is stated in the opinion: "The car in question was delivered to defendant [the switching company], to be carried over its road to the warehouse of the consignees of the freight it contained. A charge for the service to be rendered was made, and was paid by the consignees." In St. Paul, etc., R. Co. v. Minneapolis, etc., Ry. Co., 26 Minn. 243, 2 N. W. 700, 37 Am. Rep. 404, it appears that, by agreement between the parties (connecting railroad companies), the defendant was to receive the plaintiff's cars for delivery on a point on the defendant's line, and to return them in as good condition as when received, ordinary wear and tear by use excepted. Both parties were to share the profits of the freight so carried, and defendant was to pay the plaintiff a fixed sum for the use of its cars. Without fault on the defendant's part, certain of the plaintiff's cars were destroyed by fire on the defendant's line, while being thus transported. It was held that the defendant was not liable. The court said: "It [the defendant] neither contracted nor undertook to perform any service as a carrier in transporting them [the cars] from one place to another, nor was it entitled to receive any compensation whatever for what it agreed to do in the way of taking and using them upon its road, and redelivering them to the plaintiff at Merriam Junction. It did not receive the cars so transported for hire, but for use on its line of road in doing a business of transportation which was common to both roads, and in the profits of which both companies were to share. The compensation agreed upon was to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff for such use, and not by the latter to the former as a reward for transportation. These facts alone show that the defendant's liability, if any, was not that of a common carrier. * * *

As the bailment was reciprocally beneficial to both parties, no liability could attach to the defendant by reason of the destruction of the property intrusted to it as bailee, unless it occurred through some negligence on defendant's part, amounting to want of ordinary care." In the case at bar the defendant was to receive no compensation from the Central of Georgia Railway Company (hereinafter referred to as the plaintiff) for the transportation of cars delivered by it to the defendant. Nor was the defendant to pay the plaintiff anything for the use of such cars. Whatever may have been the reason for such custom or understanding in this respect between the parties, we may presume that it was reciprocally beneficial to both.

Under our law the plaintiff was bound to deliver to the defendant the loaded cars, and the defendant was bound to receive and transport them to their destination. Civil Code, §§ 2655, 2756. The charge for their transportation was to be fixed by the Railroad Commissioners of the state. Id. § 2631. If a railroad corporation doing business in this state "shall charge, collect, demand or receive more than a fair and reasonable rate of toll or compensation * * * for the use and transportation of any railroad car upon its track, * * * the same shall be deemed guilty of extortion" (Id. § 2628); and any unjust discrimination in its rates or charges of toll, or any compensation by such railroad corporation for the use and transportation of any such car, is forbidden (Id. § 2629).

As we have already stated, the only point for decision in this case is whether the defendant was a common carrier in respect to the cars in question at the time they were burned. In the view we take of the case, it is unnecessary to decide whether, under the agreed statement of facts, the defendant was a common carrier as to the cars while engaged in transporting them from the junction of the lines of the parties to Milledgeville, or in returning them to the junction. We leave this point open, as, in our opinion, the defendant did not, under the facts of the case, hold the cars as a common carrier at the time they were burned. The responsibility of a common carrier for goods received for transportation "ceases with their delivery at destination according to the direction of the person sending, or according to the custom of the trade." Civil Code, § 2730. If the defendant, when it received the loaded car of the plaintiff at the junction of the tracks of the plaintiff and defendant, for transportation and delivery to the Cook Lumber Company, on the defendant's line at Milledgeville, became, under the facts of the case, a common carrier both as to the car and the freight contained therein, when the car with its freight was delivered to the consignee to be unloaded by it, the defendant's relation as a common carrier to the car and its freight ceased and was suspended until defendant retook possession of the car after it was unloaded. Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Chicago & Alton R. Co. (C. C.) 25 Fed. 317; East St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Wabash, etc., Ry. Co., 123 Ill. 594, 15 N. E. 45; Peoria, etc., Ry. Co. v. United States Rolling Stock Co., 136 Ill. 643, 27 N. E. 59, 29 Am. St. Rep. 348. According to these decisions, if the defendant was a common carrier of the car while being transported, if the car had been destroyed by fire while in possession and control of the consignee, the defendant would not have been liable, for the reason that the car would not then have been in the exclusive possession and control of the defendant. Plainly, for the same reason, if the car, after being unloaded by the consignee, had been redelivered to the defendant as a common carrier, and, in accordance with the custom and understanding between the plaintiff and the defendant then existing it had been placed in the custody and control of another industry upon the defendant's line, to be there unloaded by such industry and then delivered to the defendant for transportation to the defendant's line, and the car had been burned, without fault on the part of the defendant, while being loaded by such shipping industry, or after being loaded by it and before it was returned to the defendant, then the defendant would not have been liable for its destruction. After the car had been unloaded by the consignee and returned to the defendant, to be held by it under the custom and understanding between the parties—that is, that the car should be held by the defendant for a day or so, when the defendant had been advised that the car would be needed by an industry on its line, to be loaded with freight for shipment to some point on the plaintiff's line—our opinion is that, in such circumstances, the defendant held the car as a bailee to await the time when, in accordance with the custom or understanding existing between the plaintiff and defendant, the latter should again receive the car to transport it to the shipper on defendant's line to be loaded by the shipper. So holding it by the defendant, in accordance with the custom or understanding existing between the parties, was for the benefit of both parties, as the defendant would be paid $2.50 by the shipper for the transportation of the freight by defendant to the plaintiff's line, and the plaintiff would receive its charges for transporting the freight over its own line. It is true that, while awaiting a shipment to be made the next day, the defendant had the exclusive possession and control of the empty car; but this fact of itself, in our opinion, did not make the defendant a common carrier as to the car while it was thus in the possession and control of the defendant, if the relation of the defendant as to the car was ever that of a common carrier. Generally, all bailees have the exclusive possession and control of the goods or property bailed; yet they are not, as a rule, for that reason, held to be insurers of the goods or property so held. Suppose, under a custom or understanding existing between the plaintiff and defendant, the latter had the right to hold an empty car of the plaintiff, after its return by the consignee, for an additional time of say 30 or 60 days, or for an indefinite time, to await an order for it from a shipper on the defendant's line, could it be reasonably contended that the defendant, during all the time it held the car for such purpose, sustained the relation of a common carrier as to it, and was therefore to be held for such time as an insurer of the car? We think not.

The fact that the car was to be held for such purpose for the short time of a day or so certainly can make no difference in principle. The car was received by the defendant from the consignee on the 9th of a given month, and the defendant was advised that a shipper on its line would need the car on the next day, to be loaded for shipment over the plaintiff's line, and the defendant intended to deliver it to the shipper for such purpose. The car, however, was destroyed by fire before the time for such delivery, without fault on the defendant's part. As we have already said, the defendant, in our opinion, was not liable in the circumstances for damages for the destruction of the car. Of course, we do not mean to hold that the mere fact that the car was stationary, or not being actually transported by the defendant, at the time it was burned, would release the defendant from liability if it were a common carrier as to the car. If the car, while being transported with freight to the consignee, or while being returned loaded or empty to the plaintiff, had been stopped in the customary way, and had been destroyed while so stopped, the defendant, if a common carrier as to the car, would have been liable as an insurer.

What was the defendant's relation as to the C., N. O. & T. P. car? On March 18, 1907, the plaintiff placed this car at the junction of the tracks of the plaintiff and defendant, loaded with flour for Carr & Co., whose place of business was on the defendant's line in Milledgeville. The car was placed by defendant at the consignee's warehouse two days thereafter, and was unloaded that day or the next, by the consignee. On March 21st it was moved empty from the consignee's warehouse by the defendant to the Oconee River Mills, a point on the defendant's line in Milledgeville, where it was loaded with meal by the Oconee Mills, consigned to Athens, Ga., and was delivered by the defendant to the Georgia Railroad, to be transported to its destination. It was so transported, unloaded, and returned empty over the Georgia Railroad to the defendant on April 7th. The defendant was holding it from the last-named date in accordance with the agreement or understanding between it and the plaintiff, and in the regular course of business, to be loaded by the Oconee River Mills with meal on April 10th, and then to be transported by the defendant over its line to the plaintiff's line, and then to be transported to its destination over the latter's line. It was damaged by fire, without fault on the part of the defendant, on April 10th, at the same time the other car was burned. If this foreign car had been damaged during the continuance of what we may term the Athens incident, the defendant's liability for such damage would have presented a different question from the one actually involved in the case. We are not here concerned with any redress, if any, the plaintiff may have against the defendant for its unauthorized use of its car during the Athens incident. When the car came back into the possession of the defendant, the customary relations as to it were resumed, and we think that the defendant's relation to it was the same as that of the defendant to the plaintiff's own car, while this foreign car was held from the 7th to the 10th of April, to be loaded on the latter date by the Oconee Mills, and then to be returned by the defendant to the plaintiff to be transported over the latter's line.

It follows, from what we have said, that the court did not err in finding for the defendant as to both cars. In reaching our conclusion we have not failed to consider the decision made in Peoria, etc., Ry. Co. v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 109 Ill. 135, 50 Am. Rep. 605, which is strongly relied upon by counsel for plaintiff in error in the case at bar. In that case the defendant railroad company's principal business was switching cars for other railroad companies. Its tracks were connected with those of other railroad companies by a transfer switch, and with mills, elevators, and manufactories in and around the city where its business was transacted. The plaintiff corporation brought a car loaded with freight to the city, and placed the same on the transfer track, with orders to the defendant to ship the same to a certain distillery, to which place it was taken and unloaded, the consignees to pay the transfer charges. When unloaded it was taken by the defendant, without orders from the plaintiff, to a sugar refinery, to be loaded and then switched to the transfer track for shipment. On the same day the sugar refinery was burned, and also the car, which was standing in close proximity. No negligence as to the fire was attributed to the defendant. There was evidence tending to show that it was the common understanding among the companies doing business at this point, if other shippers desired cars, that the defendant, without any specific orders to that effect, was at liberty to place them at other places of business to be loaded, and, when loaded, they would be returned to the company owning such cars to be shipped. It was held that the defendant was liable, as a common carrier, to the plaintiff for the value of the cars so destroyed. We cannot agree to the conclusion reached by that learned court under the facts stated. Moreover, that court in two later cases (East St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Wabash, etc., Ry. Co., 123 Ill. 594, 15 N. E. 45; Peoria, etc., Ry. Co. v. United States Rolling Stock Co., 136 Ill. 643, 27 N. E. 59, 29 Am. St. Rep. 348) seems to us to have made rulings which in principle conflict with what was held in the former case, though the former case was not expressly overruled.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WILSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 14, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 67)—CONTRACT FOR SERVICES—VIOLATION—ATTEMPT TO DEFRAUD—OFFENSES—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Section 1 of the act of August 15, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90; Penal Code 1910, § 715), provides: "If any person shall contract with another to perform for him services of any kind, with intent to procure money or other thing of value thereby, and not to perform the service contracted for, to the loss and damage of the hirer, or, after having so contracted, shall procure from the hirer money, or other thing of value, with intent not to perform such service, to the loss and damage of the hirer, he shall be deemed a common cheat and swindler, and upon conviction shall be punished as for a misdemeanor." Section 2 of the same act (Penal Code 1910, § 716) provides: "Satisfactory proof of the contract, the procuring thereon of money or other thing of value, the failure to perform the services so contracted for, or failure to return the money so advanced with interest thereon at the time said labor was to be performed, without good and sufficient cause, and loss or damage to the hirer, shall be deemed presumptive evidence of the intent referred to in the preceding section." Held, section 1 is to be construed as denouncing as fraudulent practices of the character therein described, and providing for the punishment of persons violating its terms; the legislative purpose being, not to punish for a mere failure to comply with the obligation, but for the procurement of money or other thing of value with the fraudulent intent not to perform the service.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 67*)—VIOLATION OF CONTRACT—EVIDENCE—FRAUD—INTENT—STATUTES.

Section 2 is merely a rule of evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 64*)—PARTIAL INVALIDITY—CONTRACT OF SERVICE—FRAUDULENT BREACH.

The two sections are severable, and the first may exist independently of the latter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 58-66, 195; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 83*)—MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 67*)—INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—ADVANCEMENT—FRAUDULENT INTENT.

Under the construction above given, no part of the legislation mentioned offends against the prohibition of the thirteenth amendment of the federal Constitution against involuntary servitude except as punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or against the provisions forbidding peonage, found in Rev. St. U. S. §§ 1990, 5526 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 1266, 3715), enacted to secure the enforcement of such amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 150-151½; Dec. Dig. § 83.* Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 554*)—WITNESSES (§ 83*)—COMPETENCY—PERSON CHARGED WITH CRIME—STATEMENT BY ACCUSED.

A person on trial, charged with such an offense, is incompetent as a witness; but he may make such a statement before the jury as he desires, to which the jury may give such credit as in their opinion its truth entitles it to receive, even to the extent of believing it in preference to the sworn testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1255, 1256; Dec. Dig. § 554.* Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 243, 244; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 67*)—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—FRAUDULENT BREACH.

The fact that one on trial, charged with the offense provided for in this statute, cannot be heard to testify as a witness in his own behalf, does not affect the validity of either section of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

7. FORMER DECISION DISTINGUISHED.

The case of Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219, 31 Sup. Ct. 145, 55 L. Ed. 191, distinguished.

Certified Question from Court of Appeals.

Tim Wilson was convicted of violating the labor law, and he appealed to the Court of Appeals, by which a question was certified to the Supreme Court.

The Court of Appeals certified for decision the following:

"The plaintiff in error was convicted of a violation of the act of August 15, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90), codified in sections 715 and 716 of the Penal Code of 1910. The second section of said act, codified in section 716 of the Penal Code, is as follows: 'Satisfactory proof of the contract, the procuring thereon of money or other thing of value, the failure to perform the services so contracted for, or failure to return the money, so advanced with interest thereon at the time said labor was to be performed, without good and sufficient cause, and loss and damage to the hirer, shall be deemed presumptive evidence of the intent referred to' in the first section of the act, codified in section 715 of the Penal Code of 1910. The presumption raised by the second section of the act in question was used against the plaintiff in error on his trial.

"Does the legislation above referred to offend against the prohibition of the thirteenth amendment to the federal Constitution against involuntary servitude except as punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, and against the provision forbidding peonage, found in Rev. St. U. S. §§ 1990, 5526 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 1266, 3715), enacted to secure the enforcement of such amendment, especially since under the laws of this state the accused cannot testify for the purpose of rebutting the statutory presumption against him thus raised?"

The caption of the act is: "An act to make it illegal for any person to procure money, or other thing of value, on a contract to perform services, with intent to defraud, and to fix punishment therefor, and for other purposes." Section 1 is: "Be it enacted by the General Assembly, and it is hereby enacted by authority of the same, that from and after the passage of this act, if any person shall contract with another to perform for him services of any kind with intent to procure money, or other thing of value thereby, and not to perform the service contracted for, to the loss and damage of the hirer, or, after having so contracted, shall procure from the hirer money, or other thing of value, with intent not to perform such service, to the loss and damage of the hirer, he shall be deemed a common cheat and swindler, and upon conviction shall be punished as prescribed in section 1039 of the Code." Section 2 is the same as copied in the question propounded by the Court of Appeals. The only remaining part of the act is section 3, which repeals conflicting laws.

C. H. Beazley and D. J. Ragan, for plaintiff in error. W. G. Martin, Sol., for the State.

ATKINSON, J. [1-3] The construction of a state statute is a matter for the state courts, and the federal courts will accept the construction so made by the state courts. Cargill v. Minnesota, 180 U. S. 452, 21 Sup. Ct. 423, 45 L. Ed. 619. Whether the statute is violative of some provision of the Constitution of the United States furnishes ground for jurisdiction in the Supreme Court of the United States. The question propounded by the Court of Appeals covers both section 715 and section 716 of the Penal Code. These two sections were codified from different sections of the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90). Section 715 provides that certain things shall constitute a misdemeanor. Section 716 provides that proof of certain things, comprehended by the preceding section, shall be deemed "presumptive evidence of the intent" therein mentioned. The first specified section deals with a substantive offense; the second deals with a rule of evidence in proving the commission of the offense. It is a well-settled rule of constitutional law that if two parts of an act, or two laws or sections of the Code in regard to the same subject-matter, are severable in character, so that one may exist and carry out the legislative intent independently of the other, the holding of one to be invalid will not necessarily result in declaring the other invalid. The two designated sections are severable, and the former can stand independently of the latter; and hence the offense declared by section 715 may exist, and that section be a constitutional and valid law, whether or not section 716 is constitutional. Latson v. Wells, 136 Ga. 681, 71 S. E. 1052.

[4] This court has several times construed section 715. It has uniformly been held that the offense therein declared was not for failure to perform service or pay debts, but was for fraudulently procuring money, or other thing of value; that the fraudulent conduct of the defendant was the gist of the crime, not merely his failure to perform his contract. Lamar v. State, 120 Ga. 312, 47 S. E. 958; Lamar v. Prosser, 121 Ga. 153 (7), 48 S. E. 977; Vinson v. State, 124 Ga. 19 (2), 52 S. E. 79; Townsend v. State, 124 Ga. 69 (1), 52 S. E. 293; Banks v. State, 124 Ga. 15 (4), 52 S. E. 74, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1007; Sterling v. State, 126 Ga. 92, 54 S. E. 921; Vance v. State, 128 Ga. 661, 57 S. E. 889; Dyas v. State, 126 Ga. 557, 55 S. E. 488; Latson v. Wells, 136 Ga. 681, 71 S. E. 1052. Substantially the same distinction is well recognized as existing between merely buying on a credit and failing to pay, and fraudulently procuring goods, which constitutes the person doing it a common cheat and swindler. In order to convict a defendant of an offense described in section 715, the defendant must not only make a contract for service and violate it, but it must be with the fraudulent intent to procure money or other thing of value thereby, and not to perform the service contracted for, to the loss and damage of the hirer; or after having so contracted, to be guilty he must procure from the hirer money, or other thing of value, with the fraudulent intent not to perform such service, to the loss and damage of the hirer. Thus it will be seen that mere breach of contract or failure to perform the service does not render the defendant guilty of the offense, but there must be added the fraudulent intent to procure money, or other thing of value, or the fraudulent procurement of it with intent not to perform the service, to the loss and damage of the hirer. It may be said that it makes no difference to the defendant whether he is imprisoned for breach of contract or for fraud. Perhaps not, but where his transaction partakes of fraud the state may condemn it. Lamar v. Prosser, supra. Construing as above indicated section 715 of the Penal Code, and that portion of the act from which it was codified, they are not violative of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States (Latson v. Wells, 136 Ga. 681, 71 S. E. 1052), or in conflict with the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States, §§ 1990, 5526, forbidding peonage (Townsend v. State, 124 Ga. 69, 52 S. E. 293).

[5] The right of the accused to make a statement will be further mentioned while discussing the next section. It is sufficient at this time to say that the mere fact that a person accused of crime is not allowed to testify as a witness in this state does not prevent him from being convicted of crime. See Vance v. State, 128 Ga. 661, 57 S. E. 889. If it did, the whole Penal Code might as well be declared unconstitutional. At common law the accused could not testify, but it could not be contended that his conviction would on that account be violative of the guarantee of due process of law contained in Magna Charta. To attempt by penal law to compel a person to render service to another involuntarily may constitute peonage; but it is not peonage for the state to punish one by compelling him to serve the state as a punishment for his crime committed by defrauding his employer of money or other thing of value. The two are as wide apart as crime and debt.

We now come to consider section 716 of the Penal Code. This provides that satisfactory proof of the contract, the procuring thereon of money, or other thing of value, the failure to perform the service so contracted for, or failure to return the money so advanced with interest thereon, at the time the labor was to be performed, without good and sufficient cause, and loss and damage to the hirer, "shall be deemed presumptive evidence of the intent referred to in the preceding section." There are many cases recognized in the law in which presumptions arise from proof of certain facts, or where proof of certain facts constitutes presumptive evidence of criminal intent. Proof of possession of stolen property shortly after the theft, if unexplained, may authorize a finding of guilty intent on the part of the possessor. Proof of the killing of a human being, without any evidence tending to show justification or mitigation, will authorize a presumption of malice. At common law, evidence that a passenger was injured by the breaking of the vehicle of the hirer, or defect in his road, was sufficient to authorize a presumption of negligence. Under statutes, proof of injury by a carrier is sometimes declared sufficient to raise a presumption of negligence. Numerous illustrations might be given where the Legislature has declared that proof of certain facts is sufficient to raise a presumption of guilty intent or like element of crime. See instances cited in Banks v. State, 124 Ga. 15 (5, 6), 52 S. E. 74, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1007. If such legislative provisions are not "purely arbitrary, and there is a rational relation between the two facts, and the accused is not deprived of proper opportunity to submit all of the facts bearing upon the issue, it has been held that such statutes do not violate the requirements of due process of law." Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 238, 31 Sup. Ct. 145, 55 L. Ed. 191, and citations. See, also, Banks v. State, 124 Ga. 15 (5), 52 S. E. 74, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1007. In the case of Bailey v. Alabama, supra, a law of the state of Alabama was under consideration. As it originally stood in the Code, the section provided that any person who, with intent to injure or defraud his employer, entered into a written contract for service, and thereby obtained from his employer money, or other personal property, and with like intent, and without just cause, and without refunding the money or paying for the property, refused to perform the service, should be punished as if he had stolen it. This section was so amended as to make the refusal or failure to perform the service, or to refund the money, or pay for the property, without just cause, prima facie evidence of an intent to injure or defraud.

[8] While peonage and enforced performance of labor contracts were discussed at length, the actual ruling, as shown both by the syllabus and the opinion, was that the section of the Code of Alabama, as amended, "in so far as it makes the refusal or failure to perform labor contracted for, without refunding the money or paying for property received, prima facie evidence of the commission of the crime defined by such section, and when read in connection with the rule of evidence of that state, that the accused cannot testify in regard to uncommunicated motives, is unconstitutional as in conflict with the thirteenth amendment of the legislation authorized by it and enacted by Congress." 219 U. S. 220, 228, 245, 31 Sup. Ct. 145, 55 L. Ed. 191. There are several material differences between the law of Alabama, then under consideration, and the law of this state, as heretofore construed by this court. In the first place, the Alabama statute provided that "any person who with intent to injure or defraud his employer," etc. We do not stop to discuss whether the mere intent to injure may be different from the intent to defraud. Under that statute one-half of the fine went to the employer, thus compensating or benefiting him by convicting the accused, so that the punishment in part operated to reimburse or repay the debt of the employer and reduce his loss. The ruling did not rest entirely upon the statute, but also upon the rule of evidence that the accused could not testify in his own behalf explanatory of his uncommunicated intent. The statute of this state does not contain such a provision, and the prisoner has greater latitude in regard to proving the intent with which he acted. Under the statute of this state (Penal Code, § 716), in order to constitute "presumptive evidence of the intent," satisfactory proof of the contract, the procuring thereon of money, or other thing of value, the failure to perform the service so contracted for, or failure to return the money so advanced, with interest thereon, at the time the labor was to be performed, without good and sufficient cause, and loss or damage to the hirer, is necessary. The accused may show that there was good and sufficient cause, as well as negative the other things in that section. He cannot testify as a witness in this state (Penal Code, § 1037, par. 2); but he has the right to make to the court and jury such statement, not under oath, as he may deem proper in his defense, and, though not compelled to answer any questions on cross-examination, should he think proper to decline to do so, his statement shall have such force as the jury may think right to give it, and "they may believe it in preference to the sworn testimony in the case." Penal Code, § 1036.

[7] In this state, therefore, the accused may state what was his real intent, may deny the evidence introduced, and explain or rebut the presumptive evidence of his intent, if it is raised under the statute. True, the jury are not obliged to believe his statement, or give it any more credit than in their opinion its truth entitles it to receive. But, for that matter, they would not be obliged to believe him if he could be sworn as a witness. His interest would go to his credit, and the jury would not be bound to credit his testimony merely because he gave it under oath. Thus it appears that the statute in this state differs in material particulars from that of Alabama, which was under consideration by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Bailey Case, and also that the rule of evidence which was read into the Alabama statute is different from the rule in this state. The variance is of such character that the ruling in the case cited could not be properly applied as authority for holding section 716 of the Penal Code of Georgia invalid. This statute has heretofore been held not to be violative of the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, nor invalid as being in conflict with sections 1990, 5526, of the Revised Statutes, forbidding peonage. Townsend v. State, 124 Ga. 69, 52 S. E. 293. In that case no separate attack was made on section 2 of the act (which is Penal Code, § 716), but the attack was on the act in its entirety, which included section 2.

Having already held that section 715 was not invalid, and now holding that section 716 is not invalid, the two rulings together answer in the negative the question propounded by the Court of Appeals. All the Justices concur.

MOSS v. STRICKLAND.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 192*)—PROCESS (§ 20*)—LIEN FORECLOSURE—NATURE OF PROCEEDING—ISSUANCE.

An attorney's lien is foreclosed by petition and rule issued by the court as in cases of mortgage foreclosure on land. Where a petition to foreclose an attorney's lien on land, wherein it is alleged that the defendant is a resident of another county, is filed, and, instead of a rule being issued thereon in terms of the statute by the court, process is attached by the clerk, directed to all and singular the sheriffs of this state, commanding the appearance of the defendant at the next term, which petition and process are personally served on the defendant by the sheriff of the county of the defendant's residence, such process is void, because issued by one unauthorized to issue it. A judgment at a subsequent term, based on such process, where there is neither appearance nor waiver of process, is void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 425-427; Dec. Dig. § 192; Process, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. VENUE (§ 5*)—ATTORNEY'S LIEN—FORECLOSURE.

A proceeding to foreclose an attorney's lien upon real property is to be brought as a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage on land, and the venue of such proceeding is the county wherein the land lies. It is not such a civil case as must be brought in the county of the defendant's residence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-11; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

Error from Superior Court, Rabun County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

Petition by J. J. Strickland against R. L. Moss and others to foreclose an attorney's lien on certain land. Judgement for petitioner, and defendant Moss brings error. Reversed.

T. S. Mell, of Athens, for plaintiff in error. H. H. Dean, of Gainesville, and Cobb & Erwin, of Athens, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. J. J. Strickland filed a petition in the superior court of Rabun county to foreclose his lien as an attorney at law upon a tract of land in that county. In his petition he alleged, inter alia, that he was employed as an attorney at law by R. L. Moss and A. K. Childs to recover the land. That the suit was successful, that he recorded his lien as provided by the statute, that A. K. Childs had died, and that W. L. Childs and D. C. Barrow had been appointed his executors. The prayer was for the foreclosure of the lien, and for process against Moss and the executors of Childs, alleged to be residents of Clarke county. Process was issued by the clerk, and the defendants were personally served with copies of the suit. A judgment was entered foreclosing the lien, and fi. fa. issued thereon. To the levy of the fi. fa. Moss, one of the defendants, interposed an affidavit of illegality. This was dismissed on demurrer, and Moss excepted.

[1] 1. The affidavit of illegality attacks the validity of the judgment, on the ground that the process was void, and that the defendants neither appeared nor otherwise waived process. Jurisdiction is dependent on the form and nature of the process, to the extent that it can only arise from a proper service of a notice substantially sufficient to apprise the party of everything which he is then entitled to know. 1 Black on Judgments, § 223. If the process attached is in substantial compliance with the law, and the defendant is properly served, the failure to literally comply with the statute will be treated as an irregularity, and a judgment rendered on such process and service will not be void. Civil Code, § 5572. But a process issued by any other person than one qualified to issue it cannot be the foundation of a valid judgment. Stephenson v. Campbell, 30

Ga. 159. So, also, if the process be not in substantial conformity to the statutes relating to the issuance of process, such defect will vitiate the whole proceeding, and is not a mere irregularity. Little v. Ingram, 16 Ga. 194. Let us apply these principles to the case in hand. The petition was filed to the February term, 1908, of the superior court of Rabun county, to foreclose an attorney's lien against land located in that county, owned by the defendants, who were alleged to be residents of Clarke county. The petition prayed for process, and the clerk issued process in the usual form, directed to all and singular the sheriffs of the state, requiring defendants to appear at the ensuing February term. The petition and process were served personally on the defendants by the sheriff of Clarke county, sixteen days before the February term. There was no appearance for the defendants, and judgment was rendered at the next August term of the court, foreclosing the lien of the attorney against the land.

[2] A proceeding to foreclose an attorney's lien upon real property is to be brought as is a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage upon land. Civil Code, § 3364, par. 3; McCalla v. Nichols, 102 Ga. 28, 28 S. E. 988. Statutory foreclosure of a mortgage on land is by petition to the superior court of the county wherein the land lies. Upon filing the petition the court shall grant a rule directing the amount due on the mortgage to be paid into court on or before the first day of the next term immediately succeeding the one at which such rule is granted, which rule must be published once a month for four months, or served personally on the mortgagor, his special agent, or attorney, at least three months previous to the time at which the money is directed to be paid into court. Civil Code, § 3276. In proceedings to foreclose an attorney's lien, the process is a rule nisi issued by the court, and not a process issued by the clerk as in ordinary cases. The clerk was without authority to issue the process he issued in this case. In the first place, the statute prescribes that the defendant is to be brought into court by a process issued by the judge. That process is essentially different from the process which the clerk is authorized to attach to petitions. It issues in term time, and the defendant is directed to pay the money into court on or before the first day of the succeeding term, and must be served by publication once a month for four months, or by personal service at least three months before that time. The ordinary process which a clerk is authorized to attach to a petition is one directed to the sheriff, requiring the appearance of the defendant to the return or appearance term of the court (Civil Code, § 5552), at which term the defendant may demur or plead, and final judgment on the merits is taken at the next term. Then, again, the process issued by the clerk is directed to the sheriff of the county where the suit is pending (Civil Code, § 5552), except in cases where the law provides for the service of the process on a defendant who resides in a different county, by the issuance of a second original, and in this instance the process is directed to the sheriff of the county of the nonresident defendant. Civil Code, § 5587; Powell v. Perry, 63 Ga. 417. The process issued by the clerk in this case is void, because there existed no authority for him to issue it. A void process is equivalent to no process; and, where process has not been waived, the failure to annex process to the petition is fatal to the jurisdiction of the court in the cause, and no valid judgment can be made therein. Brady v. Hardeman, 17 Ga. 67.

2. The other ground of the affidavit of illegality assails the constitutionality of the statute providing for the foreclosure of attorney's liens. The Constitution of this state declares that divorce cases shall be brought in the county where the defendant resides, if a resident of this state; that equity cases shall be tried in the county of the residence of a defendant against whom substantial relief is prayed; suits against joint obligors or joint trespassers residing in different counties may be tried in either county; suits against the maker and indorser of promissory notes, or drawer, acceptor, and indorser of bills of exchange, residing in different counties, shall be brought in the county where the maker or acceptor resides; cases respecting the title to land shall be tried in the county where the land lies. Civil Code, §§ 6538, 6539, 6540, 6542. It is further declared that "all other civil cases shall be tried in the county where the defendant resides." Civil Code, § 6543. The point is made that paragraph 3 of Civil Code, § 3364, which prescribes that attorney's liens may be enforced as liens on personal and real estate, by mortgage and foreclosure, contravenes the foregoing provisions of the Constitution relating to the venue of actions, in that it permits a foreclosure of an attorney's lien on land in the county where the land lies, irrespective of the residence of the owner against whose land the lien foreclosure is had. This statute prescribes that an attorney's lien on land shall be foreclosed as a mortgage on land, and that the venue of such proceeding is the county wherein the land lies. McCalla v. Nichols, supra. Is the statute opposed to the Constitution? It will be observed that in all the specific actions for which a venue is fixed a personal judgment may be recovered. If an action for land be instituted, there may be a recovery of mesne profits. In divorce cases, alimony may be recovered. The constitutional scheme seems to be that the venue of every action not respecting title to land, wherein a personal judgment may be recovered, shall be the county of the residence of the defendant in the action, or, if there be more than one, then in the county of one of them. The general provision that all other civil cases shall be tried in the county where the defendant resides comprehends cases of like character; that is, cases in which a judgment in personam may be recovered.

This construction is inevitable from the application of the rule of ejusdem generis, as well as from the clear import of the words themselves in the connection in which they are employed. None of these constitutional mandates as to the venue prevent the General Assembly from fixing the venue of a proceeding to foreclose an attorney's lien. A proceeding to foreclose an attorney's lien is not an action within the purview of these constitutional requirements. It is a proceeding to enforce a lien arising by operation of law. It is not an action in personam, because no personal judgment is recovered. Strictly speaking, it is not an action in rem, because it does not adjudicate that the title is in the attorney's client as against persons not parties to the suit wherein the recovery is had. Stroupper v. McCauly, 45 Ga. 74. It may be characterized as a proceeding quasi in rem, having for its purpose the adjudication of the amount due and the existence of the lien, and that the property subject to the lien shall be sold to pay the sum alleged to be due. The judgment does not conclude a stranger as to subsequently asserting title to the property; but it binds parties and privies. Wallace v. Holly, 13 Ga. 393, 58 Am. Dec. 518. A possessory warrant may be had in any county where the property to be recovered is found; and this is not such a civil case as must be brought in the county of the residence of the defendant. Jordan v. Owens, 87 Ga. 616. Notwithstanding the Constitutions of 1861 and 1868 contain similar provisions as the present Constitution, no one has ever questioned the constitutionality of the statutory method of foreclosing mortgages on realty by a procedure in the county where the land lies. Since the judiciary act of 1799, it has been provided by statute that a proceeding to partition land may be located in the county where the land is situated; and the constitutionality of this statute has never been assailed. These instances are marshaled for the purpose of showing the contemporaneous construction of the Constitution and long acquiescence therein—that these kinds of proceedings were never considered as coming within the operation of the constitutional provisions respecting the venue of actions. The enumeration of instances in the Constitution is not exhaustive of the venue in every legal proceeding, and the statute assailed does not clash with the constitutional provisions for the venue of actions.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Action by Henry Howard against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Robt. L. Berner, of Macon, for plaintiff in error. Ellis & Jordan, of Macon, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The plaintiff's petition was dismissed on general demurrer. He alleged as follows: He was employed by the Central of Georgia Railway Company as a helper in its machine shops at Macon, and it was his duty to do anything in the shop that he was told to do by any one. Among other duties that he was required to perform was to assist in the management of what is known as the boring machine. "A part of said machine was made of a chain, with a hook attached to the end thereof, and said hook was used for the purpose of hooking to said chain a large iron weight, 150 pounds or more, and which was used for the purpose of balancing the machinery connected with said boring machine. When this weight was lifted off by the derrick or other machinery to a certain height, it became the duty of petitioner, in connection with another employé of the defendant company.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes to lift the iron weight and unhook it from the chain and rehook it in a lower link of said chain." Prior to his employment he had never worked in a machine shop, and on the day he was injured he was called for the first time to perform this task. He was ignorant of how it was to be done, and no one informed him how to do it; but he was called upon by the employé in charge of the chain and weight to assist him at once, without being warned of any danger connected with the performance of the undertaking. His coemployé in charge of the machine had raised the weight to a height about even with his shoulders, when he was called upon immediately to take it off the hook and rehook it in a link of the chain lower down. Under the instructions of his coemployé, who had charge of and was operating the machine, he lifted it off without any knowledge of its weight, or that there was any danger attached to the removal of the weight at that height. Immediately upon detaching the weight from the hook, it fell and struck him on his right side, inflicting certain injuries. He alleged that it was the duty of his boss to assist him in this work, who failed to do so, and, acting under the instructions of the "boss employé," he undertook to perform it himself; that it was the duty of the defendant to have instructed him how to perform his task, and to warn him of the danger of attempting to lift so great a weight at that height, and to have had some one to assist him in taking the weight off of the hook; and that the defendant was negligent in failing to discharge these duties.

[1] The plaintiff was a green hand, but he does not pretend that he was not endowed with ordinary intelligence. It would be ridiculous to assert that a man of ordinary intelligence, in order to unhook a weight from one link in a chain to another, should be instructed as to the process. Nor does it appear that such performance would be attended by any extraordinary hazard or danger. Indeed, the statement in the petition that the weight was raised above the usual height carries the explanation of the cause of the accident. "The failure of the master to instruct the servant how to perform work which any person of ordinary intelligence can perform without instructions, and the performance of which is unattended by extraordinary hazard or danger, is not such a breach of his duty to instruct as will give a servant injured while performing the work a right of action for damages." Sims v. E. & W. Railroad Co., 84 Ga. 152, 10 S. E. 543, 20 Am. St. Rep. 352. The plaintiff's charge that the master was negligent "in failing to warn him of the danger connected with the performance of the task when he undertook to take the weight off of the hook, when it was at an improper height, and when it was not even with his breast, so that when it was taken off it would not drop upon his person, as it did in the present instance," carries its own refutation in the statement. If the weight was at an improper height, the servant should not have attempted to take it off the hook. The danger of such attempt would be obvious.

[2] It is the duty of a master to warn his servant of danger incident to his employment. This obligation of duty does not require a master to anticipate that his servant may improperly perform his task in a particular manner, and warn him of an obvious danger resultant from such improper method of performing his task. Commercial Guano Co. v. Neather, 114 Ga. 416, 40 S. E. 299; Banks v. Schofield, 126 Ga. 667, 55 S. E. 939.

[3] With respect to the charge of negligence in not having some one present to assist him in the performance of his task, the plaintiff knew this, and in undertaking to work alone he assumed the danger of such an obvious risk. The petition was properly held bad on demurrer.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

Where an action was brought to recover damages for an assault and battery, and a plea of justification was filed, under the ruling in Conley v. Arnold, 93 Ga. 823, 20 S. Upon the trial of an action to recover damages for an assault and battery, it might not have been proper for the defendant to introduce evidence that he had been tried and convicted in a mayor's court for the offense against the municipal law growing out of his conduct in the transaction, and had paid his fine; but where the plaintiff introduced evidence of the conviction, and imposition of the fine, and the amount thereof, it would not cause a new trial at his instance that the defendant was permitted to testify that he paid the fine so imposed.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1912.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 338*)—REAL PROPERTY—LEAVE TO SELL—RIGHTS OF HUSBAND OF INTESTATE'S WIDOW.

An administrator applied for leave to sell land of his intestate. Pending the application a claim was interposed and returned to the superior court. On the trial the undisputed evidence showed that the intestate purchased the land in controversy, gave to his vendor a series of notes for the purchase price, took from him a bond for title, went into possession, thereafter paid some of the notes, and died in possession of the land, leaving a widow, who, with two minor grandchildren, continued to reside on the premises. It further showed that, some two years after the death of the intestate, the claimant married his widow and occupied the premises with her for some five years prior to the trial. The claimant, who was the only witness in his behalf, testified that "I married his [intestate's] widow about two years after his death, and moved into the house by reason of becoming her husband, and that was the only reason for going into possession of the property at that time." Held, that under such evidence the trial judge erred in granting a "nonsuit" against the administrator, on the ground that he had "failed to carry the burden, it appearing from the testimony that the claimant * * * is in possession of the property in dispute."

BANDY BROS. v. NORTON FRIERSON'S SONS (two cases).

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 102, 105*)—INTERLOCUTORY PROCEEDINGS—WRIT OF ERROR—SUBSEQUENT TRIAL—EFFECT.

Where a suit was commenced by attachment, and after levy the property seized was replevied by the defendants, but subsequently the attachment was dismissed on motion, and thereupon the defendants made a motion to dismiss the declaration in attachment, and also filed a demurrer thereto containing general grounds, upon the overruling of the motion to dismiss and of the demurrer, the defendants could bring the case to the Supreme Court by bill of exceptions; and the writ of error was not subject to be dismissed on the ground that after the rulings thus complained of were made the case proceeded to trial, a verdict was rendered against the defendants, and they made a motion for a new trial, which was pending when the bill of exceptions was tendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 688-698, 717-723; Dec. Dig. §§ 102, 105.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 332*)—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY.

The declaration in attachment was not subject to general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1615-1639; Dec. Dig. § 332.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 843*)—MOOT QUESTIONS.

The question of whether, after the issuance of an attachment and the replevying of the property seized under the writ, the declaration in attachment could include an effort to foreclose a materialman's and contractor's lien on realty, was rendered merely academic by the action of the court in directing the jury that, under the evidence, no such foreclosure could be had, and limiting their consideration to the question of whether or not the plaintiffs were entitled to recover a general judgment against the defendants. However ruled, this point would not require a reversal under the facts of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3331-3342; Dec. Dig. § 843.*]

4. DEMURRER—MOTION TO DISMISS—GROUNDS.

None of the other grounds of the demurrer or motion to dismiss the declaration in attachment require a reversal.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 273*)—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—EXCEPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

In some instances exceptions were taken to the admission of evidence, without showing that any objection was made when the evidence was offered, or what such objections were. Such grounds raise no question for determination by this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1620-1630, 1764; Dec. Dig. § 273.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ERROR CURED BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

The presiding judge having charged that, if the contract was an entire one, it was necessary for the plaintiffs to show a substantial compliance therewith in order to recover a verdict, there was no error against the defendants in charging that, if the work as delivered to them was not in substantial compliance with the contract, they could have declined to have received it, and have held the plaintiffs in damages for any loss which could have been traced naturally to the breach, and of which it was the proximate cause, and which was avowedly or naturally within the contemplation of the parties, or that they could have taken the work as delivered, supplied the defects, if any, and collected the costs thereof from the plaintiffs, or that they could have taken the work as delivered, and have deducted from the payment to the plaintiffs the cost of that portion which did not meet the conditions prescribed by the contract.

(a) Nor was there error as against the defendants in charging that if avowedly, or by their conduct, they received the work (including material) and kept it and used it, they could not be heard to contend that they could hold and enjoy the results and withhold payment, and that if they received and enjoyed the work, and on discovering defects called the attention of the plaintiffs to them, and such defects were remedied by the plaintiffs, and the work kept after such correction was made, the defendants could not then complain of the defects so remedied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4219, 4221-4224; Dec. Dig. § 1064;* Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-713, 715, 716, 718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

7. CONTRACTS (§ 290*)—PERFORMANCE OF WORK—INSPECTION—WAIVER.

Where a contract for installing electrical appliances in a theater provided that a final test should be made by the contractors at least six days before the opening of the theater, in the presence of the architect, the owners, and the inspector "having jurisdiction," and that notice should be given in writing by the contractors to each of such parties, if time was of the essence of such contract, yet if the persons having the work done, knowing that no inspection had been made as required, received and used the work without protest or objection, they would be held to have waived the requirement as to the time of the test.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1317; Dec. Dig. § 290.*]

8. GROUNDS OF NEW TRIAL—REVERSAL.

None of the other grounds of the motion for a new trial were such as to require a reversal.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by Norton Frierson's Sons against Bandy Bros. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Oliver & Oliver, of Savannah, for plaintiffs in error. Anderson, Cann & Cann, of Savannah, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Norton Frierson's Sons sued out an attachment against Bandy Bros. for $1,165.69 principal, besides interest, alleged to be due for the price of certain materials and for services performed. At the first term the plaintiffs filed a declaration in attachment, alleging in substance as follows: About May 1, 1910, the plaintiffs contracted with the defendants, as owners, to furnish the material and do the work of wiring and otherwise equipping with electrical appliances a theater located on a described lot in the city of Savannah, and thereby to improve the real estate and improvements erected thereon. The contract price was $1,540. The plaintiffs complied with the contract and completely performed their duties thereunder, and thereupon filed and had recorded a claim of lien, as contractors and materialmen, upon the land and improvements. In addition to the amount already named, the defendants are indebted to the plaintiffs for supplies and materials furnished for the improvement of the real estate described, to the amount of $215.69. The defendants are entitled to credits for the amount of $590, leaving a balance of $1,165.69, besides interest.

(A bill of particulars was attached to the declaration.) On September 27, 1910, plaintiffs sued out an attachment to enforce the collection of the indebtedness, and it was levied on certain described personal property. The defendants replevied the property. The plaintiffs prayed that they might have a general judgment for the amount of the indebtedness, a special judgment as against the property levied on under the attachment, and a judgment foreclosing their lien and declaring a special lien upon the real estate described. The defendants made a motion to dismiss the attachment, which was granted. They also moved to dismiss the declaration, and filed a demurrer thereto. The motion and demurrer were overruled, and the defendants excepted. After this the case proceeded to trial. Under the evidence and charge of the court, the jury found a general verdict for the amount claimed in the declaration, and without any foreclosure of lien. The defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and they excepted.

[1] 1. A motion was made to dismiss the writ of error in the first case, on the ground that the case was still pending in the trial court when the bill of exceptions was tendered and signed. Section 6138 of the Civil Code declares: "No cause shall be carried to the Supreme Court upon any bill of exceptions, so long as the same is pending in the court below, unless the decision or judgment complained of, if it had been rendered as claimed by the plaintiff in error, would have been a final disposition of the cause, or final as to some material party thereto." From this it will be seen that, in regard to ordinary bills of exceptions, the general rule is that the case cannot be brought to the Supreme Court so long as it is pending in the trial court; but this is subject to the exception that it can be so brought if the decision or judgment complained of would have been a final disposition of the cause, or final as to some material party thereto, if it had been rendered as the plaintiff in error claims that it should have been. After the attachment had been dismissed, a motion to dismiss the declaration and a general demurrer thereto were filed. Had this motion or demurrer been sustained, the result would have been a final disposition of the cause; hence overruling them furnished a basis for bringing the case to this court by bill of exceptions, and the writ of error was not subject to be dismissed on the ground that the case was still pending in the court below. Had the writ of error been predicated upon rulings made in regard to evidence, charges, or the verdict, and it had appeared that a motion for a new trial was still pending, the case would have been very different. If a general demurrer or motion to dismiss a case is overruled, and the ruling is brought by bill of exceptions to this court, this does not perse operate as a supersedeas; but the case may proceed to trial in the court below, subject to the ruling which may be made in this court. Montgomery v. King, 125 Ga. 388, 54 S. E. 135. The motion to dismiss the writ of error is overruled.

[2-4] 2-4. The two cases were argued together. In the first bill of exceptions error was assigned upon the refusal to dismiss the declaration in attachment, and upon the overruling of the demurrer thereto. Certain property had been levied on under the attachment, and had been replevied. There was enough in the declaration to authorize the recovery of a general judgment, at least. Whether the effort to foreclose a materialman's and contractor's lien could be joined in the declaration became a purely academic question, under the rulings of the presiding judge during the trial. By his charge he eliminated from the consideration of the jury every question except whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover a general judgment against the defendants. It is useless, therefore, to deal at length with questions which thus played no real part in the trial, and could have no effect upon the final result. Under the facts of the case, without discussing its merits, the point stated will not require a reversal. Nor are the other grounds of the motion and demurrer such as to furnish cause for reversal.

[5] 5. The second bill of exceptions assigned error on the overruling of a motion for a new trial. Some of the grounds practically sought to raise the same points which have been considered in connection with the motion to dismiss and the general demurrer. What we have said in regard to them disposes of such grounds. In several instances exceptions were taken to the admission of evidence, without showing that any objection was made to it when offered, or what such objection was. These grounds raised no question for determination by this court.

[6] 6. The presiding judge charged as follows: "These courses were open to the defendants, if they considered the contract had not been complied with substantially: If the work as delivered to them was not in substantial compliance with the contract, they could have declined to have received it, and held the plaintiffs in damages for any loss which could have been traced naturally to the breach, and of which the breach was the proximate cause, and which was avowedly or naturally within the contemplation of the parties. Again, they could have taken the work as delivered, and themselves supplied the defects, if any, and charged the cost, and collected it from the plaintiffs; or they could have taken the work as delivered, and deducted from the payment to the plaintiffs the cost of that portion which did not meet the conditions prescribed by the contract." And also: "If avowedly, or by their conduct, they received the work (and by this term I include material), and kept it and used it, then they cannot be heard to contend that they can hold and enjoy the material and the work—the result—and withhold the pay. If they received and enjoyed the work, and on discovering defects called the attention of the plaintiffs to them, and they were remedied by the plaintiffs, and the work kept after being remedied, the defendants cannot now complain of the defects so remedied." In the same connection he charged that it was necessary for the plaintiffs to show that they had substantially complied with their contract. We do not see how these charges constituted error harmful to the defendants. Having stated that substantial compliance on the part of the plaintiffs was necessary, the judge then stated certain courses which were open to the defendants, if they did not believe that the plaintiffs had so complied. It was urged that these charges removed from the jury all circumstances which may have compelled the defendants at that time to accept and use the plaintiffs' work and material without a waiver on their part of such defect. It appeared that it was necessary to hurry the work in order to get it done so that the theater might be opened; but the fact that time was pressing, and that for this reason the defendants might be willing to accept the work and use the electrical equipment installed by the plaintiffs, instead of rejecting them, would not authorize such an acceptance and use, reserving the right to entirely refuse payment. If there were defects or deficiencies not waived by them, they might have a reduction on that account. But they could not get the benefit of the plaintiff's work and material for nothing, because they were hurried in an effort to open the theater for entertainments. See Harden v. Lang, 110 Ga. 392, 36 S. E. 100.

[7] 7. The judge charged: "But I charge you that, even if time was of the essence of this contract, as it was originally written and understood, if the defendants, knowing that no inspection had been made as required, received and used the work of the plaintiffs, without protest, they would be held to waive that requirement as to the time of the test being imperative." The contract provided that a final test should be made by the contractors at least six days before the opening of the theater, in the presence of the architect, the owners, and "inspector having jurisdiction," and that notice must be given in writing by the contractors to each of these parties. There was evidence which tended to show that such inspection was not made before the opening of the theater, but that the work was somewhat hurried in order to be completed in time for the theatrical performance, and that the defendants received the work without requiring any such inspection or making any protest on account of its omission. There was no error in the charge on this subject. 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1104.

[8] 8. None of the other grounds of the motion for a new trial were such as to require a reversal. In one or two instances there may have been slight inaccuracies in the charge; but, in view of the verdict, they were evidently harmless. The presiding judge also eliminated from the consideration of the jury the effort to foreclose the lien and to obtain a special judgment against the property attached, and confined them to the question of whether or not the plaintiffs were entitled to a general judgment, and, if so, for what amount. This ruling he based upon the evidence. As the question was brought to this court by two bills of exceptions, one complaining of rulings in regard to the declaration in attachment, and the other complaining of the overruling of the motion for a new trial, we have dealt with the entire subject; but it appeared in fact that finally nothing was left to the jury but to determine whether the plaintiffs were entitled to a common-law judgment. This issue was determined in favor of the plaintiffs. The evidence authorized the finding, and we see no reason to disturb it.

Judgment affirmed in both cases. All the Justices concur.

MIZE et al. v. BANK OF WHIGHAM.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING (§ 225*)—AMENDMENT—AFFIDAVIT.

In a statutory partition proceeding, it was erroneous, at the first term, after argument upon a demurrer to the defendant's answer, and after the judge had announced his determination to sustain the demurrer to certain paragraphs of the answer, but before any order to that effect was taken, to disallow an appropriate amendment to the answer, on the ground that it was not attended by an affidavit in accordance with the provisions of Civil Code, § 5640.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 575-582; Dec. Dig. § 225.*]

2. PARTITION (§ 26*)—RIGHT TO RELIEF—DEFENSES.

The answer as so amended would have set up a valid defense to the petition for partition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 68-71, 75; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 8*)—FRAUD—NOTICE—CONCLUSIONS.

The allegations of the answer, relied upon as charging notice to the plaintiff of the defendant's equities, were insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 12-28½; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County: Frank Park, Judge.

Statutory partition proceeding by the Bank of Whigham against F. A. Mize and another. Decree for complainant, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

The Bank of Whigham, a corporation, instituted proceedings against F. A. Mize individually, and G. W. White, as custodian in bankruptcy of Oliver & Mize (a firm of which F. A. Mize was a member), for the partition of certain described land. It was alleged that F. A. Mize and petitioner were tenants in common of the land, as evidenced by deeds from F. A. Mize to A. D. Oliver, and from A. D. Oliver to plaintiff. White, as trustee in bankruptcy of the firm of Oliver & Mize, was custodian of the interest in the land belonging to Mize, and, owing to the peculiar character of the land, it was incapable of division in kind. The prayer was for partition, and to that end that a sale of the property be had and the proceeds divided. Mize answered, denying that plaintiff was a cotenant, and as such entitled to the relief prayed, and by paragraphs setting up the following:

"(3) The defendant admits that he made and executed a deed to A. D. Oliver to the property in controversy, and that A. D. Oliver made and executed a deed to the same property to the Bank of Whigham, the plaintiff in this case; and this defendant says that the deed into the said Oliver is void, and does not convey title to him, and, further, that the deed from Oliver to the Bank of Whigham is void, and does not convey title into the said bank, for the following reasons:

"(4) The said A. D. Oliver was the manager and proprietor of a private bank in the town of Climax, known as the Bank of Climax.

"(5) The said Oliver approached this defendant and negotiated with him for the sale of the property in controversy, and the defendant did finally agree with the said Oliver for the sale of the said property for the sum of $14,325.

"(6) Defendant had a deposit account in Oliver's bank, and Oliver delivered to defendant a check on his bank in payment for said property, and the defendant deposited it in the said bank; it being distinctly understood between this defendant and the said Oliver that they were jointly to improve the said property.

"(7) On the same day this defendant made and executed his deed to Oliver, the said Oliver, being largely indebted to the Bank of Whigham, made a deed to said bank as security for his debt to said bank.

"(8) Though the deed was absolute upon its face, it was in fact only executed as security for the debt, and the bank gave the said Oliver a paper to this effect.

"(9) At the time Oliver delivered his check to the defendant he did not have the money in said bank to pay the same, which was unknown to this defendant, and Oliver, at the time he delivered the check and thereafter, had no intention whatever to pay this defendant for said property, but it was a 'skin game' pure and simple.

"(10) About a week after the execution of the said deed, Oliver tried to escape from Climax, but was arrested and held in custody, and it was learned that he was an escaped convict from the state of Mississippi.

"(11) At the time the Bank of Whigham received the said deed from Oliver, it knew or had reasonable cause to believe that the title in fact was not into Oliver, but that it was his intention to defraud this defendant of his property.

"(12) This defendant says that the facts herein stated show that the title into Oliver and into the Bank of Whigham is void as to the defendant; and the defendant prays that both of said deeds be set aside, and that the prayer of the Bank of Whigham be not granted.

"(13) The defendant denies the fourth and fifth paragraphs of plaintiff's petition, except as herein stated."

A demurrer was filed to the answer as a whole, on the ground that it failed to set forth any reason why the prayer for partition should not be granted, and to each separate paragraph of the answer on various grounds. The court sustained the demurrer to paragraphs 3, 6, 9, 10, 11, and 12. Time was allowed to amend; but, no amendment being offered, these paragraphs were stricken. The next day, and before any order was taken, the defendant offered an amendment, but on objection the proposed amendment was disallowed, and the entire plea stricken, after which final judgment was rendered in accordance with the prayer. The defendant excepted, assigning error on each of the rulings stated.

The grounds of demurrer that were sustained were: (a) To the third paragraph, on the ground that it failed to show any reason why the deed from Mize to Oliver was void, or why the deed from Oliver to the Bank of Whigham was void, or why title was not conveyed thereby; (b) to the sixth paragraph, because it was irrelevant, and did not show any notice to the Bank of Whigham of any agreement between Oliver and Mize to improve the property, and did not show that the Bank of Whigham would not have improved it, and was an attempt to vary a deed by parol agreement made prior to the execution thereof; (c) to the ninth paragraph, on the grounds that it was irrelevant, and that it did not show notice to the Bank of Whigham; (d) to the tenth paragraph, on the grounds that it was irrelevant, and that it showed no reason why the petition should not be granted; (e) to the eleventh paragraph, on the ground that it was a mere conclusion of the pleader, and set forth no reason for the assertion of the charge made; (f) to the twelfth paragraph, on the grounds that it was irrelevant, and that it was a mere conclusion of the pleader, and was an attempt to set up a cross-action for the purpose of canceling a deed, which could not be injected into a suit for partition.

Russell & Custer, of Bainbridge, for plaintiffs in error. Hawes & Pottle, of Blakely, and R. R. Terrell, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. This was a statutory proceeding for partition under Civil Code, § 5358 et seq. The notice filed with the petition called upon the defendants to show cause before the judge at chambers on the 30th day of March, 1911, etc. On that day the original answer was filed, and also the plaintiff's demurrer. The judge thereupon entered an order reciting the facts and setting the case to be heard at the May term of court. The case came on to be heard at that term, and on the 9th day of May, after consideration, the judge stated that he would sustain the demurrer to certain paragraphs of the answer, but did not enter any order to that effect. On the next succeeding day, before such an order was taken, the defendant Mize offered to amend by alleging: "Now at this term of the court comes F. A. Mize, the defendant in the above-stated case, and he amends his answer heretofore filed by adding thereto the following, to wit: The check given to defendant by said Oliver was never paid; and at the time same was given the said Oliver had no funds to pay the same, and was absolutely and thoroughly insolvent. Defendant shows that, shortly after said check was given, the said Oliver was adjudicated a bankrupt, and, unless defendant can set aside the deed obtained from him by fraud on the part of Oliver, he is without remedy." This amendment was disallowed, on the ground that it was not accompanied by an affidavit to the effect that at the time of filing the original answer the defendant did not omit the new facts set out in the amendment for the purpose of delay, and that the amendment was not now offered for such purpose. The objections to the allowance of the amendment were not meritorious (Civil Code, § 5363), and the court erred in sustaining it.

[2] 2. Save as announced in the third division of the opinion, none of the several grounds of demurrer to the separate paragraphs of the answer would be meritorious, unless the answer as a whole was subject to the ground of general demurrer that it failed to set forth a valid defense. Properly construed, the plea set up such matters as would have authorized Mize, in a contest directly with Oliver, to repudiate the sale. The worthless check, which Oliver, the insolvent, but sole, owner of the Bank of Climax imposed upon Mize was immediately deposited in that bank, and thereby in effect returned to Oliver. The new result of the transaction, in which credit was not intended to enter, was that Oliver obtained both the deed and check. Under these circumstances he could not in equity hold the deed. Nor did the plaintiff, the Bank of Whigham, stand in any better position. Taking the allegations of the plea as true, which must be done on demurrer, the deed which the Bank of Whigham received from Oliver was merely as security for Oliver's pre-existing debt; the bank not parting with anything, nor changing its status in any respect. It did not, therefore, stand in the position of a bona fide purchaser for value, and as such protected from the equities of Mize against Oliver. Civil Code, § 4307; Mashburn v. Massenberg, 117 Ga. 567 (5), 568, 44 S. E. 97, and citations; Harris v. Evans, 134 Ga. 161, 67 S. E. 880. A sale of real estate does not stand on the same footing as a sale of negotiable paper, where the rule is different from that above expressed. Harrell v. National Bank of Commerce, 128 Ga. 504, 57 S. E. 869, and citations.

[3] 3. So much of the answer as sought to set up that the Bank of Whigham knew, or ought to have known by the exercise of reasonable prudence, of the alleged fraud on the part of Oliver in procuring the deed from Mize, was insufficient as a charge of notice, and should be so held, if on another hearing it should become material.

ROGERS v. PETTIGREW.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 153*)—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION — MISCONDUCT — ILLEGAL COMPROMISE.

An attorney, who compromises his client's case against the latter's express direction, is not entitled to any compensation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 299, 300; Dec. Dig. § 153.*]

Atkinson, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Gwinnett County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

Proceeding by C. L. Pettigrew against L. L. Rogers to foreclose an attorney's lien. Judgment for petitioner, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Alonzo Field, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Perry, of Lawrenceville, and C. L. Pettigrew, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The point in the case is whether an attorney is entitled to collect his fee by foreclosure of his lien under these facts: The client was the administratrix of an estate, and employed the attorney to enjoin the enforcement of certain fi. fas., because of alleged illegalities, against the estate, and to cancel the sale of 250 acres of land made under these fi. fas. The case was stubbornly litigated through several years. On the last trial, while the jury were deliberating on the case, a compromise agreement was reached by the attorneys, whereby the title to 100 acres of the land was confirmed in the purchaser (who was the transferee of the fi. fa.), and the remainder of the tract (150 acres) was declared to be the property of the estate of the defendant in fi. fa., free of lien. A verdict was taken and a decree was entered according to the agreement. The client promptly disaffirmed the compromise settlement, and moved the court to vacate it. The motion was denied. The attorney then filed his petition to foreclose his lien for fees upon the 150 acres of land awarded in the decree to his client. She resisted the foreclosure, on the ground that the settlement was made by her attorney against her express instructions. On the trial the attorney testified that there had been several propositions of settlement made by the holder of the fi. fas., submitted to his client, all of which were refused. About 12 months before the compromise settlement the client told the attorney not to compromise the case. The compromise settlement was made pending the last trial, after the case had been submitted to the jury. The attorney had informed his client that she could go to her home, which was in the country, and that he expected to win her case. After his client left he became apprehensive of a mistrial, or an adverse verdict, or his ability to sustain a favorable verdict, inasmuch as the issues of law and fact were both doubtful. Overtures for a settlement between the attorneys culminated in the compromise settlement, which was expressed in the consent verdict. He acted in the best of faith for the interest of his client, and believed that he made a good settlement of her case. The client testified that she had repeatedly informed her attorney that she would not make any compromise settlement, and that she left the courtroom after the case was submitted to the jury upon the assurance of her attorney that her presence was no longer necessary and that he was confident of winning her case. Other evidence related to the value of the services and the good faith of the attorney. The court instructed the jury that if the attorney, in making the compromise settlement, acted contrary to express instructions of his client, he was not entitled to recover his fees. The jury found for the attorney. In her motion for new trial the client contends that the verdict is contrary to the charge of the court, and without evidence to support it.

The validity of the judgment based on the compromise settlement had been adjudicated adversely to the client; but the issue in that case did not include the right of the attorney to collect his fee, if he settled the case against the client's express instructions. The authorities differ as to the power of an attorney to compromise his client's case without special authority. Weeks on Attorneys, § 228. The prevailing opinion of the English courts is that an attorney has power to make bona fide compromises of his client's case; but it has been held by the Court of Queen's Bench that, if the attorney enters into a compromise against the express direction of his client, he is liable in an action of damages, and it is no defense that associate counsel advised the settlement. Fray v. Voules, 1 El. & E. 839, 5 Jur. N. S. 1253. A litigant has the right to insist that his case be adjudicated according to the established rules of law and procedure. When he instructs his attorney not to compromise his case, the attorney is bound by such instructions, and is not at liberty to violate them, even though the attorney honestly believes a compromise settlement would be to the best interest of his client. If he violates his instruction in this respect, he forfeits all right to compensation. Says Simmons, J., in Larey v. Baker, 86 Ga. 468, 475, 12 S. E. 684: "We think the law is that where an agent or attorney is unfaithful to his trust, or violates his instructions, he is not entitled to any compensation." We do not think there is any serious conflict between the attorney and his client. Both agree that the client had firmly set her mind against a compromise of her suit, and that the attorney was directed not to compromise it. The attorney's testimony is that this instruction was 12 months prior to the actual compromise. The interval of time does not serve to revoke the instruction, especially as the client neither said nor did anything which would imply a change of instruction. We are satisfied that the attorney, in the compromise settlement, was actuated by the best of motives to efficiently serve his client, but his zeal and desire to recover something for his client is no excuse for violating her positive instructions.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., dissenting.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 20*)—COURTS (§ 200¼*)—JURISDICTION—COURT OF ORDINARY—ABATEMENT OF NUISANCE.

A proceeding under Civil Code, §§ 5333, 5334, to abate a mill nuisance, is not a matter falling within the jurisdiction of the court of ordinary as such court, and from a decision of that court in regard to such a matter an appeal will not lie to the superior court. Harrell v. 1. REPLEVIN (§ 52)—INTERVENTION—ADVERSE CLAIMANTS.

Where an action of trover, with an affidavit to require bail, was brought to recover a piano, it was error, over objection, to allow a third party to file an intervention in the case, alleging that he, or any one under whom he claimed as transferee, had purchased the piano from the defendant on the installment plan, had paid all of the purchase money except an amount stated, and was entitled to have the property upon paying the balance, and that the trover suit was collusive, and praying equitable relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Replevin, Cent. Dig. § 193; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

2. DECISIONS—LAW OF THE CASE—DISMISSAL OF EXCEPTIONS.

The ruling just stated as to the first of the cases here decided applies to the second case, which being controlled finally by the decision of the question raised therein by the cross-bill of exceptions, the main bill of exceptions is dismissed.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by John Delaney against the Thomas & Barton Company, in which Edward Sheehan and Jennie T. Sheehan filed interventions. From a judgment in favor of Edward Sheehan, plaintiff and Jennie T. Sheehan filed bills of exceptions on error, and Mamie Delaney also filed a cross-bill of exceptions to the refusal to strike the intervention of Jennie T. Sheehan. Judgment reversed, and main bill of exceptions dismissed.

John Delaney brought an action of trover against the Thomas & Barton Company to recover a piano. Affidavit was made to require bail, and the sheriff seized the property. The defendant answered, denying all the allegations of the petition, and also pleaded that it had delivered the piano to the deputy sheriff, and on his order to the plaintiff. James Delaney died, and Mamie Delaney, his widow and sole heir, was by consent made the party plaintiff in his stead.

Edward Sheehan filed an equitable intervention, alleging in substance as follows: Jennie T. Sheehan purchased the piano from the Thomas & Barton Company for $800, and paid $720 of the purchase price, leaving a balance of only $80 due. Intending to leave Augusta for a time, she placed the piano with the company from which she purchased it, to be held by it on storage, subject to her further order. Subsequently she sold and transferred the piano to this intervenor for a valuable consideration. The plaintiff in the action of trover had no lien on, claim upon, or interest of any sort in the piano, and the defendant company had no interest in it, except to the extent of the balance of $80 unpaid purchase money. Jennie T. Sheehan was indebted on a general commercial claim to James Delaney. He and the defendant company entered into a collusive arrangement to place the piano in his custody and control, and in pursuance of such arrangement he paid to the company the balance of $80 due on the purchase money, and, without any further right in law, filed this trover suit against the company, claiming title to the property. It was seized by the deputy sheriff under bail process, and was left by him in the possession of the defendant under a written receipt. On the same day the deputy sheriff gave his order on the defendant for the delivery of the piano to Delaney, which was made, and it was held by him to the date of his death, and afterwards remained in the possession of his wife and sole heir, who was made the plaintiff in his stead. The former plaintiff and the present plaintiff have had continual use of the piano. The rental value was much in excess of the $80 balance due for the purchase price. If it should not be so found, then this intervenor is willing to pay to the plaintiff the whole of the $80, or whatever portion thereof may remain due, after deducting the rental value, as the court may determine; and he tenders into court $85 to cover the balance and interest, if any. He contends, however, that the rental value is more than the balance due on the purchase money, and prays judgment for the excess thereof. He agrees to abide the decisions of the court as if he had been served with process, and prays "that he be made a party to said case, and that this court of equity will now take complete control of the same in all of its phases, and will determine how much rent the plaintiff shall pay for said piano, and how much money, if any, is due by this intervenor on the balance of the purchase money, and that the court will render such judgment and decree as will protect this intervenor in his right to said piano, and to compensation for the use thereof, and as will do justice to all parties concerned." By amendment he added, to the averment that the piano had been sold and transferred to him, the further allegation that the sale and transfer was made under a mortgage originally made by Jennie T. Sheehan to the Irish-American Bank for $3,000, which indebtedness this intervenor "took up," and the note and mortgage were paid by him, and the papers delivered to him by the bank.

Jennie T. Sheehan filed an intervention, in which she prayed to "be made a party to said case," and offered to abide the decision of the court in whatever manner it might affect the rights of herself or others as though she had been served with process. She alleged that all of the facts set out in the intervention of Edward Sheehan were true, and she joined in the prayers thereof. She further alleged that the piano was legally transferred to Edward Sheehan, and he had the right to file his intervention; but, if there could be any question of the completeness of the transfer of title from her to him, the title must be vested either in him or in her, or in both of them together, and in no event could Delaney, by paying the balance of the purchase money due by her to Thomas & Barton Company, acquire any legal right to seize and appropriate the piano, which was worth $800, and on the purchase money of which she had paid $720.

The plaintiff in the trover suit moved to strike each of these interventions, on the ground, among others, that there was no authority of law for the intervenors to file such interventions in a bail trover case. He also demurred to the interventions. The presiding judge overruled the motions and the demurrers. In the progress of the trial certain evidence was introduced, which, in the opinion of the judge, rendered it impossible for Jennie T. Sheehan to have a recovery. The bill of exceptions recites that thereupon, upon motion of the plaintiff, the court granted an order "eliminating" that intervenor from the case. The jury found a verdict in favor of Edward Sheehan, and a judgment was entered directing the piano to be delivered by the sheriff to him, upon the payment by him of $95.15, with interest, and judgment for costs was rendered against the plaintiff in the trover suit. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which motion was overruled. She excepted, and assigned error on the refusal of a new trial, and also on the overruling of the motion to strike the intervention of Edward Sheehan. Jennie T. Sheehan filed a bill of exceptions, assigning error upon the judge's action in "eliminating" her from the case under the evidence. Mamie Delaney filed a cross-bill of exceptions, assigning error upon the refusal to strike the intervention of Jennie T. Sheehan.

C. E. Dunbar, of Augusta, for plaintiffs in error. Samuel H. Myers, W. H. Fleming, and C. H. & R. S. Cohen, all of Augusta, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The action to recover personal property, which goes by the name of trover in this state, is statutory, and can be employed when replevin, detinue, or trover lay at common law. Where title is claimed, it must be legal, not equitable, title. Mitchell v. Georgia & Ala. Ry., 111 Ga. 760, 771, 36 S. E. 971, 51 L. R. A. 622. In that case there was a dissent, but it was not so much as to the rule as in regard to its application, the dissenting justice holding that the prior possession with claim of interest there shown constituted such a title as the plaintiff could protect. By section 5406 of the Civil Code it is declared: "The superior courts of this state, on the trial of any civil case, shall give effect to all the rights of the parties, legal or equitable, or both, in favor of either party, such as the nature of the case may allow or require." This and kindred legislation was intended to afford a party the opportunity to have all his rights in regard to the subject-matter tried in one action in the superior court, without the necessity of having two distinct suits to settle his legal rights and his equitable rights against the adverse party. Sometimes equitable pleadings by one of the parties may require the making of additional parties, in order that full relief may be granted. But we know of no law by which a third person can, over objection, enter a common-law suit between two parties, by which one seeks to recover personal property from the other, file an equitable intervention asserting that neither of the parties is entitled in equity to the property, but that he is so entitled upon paying a balance of purchase money, and praying relief accordingly. To permit such a proceeding would create endless confusion. The question of whether the plaintiff has a legal right to recover in his suit against the defendant would be lost in the question of whether a third person, who was neither plaintiff nor defendant, had equitable rights against the plaintiff or defendant, or both. The interveners had been guilty of no conversion, and the plaintiff did not so claim. Interveners pro interesse suo are not known in ordinary common-law suits. In a suit on a note or account, it would not be contended that a third person, who was neither plaintiff nor defendant, could force himself into the case and set up that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant should have a verdict determining the issues between them, but he should have a verdict establishing some equity in himself.

It is declared by Civil Code, § 5683, that "no amendment adding a new and distinct cause of action or new and distinct parties shall be allowed unless expressly provided for by law." If this cannot be done by the parties to the cause, much less can it be done at the instance of an outsider, a new and distinct party, who wishes to enter the common-law action, in spite of the parties to it, and set up a new and distinct equitable cause of action in himself. A case sounding in trover, like that here involved, bears no analogy to petitions in the nature of creditors' bills, or like equitable proceedings, or proceedings properly called in rem, in which a person interested in the subject-matter may intervene. Here the parties did not enter the forum of equitable proceedings. They stood on their common-law rights. The interveners alone sought to change the nature of the case.

Counsel for the interveners quoted and relied on a sentence in the opinion in Central Bank v. Georgia Grocery Co., 120 Ga. 883, 885, 48 S. E. 325. In that case an action of trover was brought, and an affidavit made, in accordance with the statute, to require bail. The sheriff accordingly seized the property. A third party filed an affidavit and bond, in the usual form appropriate to making a statutory claim to property seized under a levy. The trial judge dismissed the claim, on the ground that it could not be filed by a third person to property seized by a sheriff under proceedings to require bail in a trover suit. This judgment was affirmed, and the point thus raised was the only one before the court for decision. Near the close of the opinion occurs this sentence: "A third person, claiming title to the property which is the subject-matter of a trover suit, may become a party defendant, or, in a proper case, file an intervention, and have his title adjudicated." As it does not appear that there was any motion to make the claimant a party defendant in that case, or effort to file an intervention, what was said on that subject was obiter dictum. Even if it were taken as a ruling, it would not help the interveners in this case. They did not propose to become parties defendant, nor was it "a proper case" in which they could file equitable interventions. It is unnecessary to decide whether there may be any conceivable case in which a third party may, of his own motion and over objection, be made a party to a trover case, or file an intervention therein. If so, this is not such a case. Nor is it necessary to consider the demurrers to the interventions. Such interventions could not properly be filed at all, without reference to whether their allegations showed grounds for equitable relief. If the interveners have any legal or equitable rights against one or both of the parties to the trover case, they may assert them in a proper proceeding. But the refusal to strike their interventions was erroneous.

[2] As in the case of Mamle Delaney this point is raised by the cross-bill of exceptions, and as the ruling finally controls the case, under the practice heretofore established, the original bill of exceptions in that case will be dismissed, without passing on its merits.

In the first case, judgment reversed. In second case, judgment reversed on cross-bill of exceptions. Main bill of exceptions dismissed. All the Justices concur.

1. HAWKERS AND PEDDLERS (§ 4*)—PATENT MEDICINE VENDER—TAX.

Under the provisions of section 946 of the Civil Code, one who actually travels as a hawker or vender of patent medicine is liable for the payment of the tax provided for under that section, although he may not be the proprietor of the articles sold, or of the animals and vehicles by means of which the articles are transported from place to place, and be acting only as the agent and employé of a disabled or indigent Confederate soldier, who, under the provisions of section 1888 of the Civil Code, is authorized to peddle without paying license for the privilege of so doing.

Error from Superior Court, Tattnall County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Suit by J. E. Whiddon against S. P. Smith, Tax Collector, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

E. C. Collins, of Reidsville, for plaintiffs in error. Mann & Milner, of Albany, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. J. E. Whiddon, a peddler and traveling vender of patent medicine, filed a petition seeking to enjoin the officers of the county from collecting from him the occupation tax prescribed in section 946 of the Civil Code for peddlers and traveling vendors of patent medicine, alleging that he was not subject to the tax sought to be collected, for the reason that he had no interest whatever in the business, and was acting only as the agent and employé of a certain named indigent Confederate soldier, who was exempt from the payment of such tax under the law of this state, and held certificates from the ordinaries of two other counties to that effect. At the hearing, after the introduction of the pleadings of both parties, the original certificates of the ordinaries, and an affidavit of the Confederate soldier referred to, confirming the allegations of fact set forth in Whiddon's petition, the court passed an order permanently restraining and enjoining the sheriff and tax collector as prayed, to which order they excepted.

[1] Section 533 of the Code of 1873 contained the following provision: "If any person, except a disabled soldier of this state, peddles without first obtaining such license in counties where the ordinaries take no action regulating peddling, he forfeits to the county one hundred dollars for the first act of peddling, and for each month thereafter twenty-five dollars more." And under section 536 of that Code it was made the duty of the several ordinaries of this state to issue process against persons incurring the penalty provided for under the section first quoted. Construing these two sections of the Code of 1873, this court said: "Section 533 is, if any person, except a disabled soldier of this state, peddles without first obtaining license, etc., he forfeits to the county $100 for the first act of peddling, and for each month thereafter $25; and then section 536 declares that the ordinary may issue process against such person. Now, against whom is the process to issue? Surely against him who should obtain the license, and who peddles without it. It cannot go against A. by simply alleging that B. peddled for A., and that A. had no license, or that A. peddled by his agent without first having obtained a license. If the license is to issue to the peddler, and if the process is to be against him who peddles without license, then it must be against the person who does the act of peddling." Howard & Soule v. Reid, 51 Ga. 328, 331.

[2] In the case of Wrought Iron Range Co. v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 756, 11 S. E. 234, 8 L. R. A. 273, it was said: "The provisions of the Code under which the ordinary proceeded furnish no warranty or authority for issuing an execution against the owner of goods because they are peddled or sold by sample through an itinerant agent. This question was virtually ruled in Howard v. Reid, supra. In that case it was held that the person to whom the license to peddle is to be granted is he who travels and vends the goods, and that a process issued under section 536 of the Code against others on the ground that they, by their agent, peddled, etc., without a license, is upon its face illegal and void. That case governs this, in so far as the nonresident corporation is concerned. A corporation cannot be a peddler, or obtain license to peddle, under the laws of this state. No one can obtain such license who cannot be sworn; for every peddler has to take an oath. Civil Code, § 1634. Every itinerant trader by sample is treated as a peddler. Civil Code, § 1631. The itinerant trader is the person who actually travels or passes from place to place for the purpose of trading by sample or otherwise."

Section 946 of the Civil Code provides that: "Upon every peddler and traveling vender of any patent or proprietary medicine, remedies, or appliances of any kind, or of special nostrums, or jewelry, or stationery, or drugs, or soap, or of any other kind of merchandise or commodity whatsoever (whether herein enumerated or not), peddling or selling any such goods, wares, medicines, nostrums, remedies, appliances, jewelry, stationery, soap, drugs, or other merchandise, fifty dollars in each county where the same or any of them are peddled, sold, or offered for sale." Comparing the language embodied in the section just quoted with the statute under construction in the two cases which we have quoted above, it follows necessarily that the person liable for the specific tax provided for under section 946 of the Code of 1910 is the person who actually travels or passes from place to place, actually hawking and vending the goods, and not the person who owns the property and the goods to be peddled, or the wagons or other vehicles employed for carrying the goods to be peddled from place to place. The defendant in error in this case, against whom the execution issued, was "a peddler and traveling vender," and the enforcement of the execution against him should not have been enjoined.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

KINARD et al. v. CLAY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§§ 184, 186*)—WILLS (§§ 728, 782*)—WIDOW'S ALLOWANCE—EFFECT OF WILL—RENTS—RIGHTS OF WIDOW—ELECTION.

A widow is entitled to a 12 months' support out of the estate of her deceased husband, notwithstanding the fact that he left to her by will, which was probated over her caveat filed thereto, a life estate in all his property real and personal.

(a) In such a case, where the caveat filed to the probate of the will and other litigation was pending for a period of 3 years, and the widow during that time remained in possession of all the real estate left to her for life by the will, and collected and used the rents from the same, she cannot be held to account to the executors for the rents so collected and used by her.

(b) The rent so collected and used by the widow was hers as a matter of right, and as a part of her life estate devised under the terms of the will of her deceased husband, and does not bar her from having 12 months' support set aside to her out of the realty so devised.

(c) In such a case a widow cannot be required to elect as between the life estate in the entire property devised (together with the proceeds of the real estate she had collected and used pending a caveat filed by her to the probate of the will) and a 12 months' support, in the absence of a manifest intention of the testator by the will to bequeath certain property in lieu of a 12 months' support.

Error from Superior Court, Jasper County; James B. Park, Judge.

Application by Mrs. Emily Clay for a year's support out of the estate of her deceased husband, to which J. M. Kinard and others, as executors, filed objections. From an order granting the relief prayed, the executors bring error. Affirmed.

W. S. Florence, of Monticello, for plaintiffs in error. Greene F. Johnson, of Monticello, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. Mrs. Emily Clay made application to the ordinary of Jasper county for a year's support out of the estate of her deceased husband, Jesse Clay. To this application a caveat was filed by the executors of the will of Jesse Clay. Appraisers were appointed, who set apart 100 acres of land to the applicant as a year's support. A caveat was filed by the executors to the award of the appraisers, and pending the hearing on the same in the court of ordinary the case was appealed to the superior court by consent. The issue coming on to be heard in the superior court, a verdict was directed in favor of the applicant. A motion for a new trial, made by the executors, was overruled, and they excepted.

The third and fourth items of the will of Jesse Clay are as follows:

"Item 3. I will to my beloved wife, Emily Clay, a life interest in and to all my property of every nature whatsoever; that is to say: She is entitled to the rents, profits, and issues of my farm consisting of 200 acres more or less, known as the 'Clay place,' adjoining the lands of Geo. Oxford, W. H. Middlebrook's place, the Jeff Smith place, C. L. Bartlett's and Jesse Kinard's Digby place, and the Off Pye place, in Gladesville Dist. G. M., Jasper county, Ga. I will that my wife have in and by her life interest in said lands the profits the rents, issues, and profits from all my property yearly, and that she is to in no wise incur the same for a period longer than 12 months; that is to say, that if the necessity arises she might hypothecate the rent notes for one year only. I do this in order to insure that my wife have a sufficient support all during her life, and that she shall in no wise transfer or sell the interest here willed her.

"Item 4. After the death of my wife Emily Clay, I will that the title in fee in and to the real estate hereinbefore described to go one-half to the heirs of my sister, Mary Kinard, and one-half to the heirs of my brother Frank Clay. I want my personal property divided in the same manner as the real estate in this item bequeathed."

The caveat to the award of the appraisers was as follows:

"(1) That said Emily Clay is not entitled to 12 months' support out of the estate of the intestate, for that she has had an ample provision in the will of Jesse Clay.

"(2) Because the said Emily Clay has elected and accepted the provisions of the will, and is estopped from further claim on the estate.

"(3) Because said Emily Clay has the entire estate for life of the said Jesse J. Clay under and through his will, and the title to the land is vested in remaindermen, which said issue has been fought through the superior court of Jasper county, Ga., the record of which is of file in the honorable court of ordinary, in which her application for 12 months' support is pending, and that under the caveat and issue against the probate of the will of Jesse Clay the issue on the 12 months' support is res judicata, on all of which the applicant is bound.

"(4) That the applicant by three years' possession of the property under the will is bound to election, and thereby estopped from electing another and different remedy. That there is no title in the intestate to the lands set apart, but under the will is vested in remaindermen, and the return of commissioners is void which sets aside the land. The original caveat as of file in this case is hereby adopted and made a part of this caveat as fully as if herein recited, and this caveat is filed without prejudice to rights thereunder.

"This March 14, 1910."

It appears from the record that Mrs. Clay, the applicant for the 12 months' support, also filed a caveat to the probating of the will of her late husband, and that the caveat was not sustained. The will was probated and admitted to record.

The issue to be determined is whether a widow, who is given a life estate in land under her husband's will, and who takes the proceeds of the land for three years, and uses the rents pending the trial of a caveat filed to the probate of the will in court, is put under election to take the life interest in the land under the will, or the proceeds of the land in lieu of a 12 months' support. It is insisted that by accepting the proceeds of the realty for 3 years the widow is not estopped from applying for her 12 months' support; that she has elected to take the rents from the place left by the will, in lieu of 12 months' support. And the case of Speer v. Speer, 67 Ga. 748, is cited by the plaintiffs in error to the effect that the widow has accepted her annuity for three years. In the Speer Case the court thought that the intention of the testator to give the widow an "annuity" in lieu of dower put her upon election to take the one or the other. "A testator may by his will make provision in lieu of this support for 12 months, in which case the widow may elect, under the same rules as regulated her election in dower." Civ. Code, § 4045. But the will here does not make any provision in lieu of 12 months' support, or call for any election on the part of the widow. It is true she filed a caveat to the will, and the caveat was decided against her; but it did not deprive her of the right to the life estate under the will. On the contrary, the judgment probating the will over her objection adjudicated, whether she so willed or not, that the land was hers during her lifetime. When this was done, it adjudicated that the income from the life estate was hers, and not that of the estate. So she was not exercising a right of election in taking the rents, but receiving them in her own right. The will gave her a life estate in certain lands. She filed no application for dower, as in the Speer Case, supra. Indeed, the will gave her a life estate in all the lands. After the court had probated the will, which adjudicated that she was entitled to the lands for life, the widow could have demanded and collected the rents for the time the caveat was pending, had they been collected by others than herself. The court had adjudicated that the land was hers for life. If the executors had collected the rents, she could have recovered the amount of them from the date of the testator's death, not as a 12 months' support, but as a part of her life estate in the lands bequeathed to her. The lesser estate was merged in the greater.

Is the widow, then, as contended, bound to account to the executors for the rents arising from her legacy—arising from property which the court has adjudicated was hers? To state the proposition is to answer it. If, then, the widow is not accountable for rents from the life estate in the lands, can she have a 12 months' support set aside to her out of the real estate itself? Our Civ. Code, § 4041, provides: "Among the necessary expenses of administration, and to be preferred before all other debts, except as otherwise specially provided, is the provision for the support of the family, to be ascertained as follows: Upon the death of any person, testate or intestate, leaving an estate solvent or insolvent, and leaving a widow, or a widow and minor child or children, or minor child or children only, it shall be the duty of the ordinary, on the application of the widow, or the guardian of the child or children, or any other person in their behalf, on notice to the representative of the estate (if there is one, and if none, without notice), to appoint five discreet appraisers; and it shall be the duty of such appraisers, or a majority of them, to set apart and assign to such widow and children, or children only, either in property or money, a sufficiency from the estate for their support and maintenance for the space of twelve months from the date of administration, in case there be administration on the estate, to be estimated according to the circumstances and standing of the family previously to the death of the testator or intestate, and keeping in view also the solvency of the estate. If there be a widow, the appraisers shall also set apart, for the use of herself and children, a sufficient amount of household furniture. The provision set apart for the family shall in no event be less than the sum of one hundred dollars; and if it shall appear upon a just appraisalment of the estate that it does not exceed in value the sum of five hundred dollars, it shall be the duty of the appraisers to set apart the whole of said estate for the support and maintenance of such widow and child or children, or, if no surviving widow, to the lawful guardian of the child or children, for their benefit." See, also, section 4042 et seq. A year's support proceeds on the theory that a widow is entitled to it, regardless of everything else. We hold that receiving her legacy of the life estate in the property bequeathed by the testator does not bar the widow from applying for and having set apart to her a 12 months' support out of any portion of the estate left by the testator.

While this construction of the will and the law relative to a 12 months' support apparently gives the widow an advantage, by giving her a fee to part of the land and a life estate in the remainder, it is necessarily the logic of the law as applied to the facts of this case. Under this view of the case, the alleged errors of the court as to rulings made on questions of evidence are immaterial, though it may be stated that the rulings complained of are in accord with the views above expressed.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

BELL v. CARTER.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMESTEAD (§ 144*) — EXEMPTION—TERMINATION—DEPENDENT DAUGHTER.

A homestead set apart in 1885, under the Constitution of 1877, to a mother as head of a family for the benefit of herself and her dependent daughter, then 42 years of age, ceases to be a homestead on the death of the mother.

(a) In such a case, the dependency is upon the mother, and not upon the property so set apart, and upon the death of the mother the dependent female has no further right in the homestead property as such.

2. HOMESTEAD (§ 153*) — EXEMPT LANDS—TERMINATION.

In 1884 a fl. fa. was issued in favor of B. against C. In 1885 the mother of C. had set apart to her and her dependent daughter, under the Constitution of 1877, a homestead in lands belonging to the mother. The latter died in 1909 intestate, leaving six children and the homestead lands. The one-sixth undivided interest of C. in the homestead lands was levied on under the fl. fa., and a claim interposed by the dependent daughter under the homestead. On the trial of the case the court directed a verdict for the claimant. Held: (a) That the direction of the verdict for claimant was error; (b) that C. inherited an undivided one-sixth interest in the estate of his mother as heir at law, and that the interest of C. levied on was subject to the fl. fa. as against the claim sought to be set up under the homestead.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 306; Dec. Dig. § 153.*]

3. VERDICT—DIRECTION.

The court erred in directing the jury to find a verdict for the claimant.

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; James B. Park, Judge.

Proceeding by A. K. Bell, as executor, etc., to enforce a fl. fa. against certain real property on a judgment against James T. Carter, deceased, in which Laura E. Carter filed a claim by reason of an alleged homestead. A verdict was directed in favor of the claimant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Willford & Lambert, of Madison, for plaintiff in error. E. W. Butler, of Madison, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. In 1884 A. A. Bell obtained a fl. fa. against James T. Carter. Mrs. Mary A. Carter, the mother of defendant in fl. fa., died intestate in 1909, leaving six children, all of age and under no legal disability, among them the defendant in fl. fa. At the time of her death Mrs. Carter owned the title to 152 acres of land, in which she had taken a homestead in 1885 for the benefit of herself and her dependent and infirm daughter, Miss Laura E. Carter, then about 42 years old. After the death of Mrs. Carter in 1909, there being no administration on her estate, the executor of Bell, the plaintiff in fl. fa., caused the execution to be levied upon an undivided one-sixth interest in the homestead lands as the property of the defendant in fl. fa., James T. Carter. Miss Laura E. Carter filed her claim "solely by reason of and because of said homestead set apart in 1885." The court below held that the homestead still remained in force after the death of Mrs. Carter, for the benefit of the claimant, and directed a verdict accordingly. To this judgment the plaintiff in fl. fa. excepted, and brought the cause to this court for review.

[1] The sole question is whether the homestead set apart to Mrs. Carter and her dependent daughter terminated on the death of Mrs. Carter. We think the homestead did terminate at her death. In the case of Towns v. Mathews, 91 Ga. 546, 17 S. E. 955, it was held: "A homestead set apart in 1873, by the head of a family, for the benefit of his wife and a minor granddaughter, terminated on arrival at majority of the granddaughter; the family having been previously dissolved by the death of both the other members. The condition of the granddaughter as a dependent female would not extend the duration of the homestead; the person on whom she was dependent being no longer in life." And see Haynes v. Schaefer, 96 Ga. 743, 22 S. E. 327. In the case of Jones v. McCrary, 123 Ga. 282, 51 S. E. 349, this court held: "An applicant took a homestead in 1869 as the 'head of a family,' consisting of himself and eleven children—four sons and seven daughters. The applicant died in 1885, after all of the children had reached majority. Four of the daughters were living on the place with him at the time of his death, and have continued to live on it and support themselves out of its proceeds. Held, that the only claim of the four daughters as beneficiaries of the homestead was as dependent relatives of the applicant, and when he died their dependence ceased and the homestead estate was at an end." And on page 285 of 123 Ga., on page 351 of 51 S. E., Mr. Justice Candler, in discussing the question now before the court, said: "Homesteads for the benefit of families of minors have uniformly been held to terminate with the arrival at majority of the beneficiary; and by parity of reasoning, a homestead for the benefit of a family of dependent females must terminate when dependence terminates. But dependence upon what—the property, or the applicant for homestead? We confess that it seems more logical and consistent with former rulings of this court to hold that the dependence should be upon the property, rather than the applicant. But the question has been positively answered in the case of Towns v. Mathews, supra, where it was said: 'The general fact of dependency alone would not be sufficient to keep the homestead in existence, because it has to be a dependency upon some person in life entitled, because of such dependency, to take a homestead.' Tested by this rule, then, the homestead in the present case expired with the death of Ezra McCrary in 1885, and the court below erred in holding that it was still in existence." See Vornberg v. Owens, 88 Ga. 237, 14 S. E. 562. In Neal v. Brockhan, 87 Ga. 130, 132, 13 S. E. 283, it was said: "When, therefore, the mother died and the children became of age, according to the repeated rulings of this court, the homestead estate ceased and the land became subject to the liens of the creditors. We do not think the fact that one of the minors became imbecile and dependent after the homestead was set apart, but before he became of age, would change this rule and keep the homestead estate alive. When the head of the family, to whom the homestead was set apart, died, the land descended to her children as her heirs at law; and after they became of age the homestead ceased. And if there had been no creditors, the children would have had the right to have the property sold or divided. There being a judgment creditor in this case, his lien, which had been inactive and held off since the homestead was set apart, became active and was leviable when the homestead estate ceased." And see the case of Sutton v. Rosser, 109 Ga. 205 (3), 207, 34 S. E. 346, 77 Am. St. Rep. 367, where it was held: "A homestead allowed to a widow out of her husband's estate for the benefit of herself and minor beneficiaries ceases when the widow dies and the minors arrive at majority."

But it is insisted by the defendant in error that the dependence here was upon the property, and not upon the life of the applicant for homestead; and we are asked to review the cases of Towns v. Mathews and Haynes v. Schaefer, supra, and to overrule the same, if they conflict with the decision of the court below and with the view taken of this case by the defendant in error. We think they undoubtedly conflict. We have considered the present case carefully, and also the cases asked to be reviewed, and, after doing so, decline to overrule them, and adhere to the rulings made in those cases. It is insisted by the defendant in error that there is a vast difference between the Constitutions of 1868 and 1877 as to the homestead rights of certain beneficiaries, that the Constitution of 1868 allowed a homestead to "each head of the family * * * of minor children" (Code of 1873, § 5135), and that the Constitution of 1877 extended the class of beneficiaries and included "dependent females" (Civil Code, § 6582). It is ingeniously argued that, if the dependent female under the Constitution of 1877 acquired no individual right to the homestead in her own name, it was needless for the head of the family to take out a homestead as having females dependent upon her, but could have it set apart to herself simply as the head of a family, and that would suffice. But the reply is that under the provisions of the Constitution she can only avail herself of the benefits of the homestead because she is the head of a family of minor children, or there are females dependent upon her, and it is necessary to allege and show that fact in order to be entitled to the homestead, which is conditioned upon this fact being made to appear. It is argued, further, that if a dependent female received no individual right to the homestead property after the death of the head of the family, the law would abandon and desert her at a time when she stood most in need of its beneficent influence and support. The reply again is that, in the present case at least, the dependent female is not left helpless and penniless. As an heir at law of her deceased mother, out of whose property the homestead was set apart, she is entitled to an absolute fee in an undivided one-sixth interest in her estate, and not merely the usufruct of the homestead property. Nor can it be supposed that the other heirs at law of the deceased mother will be less kind and generous in their help and support of this dependent female, who is related to them by blood, than the law itself was, if her share of the estate should prove insufficient for that purpose. At any rate, the law seems well settled in this state that the homestead estate ceases upon the death of the head of the family in a case like the present, wheth-

the homestead be under the Constitution of 1868 or that of 1877.

[2] The rule insisted upon in this case would prevent, or at least postpone, heirs at law from coming into possession of their inheritance. Both the claimant and the defendant in fi. fa. were heirs at law of the deceased mother, and each inherited an undivided one-sixth interest in the lands left by her. It follows, from what has been said, that the undivided one-sixth interest of the defendant in fi. fa. in the land levied upon is subject to the fi. fa. as against the claim of the daughter, who enjoyed the benefits of the homestead estate as a dependent female during the life of her mother, but who has no further interest in it as such since her death. The court erred in directing a verdict for the claimant.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

S. J. WINKLES & CO. v. SIMPSON GROCERY CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 14, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMESTEAD (§ 170*)—PARTNERSHIP (§§ 139, 146*)—GENERAL MANAGER—AUTHORITY TO SIGN NOTES—WAIVER.

One who is clerk and general manager of a mercantile firm may, if authorized by the firm, sign notes to creditors of the firm in the firm name, binding the latter to pay the sum of money specified therein.

(a) But where such notes contain a waiver of homestead, such waiver is not binding upon the partnership, or the individual members composing the same, unless such clerk or general manager has express authority to make such waiver. The right of homestead is personal to the debtor, and no one can waive the right for him without his consent.

(b) Such a waiver of homestead, even if authorized by the firm, or by the individual members thereof, is not good as a matter of contract merely, or per se, as against a claim filed under a homestead to realty set apart to one of the members of the partnership by the United States court of bankruptcy.

(c) Partners in a mercantile firm are mutual agents for each other with reference to the conduct of the mercantile business in which they are engaged, and by virtue of this relation can give a firm note for the firm debts.

(d) Each partner can waive the homestead for himself and for his partner as to personal property belonging to the firm.

(e) But one partner cannot, by signing a note given to a creditor for a firm debt, waive the homestead as to real estate belonging to another partner, or authorize any one else to do so, without express authority from the other partner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 336, 337; Dec. Dig. § 170; Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 203-211, 213, 240, 242-255; Dec. Dig. §§ 139, 146.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§§ 710, 713, 715*)—INDIVIDUAL PROPERTY—HOMESTEAD—EXEMPTION—ESTOPPEL—JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA.

One member of a partnership, against which, and against each member individually composing the firm, an execution has been issued in favor of a judgment creditor, and levied upon land belonging to one of the members of the firm individually, is not estopped from setting up a claim under a homestead in said land, as the head of a family, where it does not appear that on the trial of the case in which the judgment was rendered the question of waiver of homestead in the notes sued on was adjudicated.

(a) Nor would such claimant be estopped from setting up such claim because of a former verdict and judgment of the superior court finding the same property subject to the same fi. fa., in a case where the claimant's wife had filed a claim thereto, to which case he was not a party.

(b) Where a former adjudication of the superior court is relied upon to work an estoppel against one who claims real estate, as head of a family, as being exempt from levy and sale under the homestead law of this state, the former judgment must relate to the same question as the one on the subsequent trial, and must clearly decide it, and cannot be collaterally or incidentally considered for that purpose.

(c) A note purporting to be signed by a firm to a creditor, to cover an amount due by the former to the latter, stated the sum to be paid, and contained a waiver of homestead. Suit was brought on the note, and each member of the firm was served with a copy of the suit, including a copy of the note containing the homestead waiver. Neither partner filed any defense to the suit. No reference to the waiver of homestead was made in the pleadings, other than that the copy of the note attached to the petition contained the clause as to the homestead waiver. The judgment of the court made no reference to the waiver. It simply adjudged the amount due the plaintiff by the defendant firm. Held, that that judgment adjudicated only the sum due by the defendant to the plaintiff.

(d) The judgment did not adjudicate that the firm, or either member of it, had waived individually homestead to realty owned by the firm, as against the payment of the firm debt.

(e) Such judgment would not estop one member of the firm from setting up a claim, under a homestead set apart to him as head of a family, to land levied upon by virtue of a fi. fa. issued in pursuance of such judgment.

(f) The court erred in refusing to grant a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1063, 1234-1241, 1244-1247; Dec. Dig. §§ 710, 713, 715.*]

Error from Superior Court, Polk County; Price Edwards, Judge.

Action by the Thomas-Hiles Company against S. J. Winkles & Co. Judgment having been rendered in favor of plaintiff, and assigned to the Simpson Grocery Company, a fi. fa. was levied on certain land, which Winkles claimed as a homestead. The property having been found subject to the fi. fa., and claimant's motion for a new trial overruled, he brings error. Reversed.

Bunn & Bunn, of Cedartown, for plaintiff in error. T. W. Lipscomb, of Rome, and John K. Davis and W. W. Mundy, both of Cedartown, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. The claim was filed by S. J. Winkles as the head of a family, by virtue of an exemption set apart to him by the United States court of bankruptcy. The record discloses substantially the following: The Thompson-Hiles Company brought suit against S. J. Winkles & Co., a firm composed of S. J. Winkles and Mrs. M. E. Moore, on a promissory note containing a waiver of homestead. The note was ostensibly signed by S. J. Winkles & Co. This latter firm conducted a retail mercantile business in Cedartown. Mr. Tom Moore, the husband of Mrs. M. E. Moore, one of the members of the firm of S. J. Winkles & Co., was an employé of the latter firm, and as general manager of the business did the buying and selling, and there was evidence tending to show that he signed contracts for the firm. Winkles testified that he did not expressly authorize Moore to sign the notes sued on, or to waive the homestead. According to the evidence of Moore, on cross-examination, "the notes were signed by me as manager, and Mr. Winkles was not present when I signed them. The form of note was not discussed between me and Mr. Winkles at all." When suit was brought on the notes, a copy was served on S. J. Winkles. On the trial of the case, Winkles filed no defense to the suit and did not attend court. Judgment was rendered on the notes against the firm and each member thereof individually for the amount sued for. In neither the pleadings nor in the judgment of the court was any reference made to the fact that the notes contained a waiver of homestead, except that copies of the notes were attached to the petition. The fi. fa. issued upon the judgment was purchased by and transferred to the Simpson Grocery Company, and was levied, at the instance of that company, on the land in controversy here, which was claimed by Mrs. C. A. Winkles, the wife of S. J. Winkles. On the trial of the claim case the property was found subject to the fi. fa. S. J. Winkles filed his petition in bankruptcy in the United States court, and in that court the property was set apart to him, as the head of a family, as a homestead. The property having been readvertised for sale under the fi. fa. above referred to, S. J. Winkles filed a claim as the head of a family. Upon the trial of this case the court directed the jury, at the conclusion of the evidence, to find the property subject to the fi. fa. The claimant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepted.

[1] 1. The partners were mutual agents for each other, and each by virtue of this relation could give the firm note for the firm debt. Civil Code, § 3180. Each could waive homestead for himself and for his partner so far as personalty belonging to the firm was concerned. Hahn v. Allen, 98 Ga. 612, 616, 20 S. E. 74. But the waiver of homestead on realty, while not a lien, by analogy is held not to fall within the purview of partnership agency. One partner cannot execute a note for the mercantile partnership, creating a lien on the individual real estate belonging to another partner; and such lien would not bind the other partner, if so given.

If, then, one partner cannot create a lien on real estate belonging to the other partner, we think he cannot waive the individual right to homestead and exemption, under the law, in real estate belonging to the other partner, for partnership debts. For, as Judge Jackson well said in the case of Cleghorn v. Greeson, 77 Ga. 345: "The homestead right is a right in property, and to waive it in favor of a creditor is substantially the same thing as to give it away." But, assuming that the agent had authority generally to sign the firm name to the notes for the partnership debt, and that the members of the partnership were concluded by the judgment from denying his authority to sign the note so far as the amount due and the waiver of homestead as to personalty belonging to the firm was concerned, we hold that the agent could do no more than a partner could in signing the note; and one partner cannot waive the homestead and exemption rights of another partner to his individual real property without an express authority from the other partner to do so.

Is the waiver of homestead contained in the notes available as against Winkles' claim, merely as a matter of contract, or per se? We think not; and this answer is based upon the proposition that the homestead waiver, under the facts of this case, was not adjudicated by the judgment of the superior court, merely finding that the defendants owed the plaintiffs a certain sum of money. That is all that the judgment adjudicated. There were no pleadings putting the waiver of homestead in issue, or as to whether the claimant authorized any one to waive it for him, or, if he did, whether he was bound by it per se, individually or as a partner. The evidence shows that Mr. Moore, who signed the notes as manager for the firm of S. J. Winkles & Co., was not a member of that firm, but simply represented as agent the partnership of which his wife was a member. He could not waive the homestead to realty belonging to an individual member of the firm, in a note executed for a partnership debt, without express authority to do so by those competent to confer that authority. It has been held in this state that "the right to homestead or exemption is personal to the debtor, the owner of the property, and its exercise, or nonexercise, is subject to his decision." Broach v. Powell, 79 Ga. 81, 3 S. E. 763. One partner may waive the right of homestead of the other partner, so far, at least, as personal property of the firm is concerned. Hahn v. Allen, supra. One partner cannot waive the right of another partner to the benefit of a homestead out of the latter's individual property. Giles v. Vandiver, 91 Ga. 193 (5), 17 S. E. 115; Perry v. Britt-Carson Shoe Co., 129 Ga. 500, 59 S. E. 216, 121 Am. St. Rep. 232.

If, therefore, one partner cannot bind the individual real property of another partner by a contract including a homestead waiver, the principle would apply with greater force to the case of one who signed a contract containing such a waiver for a firm merely as manager or agent for such firm, of which he was not a member. The claimant testified that he did not authorize the execution of the note by the manager, nor the waiver of homestead, and that he did not ratify the same. There is some slight conflict of evidence as to the authority of the manager generally to sign notes for the firm. It appeared from the evidence of the manager, on cross-examination, that "the form of the contract was not discussed between me and Mr. Winkles at all." We do not see, therefore, how the claimant is bound as a matter of contract by the waiver of homestead contained in the notes.

[2] 2. It is insisted on the part of the defendant in error that the judgment of the superior court, based upon a note containing a waiver of homestead clause, adjudicated that the defendant firm owed the plaintiff a certain sum, and that the waiver of homestead was good as against the firm debt; that the judgment concludes the defendant S. J. Winkles from asserting his claim, as the head of a family, under the homestead set apart to him by the United States court of bankruptcy. It is contended that the judgment adjudicated the entire contract, including the homestead waiver; that the defendant Winkles (now claimant) has no right to question any part of it; that he will not be heard to say that the waiver is not binding upon him, since he filed no defense to the suit upon the notes containing the homestead waiver; and that he cannot avail himself of the homestead set apart to him because of the former adjudication.

It is further insisted that the former judgment in the case of Simpson Grocery Co., plaintiff in fi. fa., against S. J. Winkles & Co., defendant in fi. fa., and Mrs. C. A. Winkles, claimant, in which the property here claimed by S. J. Winkles was found subject to the fi. fa., estops the present claimant, S. J. Winkles, from setting up his claim under the homestead subsequently obtained. Is the plaintiff in error estopped by the former adjudication in the superior court, finding the property subject as against the claim of his wife, Mrs. C. A. Winkles, who had filed a claim thereto? The present claimant, S. J. Winkles, was not a party to that suit and judgment; and while it adjudicated that the property was subject to the fi. fa. levied upon it, relatively to the wife's claim, it did not adjudicate that the property was subject to the fi. fa. after the setting apart of the homestead, which was obtained by the husband after the rendition of the judgment in the wife's case. Does the former judgment, based on the notes, adjudicate everything contained in the note, as contended, including the waiver of the right to a homestead? From the record it appears that the trial of the former suit put in issue the question whether the defendant partners owed a certain sum of money to the plaintiffs; and that was the only issue, and to that extent the judgment was conclusive on the defendants. But the question of waiver of homestead was not put in issue, and the defendants are not concluded merely because the waiver was contained in the notes sued on. If a mortgage note was sued on simply to obtain a common-law judgment for a certain sum, which was rendered, that judgment would not be held to adjudicate anything with reference to the mortgage lien. It would only adjudicate the sum due by the defendant to the plaintiff. See Drake v. Bush, 57 Ga. 180.

Nothing herein held is at variance with the ruling in the case of Evans v. Rounsaville, 115 Ga. 684, 42 S. E. 100, where it was held: "An exemption assigned and set apart by the bankrupt court under the homestead laws of this state is no more subject to levy and sale than if it had been set aside by the ordinary of a county having proper jurisdiction. No reason appears in the record why the exemption set apart was not good as against the lien of the plaintiff in execution in the present case." In that case nothing appeared going to show that the right of exemption was waived, or that the question of waiver was adjudicated at all. Nor is there anything in the case of Johnson v. Davis, 97 Ga. 282, 22 S. E. 911, in conflict with the ruling here made. For a judgment to act as an estoppel, it must decide the same question of which subsequent adjudication between the same parties is sought. It was held in Evans v. Birge, 11 Ga. 265, that "a fact which has been directly tried, and decided by a court of competent jurisdiction, cannot be contested again between the same parties or their privies, in the same or any other court. A judgment of a court of law, or a decree in chancery, is an estoppel to the parties thereto and their privies, if it relates to the same subject-matter and decides the question now in issue; but if that question came collaterally before the court, and was only incidentally concerned, the judgment or decree has no estoppel. Whether the question now in issue was embraced in the judgment or decree cannot be ascertained by inference, or by arguing from the judgment or decree." And see Woods v. Jones, 56 Ga. 520 (2); Missouri States Life Ins. Co. v. Lovelace, 1 Ga. App. 446, 58 S. E. 93; Ashley v. Cook, 109 Ga. 653 (3), 659, 35 S. E. 89. In 23 Cyc. 1300, it is said: "The true test is identity of issues. If a particular point or question is in issue in the second action, and the judgment will depend upon its determination, a former judgment between the same parties will be final and conclusive in the second, if that same point or question was in issue and adjudicated in the first suit; otherwise, not." On page 1304 of same volume it is said: "The great preponderance of authority sustains the rule that the estoppel of the judgment covers all points which were actually litigated and which actually determined the verdict or finding, whether or not they were technically in issue on the face of the pleadings. But a matter is not in issue in the suit which was neither pleaded nor brought into contest therein, although within the general scope of the litigation, and although it might have determined the judgment if set up and tried." See Civil Code, § 4336; Henderson v. Fox, 80 Ga. 479, 6 S. E. 164; Draper v. Medlock, 122 Ga. 234, 50 S. E. 113, 69 L. R. A. 483, 2 Ann. Cas. 650.

In so far as the record discloses, no reference was made to the waiver of homestead in the petition, judgment, or otherwise, except that copies of the notes containing the waiver of homestead were attached to the petition, and the claimant, then one of the defendants in the suit, was served with a copy of the petition, notes, waiver, etc. Defendants filed no answer putting the waiver of homestead in issue, and no judgment was rendered adjudicating the question of homestead waiver, but it only adjudicated the amount due by the defendant firm. In directing a verdict, therefore, for the plaintiff, the court must have done so on the idea that the claimant, S. J. Winkles, was estopped by the former judgment of the court from claiming an exemption. No question was raised in the present case as to the method of procedure, nor otherwise than as to whether the exemption was subject.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

CARROLL v. F. W. COOK BREWING CO.
F. W. COOK BREWING CO. v. CARROLL.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*) — ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—WAIVER.

On April 16, 1910, the F. W. Cook Brewing Company, a corporation, instituted suit in attachment against E. H. Carroll. The defendant answered, and among other things set up a cross-demand for damages as from breach of contract, and also as from tort, on the ground that in August, 1909, the plaintiff maliciously and without probable cause filed a petition in bankruptcy in the United States court against the defendant, which remained pending until April 18, 1910, when it was tried and a verdict returned finding that defendant was not insolvent at the date the proceedings were instituted; the result of the finding of such proceedings being to injure defendant's credit and commercial standing, and by reason thereof destroy his business. A motion was made to strike so much of the answer as set up the cross-action; but it was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted pendente lite. At the conclusion of the evidence offered by both sides at the trial, the judge held that a recovery by the defendant for any amount on his cross-demand was not authorized, and as to such demand entered an order in the nature of a nonsuit. Then, on motion, a verdict was directed in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of its demand. The defendant, by direct bill of exceptions, assigned error upon each of the rulings just stated. The plaintiff, by cross-bill of exceptions, assigned error upon the ruling excepted to pendente lite. The only assignment of error insisted upon in the briefs of counsel for plaintiff in error is that which refers to the ruling with reference to the defendant's cross-demand. Held, assignments of error which are not insisted upon in the briefs of counsel for plaintiff in error will be treated as abandoned.

THIGPEN, Ordinary, v. TANNER.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 107*)—RIGHT TO RELIEF—PECUNIARY INTEREST.

Where one was convicted of the offense of bastardy, for which a fine in a given amount was imposed upon him by the court, which fine was paid over to the ordinary of the county as required by law, "to be by him improved and applied from time to time, as occasion [might] require, for the maintenance and education of [the bastard] child and for the payment of the expense of lying-in with such child, boarding, nursing, and maintenance while the mother [should] be confined by reason thereof," and, after the payment of such last-named expenses for the mother, the child died when only five months old, the person so convicted of bastardy under Penal Code, § 682, had no interest in the fine, and therefore could not maintain an action to enjoin the ordinary from disposing of the balance of the same. Under the section of the Code cited, such person was found guilty of a misdemeanor, for which he was, in the discretion of the court, punished by the imposition of a fine in accordance with Penal Code, § 1065.

2. DEMURRER OVERRULED—ERROR.

The point dealt with in the preceding note is the only one involved in the case. The trial judge erred in overruling the general demurrer to the petition, brought by the person convicted of bastardy, to enjoin the ordinary from disposing of the fine involved.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 816*)—ACTIONS—PLEADING—NOTICE OF CLAIM FOR INJURY.

In bringing suit against a municipal corporation for damages on account of a personal injury, it is necessary to allege a substantial compliance with Civil Code 1910, § 910, which requires a presentation in writing of such claim to the governing authority of the municipality for adjustment, stating the time, place, etc., before bringing suit, and allows the municipal authorities 30 days in which to act on the claim. A petition which fails to do this is demurrable. Saunders v. City of Fitzgerald, 113 Ga. 619, 38 S. E. 978; City of Columbus v. McDaniel, 117 Ga. 823, 45 S. E. 59; Langley v. 2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 812)—ACTIONS—NOTICE OF CLAIM FOR INJURY—SUFFICIENCY.

A petition alleged a personal injury resulting from a defect in a sidewalk of a city, and that on a named date a notice was served, a copy of which was set out. It was directed to the mayor and served on him, and merely notified him that the injured person would file suit against the city for the injury (describing it and the time, place, and cause of its occurrence) to a term of the superior court which would convene several months after the date of the notice. Held, that such a notice merely of an intention to sue the city, directed to the mayor, was not such a presentation of the claim or demand to the governing authorities for adjustment as to meet the requirements of the statute.

2. GROUNDS FOR NEW TRIAL—REMARKS OF COUNSEL.

Nor, when considered in connection with the judge's explanation thereof, was there any merit in the ground of the motion for new trial complaining that the defendant's counsel in his argument to the jury made remarks which were not authorized by the evidence.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 637, 656, 907, 938*)—
SIGNATURE BY COUNSEL—CLERICAL ERROR—PRESUMPTIONS.

The Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company, being the defendant in the trial court, which lost its case, made a motion for a new trial, and it was overruled. A paper was tendered to the judge, and it was duly certified as a bill of exceptions. In the paper so tendered the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company was named as plaintiff in error and as the party excepting. The paper was signed, "Bolling Whitfield, Attorney for the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Co.," the last-named company not being a party to the suit. The record discloses that among the counsel representing the defendant in the court below, in filing its pleas, trying the case, moving for a new trial, and making motions to continue, were "Crovatt & Whitfield." Held:

(a) The name of "Crovatt & Whitfield" imports a firm, and will be presumed to be such.

(b) It will also be presumed that Bolling Whitfield, who signed the bill of exceptions, was the Whitfield of that firm.

(c) Construing the bill of exceptions in the light of the record, the words above quoted following the signature of Bolling Whitfield are to be considered as having been entered by mere clerical error.

(d) The statute requires that bills of exceptions shall be signed by the plaintiff in error or his attorney or counsel. Civ. Code, 1910, § 6139.

(e) In the light of the presumptions above mentioned, and in view of the record in the case, the bill of exceptions was amendable in the Supreme Court by striking the words "Attorney for the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Co.," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Attorney for the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Co."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2784, 2826-2829, 2911-2915, 2916, 3673, 3674, 3676, 3678, 3795-3803; Dec. Dig. §§ 637, 656, 907, 938.*]

2. FORMER DECISION DISTINGUISHED.

The case differs from O'Connell Bros. v. Friedman, 117 Ga. 948, 43 S. E. 1001, Sumner v. Sumner, 116 Ga. 798, 43 S. E. 57, and other similar cases, in which there was no compliance with the statute in regard to signing a bill of exceptions; the paper in such cases purporting to be bills of exceptions not having been signed in fact by any one.

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 41*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE.

The admission of the opinion of a witness for the plaintiff as to the existence of a fact is not cause for a new trial on behalf of the defendant, where the latter introduces evidence sustaining the opinion of such witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 67-71; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 260*)—INJURIES—COMPANIES
LIABLE—RELATION OF PARTIES.

There was evidence which authorized the jury to find the facts of the case to be, in effect, as follows: Plaintiff was an employe of the North American Dredging Company, and while engaged in work for that company he was injured by the negligent operation of an engine being run on the tracks of the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company, the defendant, and at the time of his injuries the Brunswick Steamship Company was operating the engine in its business, having hired the engine and its crew from the defendant company. Held, that the defendant company was liable to the plaintiff for his injuries, and the instructions of the court to this effect, and its rulings upon the admissibility of evidence in accordance with this principle, were not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 817-823; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 255*)—INSTRUCTIONS—IGNORING ISSUES.

Damages were alleged on account of injury to plaintiff by causing physical and mental suffering, permanent impairment of capacity to work, actual loss of time, and cost of medicine and physicians' bills. There was evidence tending to prove these several elements of damage, but there was conflict as to the nature and extent of the injury, and as to no one or more of the elements mentioned was the evidence of such character as to demand a verdict for the amount returned by the jury or more. Held, that it was error requiring the grant of a new trial, even in the absence of a request, for the judge to omit to give in charge to the jury any rule for estimating the damages claimed. Southern Ry. Co. v. O'Bryan, 112 Ga. 127, 37 S. E. 161; 13 Cyc. 236 (b).

(a) The case differs on its facts from that of Boswell v. Barnhart, 96 Ga. 521, 23 S. E. 414, and the rule of harmless error will not apply.

McWILLIAMS et al. v. CITY OF ROME.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 747*)—TORTS —ACTS OF OFFICERS.

Where a municipal charter authorized the mayor and council to elect three building inspectors to discharge certain duties, and, instead of so doing, the mayor and council passed an ordinance declaring that the superintendent of public works should be the building inspector, that no building or repairs should be done without leave from him, and that, he should have direct supervision over all such buildings and repairs, and see that the ordinances of the city relative thereto were complied with, if the city was otherwise liable for the conduct of the building inspector in tearing down a wall belonging to a property owner, it would not be relieved from such liability by reason of the irregularity in the election of such officer. City Council of Sheffield v. Harris, 101 Ala. 564, 14 South. 357.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1570-1577; Dec. Dig. § 747.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1061*)—TRIAL (§ 160*)—CONDUCT OF JUDGE—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a suit against a municipality on account of the alleged wrongful tearing down of a wall by its building inspector under its authority, the plaintiffs' counsel was proceeding, regularly and without unnecessary consumption of time, or the offering of irrelevant testimony, so far as the record discloses, to introduce evidence for the purpose of proving the allegations of his petition. The presiding judge interrupted counsel by stating that he did not wish to interfere with the management of the case, but in order to save time he desired to know what the mayor and council had to do with the transaction. Counsel proceeded to examine a witness who was on the stand. The court again interrupted him with the statement: "I want you to show by what authority this wall was torn down before we proceed with the other. You are suing for damages to a wall that was torn down. You charge that, under the supervision and the authority of the mayor and council, so and so was done. I want you to show what that authority was." And again: "The mayor and council speak by record. I want to know what the mayor and council have done." Another colloquy ensued. In this he remarked that any evidence would be admitted which showed corporate action, though not reduced to writing and entered on the minutes. Other evidence was offered, touching the application to council for a permit to repair the building, the tearing down of the wall, etc.; but the plaintiffs' counsel had not announced the evidence closed. Defendant's counsel objected that the evidence offered was not admissible, according to the court's ruling. Finally the judge passed the following order: "Plaintiffs having offered evidence to support other elements of the petition, and the court, upon objection of the defendant, having ruled that no other evidence was admissible without further proof of the corporate action, and counsel for plaintiffs admitting that they could not further prove action by the mayor and council by record," the other evidence was rejected, and a nonsuit was granted. Held that, in view of the evidence already introduced and the announcement of counsel as to their desire to offer further evidence, this was error. Counsel for the plaintiffs should have been allowed to introduce his evidence, competent and relevant to make out the case alleged by him, and not have been stopped and a nonsuit granted. Whether, after he has been allowed a full opportunity to introduce all relevant evidence bearing on the issue, he will have made out a case, is a question which will then properly arise.

(a) Under the facts in the present case, it cannot be held that the ruling of the court was harmless error. The order granting a nonsuit was expressly based upon the admission of counsel for plaintiffs that they could not further prove action by the mayor and council "by record." While communications to and from a municipal council are presumed to be in writing until the contrary is shown, in a case of this kind the absence of a writing is not conclusive evidence of the absence of action. Baker v. Scofield, 58 Ga. 182.

ARTESIAN LITHIA WATER CO. v. CENTRAL BANK & TRUST CORPORATION.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 692*)—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

Where counsel for a party propounds a question to a witness called by that party, and the court sustains an objection to the question, the ruling of the court cannot be successfully attacked, without showing what answer was expected and that the court was at the time advised as to what the witness was expected to testify.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 376-380; Dec. Dig. § 168.*]

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by the Central Bank & Trust Corporation against the Artesian Lithia Water Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The Central Bank & Trust Corporation sued the Artesian Lithia Water Company upon four promissory notes, aggregating the principal sum of $300. Each of these notes was signed, "Artesian Lithia Water Co. [Seal], by J. J. Verner, Sec. & Treas." The defendant company filed its plea and answer, in which it denied that the notes sued on were executed by any authorized agent or representative of the defendant, for it or on its behalf, or by its authority, or with its knowledge or consent, and therefore denied that it was liable to the plaintiff thereon.

Upon the trial the plaintiff proved the execution of the notes by J. J. Verner. It proved by the minutes of the defendant corporation. That Verner was its duly elected secretary and treasurer. That upon its book of minutes were resolutions, duly adopted by the defendant's board of directors on February 6, 1907, in which it was resolved: "(1) That the president and secretary and treasurer be authorized to borrow the sum of $1,000 with which to open an agency in Atlanta, Ga., for the sale of water. That this money be expended for the purchase of utensils, delivery wagons, etc., for carrying on said business. (2) Resolved, that the said J. J. Verner is appointed for said position in Atlanta. (3) Resolved, that the said J. J. Verner is not to expend any sum in excess of $1,000, and that no debts shall be contracted by him for and on account of said company in excess of said $1,000, without the consent of the board of directors had and obtained for that purpose."

Verner, who was the plaintiff's witness, testified in substance as follows: He procured the loan from the Central Bank & Trust Corporation as secretary and treasurer of the water company, under authority of the foregoing resolution. He was at the time secretary and treasurer of the company, and as such it was his duty to operate the company, borrow money, spend money, and hold the money. From 1904 he had actual management and control of the business of the company. He opened the agency in Atlanta as provided in the resolution, bought material and fixtures, and opened an office. At the time of opening the agency W. C. Lanier was president of the company, but had nothing to do with the actual management of the business, and did not stay at the office of the company. No officer or stockholder other than the witness had management of the business for about one year after the resolution of February 6, 1907, above set forth. Under authority of that resolution the company borrowed, on February 8, 1907, the sum of $500. That this loan was made to the company by Verner himself. The note therefore was signed by W. C. Lanier as president, and J. J. Verner as secretary and treasurer, of the water company. On March 19, 1907, a loan of $300 was procured from the Central Bank & Trust Corporation, and the notes therefor, of which the notes sued on were given in renewal, were signed in the name of the water company by J. J. Verner as secretary and treasurer. Neither Lanier nor any one else as president had ever signed any notes, except the $500 note above referred to. Verner, when he signed the renewal notes sued on, March 10, 1908, was acting in the capacity of secretary and treasurer, and continued to so act for three or four days thereafter.

W. C. Lanier, who was a witness for the defendant, testified in part: "That all he ever did with reference to carrying out the resolution for borrowing that $1,000 was to sign the one note for $500; that he had nothing to do with the management or conduct of the business of the company at any time during the period of that contract; that he had no active duties to discharge; that he did not go out and make contracts for the company, or buy supplies or other necessary things for the company; * * * that Verner was manager of the Atlanta agency, and secretary and treasurer of the company; that there was no such officer as general manager of all branches of the company's business; * * * that Verner had control of the springs or wells in Cobb county, and of the pumping and shipping of the water, and directing the whole business of the company at Austell, as well as what the company was undertaking to do at Atlanta; that he bought wagons and horses, and had charge of the business as secretary and treasurer, and was the only officer of the company drawing any salary, and the only man that had active duties to perform."

The court directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

Dorsey & Shelton and Hugh M. Dorsey, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. D. W. Blair, of Marietta, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). Under the facts of this case the court could not properly have done otherwise than direct the verdict of which complaint is made. Verner, who signed the notes in the name of the defendant company, was its secretary and treasurer, and not only did he hold this office by a regularly adopted resolution of the board of directors, but he also performed the functions of a general manager for the company. Under the first section of the resolution of February 6, 1907, set forth in the statement of facts, the president of the company and Verner were authorized to borrow as much as $1,000. While there might be some question as to whether or not, in order to render a note given for such a loan valid and binding upon the company, it should have been the joint act of the president and secretary and treasurer, under the provisions of section 3 of the resolution of the last-mentioned date there can be no doubt that Verner was authorized to create an obligation binding upon the company for an amount not in excess of $1,000, and especially is this true when we consider the language of the resolution in connection with the fact of the broad and comprehensive duties resting upon Verner, who sustained to the company the relation, not only of secretary and treasurer, but of its general manager. The notes sued on were executed on the 10th day of March, 1908, the very day on which Verner ceased to be the secretary and treasurer of the de-defendant company; but there is not the slightest evidence to show that the bank knew of the termination of Verner's relation to the company at the time it accepted these notes. Besides, these notes were given in renewal of a debt which had been created by Verner, acting for the company, at a time when he was unquestionably its secretary and treasurer, and conducting its business as its general manager. While it does not appear that the corporate seal of the corporation was attached to the contract, the burden of showing authority to execute the written obligation sued upon was successfully carried by the plaintiff.

ADDISON v. EDWARDS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 194*) — ESTABLISHMENT — INSTRUCTIONS.

The plaintiff and the defendant each owned a land lot in Haralson county, one adjoining the other. The dividing line was in controversy. The plaintiff sued the defendant for a strip of land which was in the possession of the latter. The land lots were intended to contain 40 acres each. It appeared that within the boundaries surrounding the two lots there were several acres more than 80. After instructing the jury as to finding a disputed line by agreement, acquiescence, marked trees, etc., the judge charged: "Now that is the rule in case you find that an acquiesced line, one that has been by acts and declarations treated by both sides as the dividing line; if that does not settle the case, and it comes to the question of being settled as to where the original land line is or should be, then you will determine first as to the natural landmarks, and if no natural landmarks, then ancient marks, such as corner, station, or marked trees, and if you have not these in evidence, it is not disclosed there are any stations or marked trees to enable you to determine where the true line is, then you would resort to courses and distances, and the land would be divided between them, showing an equal portion on each side." Held, that the last part of this charge was harmful error. The burden was on the plaintiff to establish that he was entitled to recover the land for which he sued, or some definite part of it. In the absence of higher proof, courses and distances are resorted to. Civil Code, § 3820. But a resort thereto did not require the jury, as a matter of law, to divide the aggregate amount of land contained in the two lots, so as to give one equal portion to each side, regardless of any agreement or acquiescence of the parties. One lot may have contained an excess over the normal amount, and not the other.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 290*)—FORECLOSURE—PAYMENT OF ATTORNEY'S FEES.

Under statutory proceedings for the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage, an obligation contained therein to pay attorney's fees in addition to principal and interest cannot be enforced.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 534*)—AGREEMENT FOR ATTORNEY'S FEES—"RETURN DAY."

The expression "return day," as used in Civ. Code 1910, § 4252, providing that agreements for attorney's fees in an action on a note are void, unless the debtor fails to pay such debt on or before the return day of the court in which suit is brought, means the same as filing day, or the last day on which suits may be filed so as to be returnable to the next term.

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by C. E. Richards against H. S. Davenport. Judgment for plaintiff for the levy of a chattel mortgage fi. fa., and defendant filed an affidavit of illegality. From a judgment overruling the same, he brings error. Affirmed, on conditions.

J. G. Collins, of Gainesville, for plaintiff in error. H. H. Dean of Gainesville, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. To the levy of a mortgage fi. fa. issued upon the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage under the provisions of the statute for the foreclosure of such mortgages, Davenport, the plaintiff in error, filed an affidavit of illegality embracing several grounds. The only question for determination made in the record is whether or not the fi. fa. could proceed for the collection of attorney's fees which the maker of the mortgage contracted to pay in addition to principal and interest. Notice by the mortgagee of his intention to foreclose the mortgage for principal, interest, and attorney's fees by the 6th day of February, 1911, was given 10 days before that date; and on that date the mortgage was foreclosed according to the provisions of the statute for the foreclosure of chattel mortgages, and the fi. fa. was made returnable to the superior court of the county to be held on the third Monday in July, 1911.

[1] Section 4252 of the Civil Code provides that "obligations to pay attorney's fees upon any note or other evidence of indebtedness, in addition to the rate of interest specified therein, are void, and no court shall enforce such agreement to pay attorney's fees, unless the debtor shall fail to pay such debt on or before the return day of the court to which suit is brought for the collection of the same: Provided, the holder of the obligation sued upon, his agent, or attorney notifies the defendant in writing, ten days before suit is brought, of his intention to bring suit, and also the term of the court to which suit will be brought." Under the provisions of the section quoted, it is clear that the obligation to pay the attorney's fees was void, and could not be enforced, unless the debtor failed to pay the debt "on or before the return day of the court" in which the proceedings to collect the same were brought.

[2] The expression "return day," as used in the statute, means the same as filing day, or the last day on which suits may be filed so as to be returnable to the next term. Everett & Son v. Ferst's Sons & Co., 126 Ga. 662, 55 S. E. 916. In proceedings to foreclose chattel mortgages under the statute there is no day which corresponds to the "return day," as contemplated in section 4252; and consequently no time is fixed within which it can be rendered the duty of the debtor to pay the debt when given the notice provided for in this section of the Code, so as to give validity to the contract to pay attorney's fees stipulated in the evidence of indebtedness and take such an obligation out of the provision of the law making obligations to pay attorney's fees void.

Two things are necessary to negative the positive legislative declaration that an obligation to pay attorney's fees upon a note or other evidence of indebtedness is void, to wit: Notice by the holder of his intention to bring suit, and of the term of court to which the suit will be brought; and a failure upon the part of the debtor to pay the debt on or before the return day. In the suits contemplated by this statute the law fixes the return day for each court, and either before or on that day the debtor may make payment of the debt, and the obligation to pay attorney's fees in addition to the principal and interest is void. The law has not made any provision whereby the holder of the obligation may himself fix a day which shall take the place of the return day contemplated by the statute, although he might fix such a day as would be more advantageous to the debtor than the "return day" fixed by the statute. It may be that this is a hiatus in the remedial law for the enforcement of certain classes of obligations given by debtors, but it is one the court cannot fill. If it is desirable that it should be filled, the Legislature, and not the court, must deal with it, and correct the defect in the law, if it be one. We are of the opinion that the court erred in overruling that portion of the affidavit of illegality by which the plaintiff in error resisted the collection of the attorney's fees.

Inasmuch, however, as the mortgage was regularly foreclosed, and the only ground of illegality which can be sustained was that attacking the right of the creditor to foreclose for attorney's fees, it is ordered that the plaintiff in fi. fa. have the privilege of writing off the attorney's fees within 20 days after the return of the remittitur; otherwise, that the judgment be reversed.

Judgment affirmed, with direction. All the Justices concur.

VAN DUZER v. IRVIN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MANDAMUS (§ 55*)—EXISTENCE OF RIGHT —MUNICIPAL TAX—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY.

Notwithstanding the charter of the city of Elberton (Acts 1896, p. 148) authorizes one against whom a municipal execution is being enforced by levy to make defense thereto by affidavit of illegality, a mandamus will not be granted to compel the levying officer to accept such affidavit, where the defense therein pleaded is insufficient in law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 109-112; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 284*)—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§§ 957, 972, 976, 978*)—TAXATION—ASSESSMENT—CITY CHARTER—DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

The defense alleged in the affidavit in this case is insufficient in law.

(a) Section 17 of the charter (Acts 1896, p. 148), which provides for the assessment and valuation of property for taxation by a board of assessors, and requires notice to the taxpayer and an opportunity to be heard, and that the assessments shall be fixed according to the facts developed at such hearing, if one is had, is not unconstitutional as depriving the taxpayer of due process of law.

(b) This section of the act is not affected by the act approved August 13, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 22).

(c) The payment of an amount based on the taxpayer's valuation of his property is no bar to the collection of the remainder of his tax calculated on the valuation fixed by the assessors.

(d) The averment in the affidavit that the tax is levied to pay in part certain alleged illegal indebtedness, without stating how much of the tax demanded is for such alleged illegal indebtedness, or facts from which the amount can be ascertained, is insufficient to form any issue between the municipality and the taxpayer as to his disputed liability for any particular sum.

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Petition by I. C. Van Duzer against W. H. Irvin for writ of mandate to compel defendant to accept and return to the proper court for trial an affidavit of illegality to a municipal tax fl. fa. From an order denying the writ and revoking the restraining order previously granted, petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

C. P. Harris, of Elberton, for plaintiff in error. Worley & Nall, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. I. C. Van Duzer filed his petition against W. H. Irvin, chief of police of the city of Elberton, praying for a mandamus absolute to compel the defendant to accept and return to the proper court for trial an affidavit of illegality to a municipal tax fl. fa. which the defendant was seeking to enforce, and to enjoin the defendant, pending the hearing and determination of his petition for mandamus, from further proceeding with the fl. fa. The substance of the affidavit of illegality is that in 1910 there existed no law requiring property owners in the city of Elberton to make a return of their property subject to taxation, nevertheless the plaintiff made a voluntary return of his property at a valuation fixed by himself, which was alleged to be just and equitable, and he paid the taxes assessed on this sum by the city authorities; that the city authorities ignored the valuation placed upon his property by himself, and assessed the same at a larger sum, the assessment being by the board of tax assessors by virtue of section 17 of the charter of the city as contained in Acts 1896, p. 153; and that the fl. fa. which is now proceeding against the plaintiff is for the difference between the taxes calculated at the assessed rate upon the amount for which the plaintiff returned his property and the assessment placed thereon by the board of assessors. It is averred that his assessment is void, because it is opposed to the due process clause of the Constitution, because he was not given an opportunity to have the valuation of his property submitted to arbitration, as provided by the act approved August 13, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 25, § 5), and because several items of alleged indebtedness for the payment of which the tax was assessed were illegal, and for the payment of which the city authorities could not legally collect taxes. In the bill of exceptions it is stated that "no evidence was introduced upon the trial of said case, but the case was tried solely on the pleadings, the defendant's answer being treated as a general demurrer to the plaintiff's petition." The court denied the mandamus, and revoked the restraining order previously granted, and exception is taken to this judgment.

[1] If the statute provides that a taxpayer may contest the validity of the tax or the legality of the process to collect it by affidavit of illegality to the fl. fa., then the officer to whom is intrusted the enforcement of the fl. fa. must accept the illegality and return it to the proper court for trial. This would be his plain duty, and for a refusal to perform it the writ of mandamus is an appropriate remedy. It is otherwise where the remedy of affidavit of illegality is not given by statute. Webb v. Newsom, 138 Ga. 342, 75 S. E. 106. Section 20 of the act incorporating the city of Elberton (Acts 1896, p. 148) is as follows: "Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that should an affidavit of illegality be filed to an execution issued by the authorities of said city (which may be done under the same rules that prevail in state courts) or any property levied upon be claimed by a person not a party to the execution, said claim shall be interposed under the same rules, restrictions, and regulations that govern claim cases in the courts of the state, and such claims and illegalities shall be returned for trial to the justice's court or notary's court that is held in the city of Elberton, or the city court or superior court of Elbert county, the one having jurisdiction, as the case may be." It is contended that no illegality can be filed against executions issued by the city of Elberton, except and under the same rules prevailing in the state courts, and that the general remedy by illegality exists only against executions issuing on judgments. City of Atlanta v. Jacobs, 125 Ga. 528, 54 S. E. 534. This construction of the parenthetical clause contained in that section is entirely too narrow. The plain purport of the entire section is to provide for the contest, by affidavit of illegality, of liability under executions issued by the city, and we think it is broad enough to include resistance to the summary enforcement of an illegal tax by execution as well as any other executions. But it does not follow that the levying officer, who is proceeding to enforce a tax fl. fa., must accept and return to the proper court every so-called affidavit of illegality. The averments of the affidavit of illegality must distinctly disclose that the taxpayer either is not liable at all, or if liable for any amount, the extent of the disputed liability must be made to appear.

[2] The facts set up by the plaintiff in his affidavit of illegality in this case were insufficient to form an issue. He is in error as to the validity of section 17 of the act as to the assessment of property by assessors. The act specifically provides for the appointment of tax assessors, who are to value property subject to taxation, whether given in by the owner or not, and that the taxpayer shall be given notice of the assessment and an opportunity to be heard before the assessment shall become final. He is thus given due process of law. McWilliams v. Tallapoosa, 137 Ga. 283, 73 S. E. 510. He is also in error as to the applicability of the act approved August 13, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 22). This act provides for the method of assessing and collecting taxes where no adequate provision is made in the act authorizing the tax, or in the general law, for giving the taxpayer notice and opportunity to be heard as to the valuation and taxability of his property. This act is intended to supplement such tax laws as provide for the assessment of property where the taxpayer is not given notice and opportunity of hearing, and is not intended to apply to cases where the law for the levy of the tax provides for notice of its assessment. The fact that he has paid a part of his taxes on the valuation of his property is no reason why the city cannot proceed to collect the balance, made upon the increased valuation of the assessors.

It is alleged that certain items entering into the budget of expenses of the city of Elberton, and for which the tax was levied, did not constitute a legal indebtedness of the city. The affidavit does not undertake to say that the amount of the fi. fa. represents his part of that indebtedness, nor do the averments of the affidavit furnish any data as to what his proportionate part of the alleged illegal indebtedness would be. Indeed, no effort is made to do this. If municipal authorities include in a tax levy items of expense for the payment of which no tax can be legally levied, a taxpayer in his own behalf, as well as for other taxpayers, may enjoin the levy of the tax until purged of its illegality. But when the municipal charter provides for a defense by affidavit of illegality against the enforcement of a fi. fa. for a particular amount, and the taxpayer does not attack the legality of the entire levy, but only a certain amount thereof, in order to make the remedy available, he must directly state, or allege facts from which it may be inferred, the exact amount of the illegal tax which the municipality is undertaking to collect. Otherwise, no issue can be joined as to the proper amount due by the taxpayer. For the sake of the argument, let us admit that some or all of the items were debts which could not be legally collected, and that the complaining taxpayer's share of them was but a trifle as compared with the execution levied against him. If he really owed a part of the taxes for which the execution issued, it would be his duty under the general law (Civil Code, § 6287) to pay that which is due, in order to contest that which is not due. If it is impracticable to do this, a taxpayer in such case may proceed in equity to restrain the municipality from paying the illegal debts, or from assessing any taxes to pay the same.

The affidavit of illegality being insufficient in law to raise any issue, the sheriff properly refused to accept the same, and there was no error in refusing the mandamus absolute.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 681*)—NEW TRIAL (§ 18*)—RECORD—QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW—RULINGS ON PLEADINGS.

The bill of exceptions complains: (a) That the court refused to allow an amendment offered by the plaintiff in error to his answer; and (b) that the court overruled his motion for a new trial. Neither in the bill of exceptions, by exhibit or otherwise, nor in the exceptions pendente lite to the ruling disallowing the amendment, was the amendment set forth in form or substance. It was brought up as a part of the record, having been previously filed in the office of the clerk without any order by the judge allowing it filed. The only ground of the motion for new trial was that "the court erred in refusing to allow defendant's amendment to his answer, setting up an offset against plaintiff's claim against defendant." Held:

(a) The exception to the disallowance of the amendment cannot be considered. Richards v. Shields, this day decided.

(b) The refusal to allow the amendment furnishes no ground for a motion for a new trial. Lee v. McCarty, 132 Ga. 698, 64 S. E. 997. Hence the record fails to present any question for decision, and the judgment of the trial court will stand.

Shipp & Kline and L. L. Moore, all of Moultrie, for plaintiffs in error. E. K. Wilcox, of Valdosta, and T. H. Parker, of Moultrie, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. James Holmes brought an action against the Cobb Realty Company, a corporation, and two named individuals, to recover a described parcel of land, mesne profits, and damages for trespass on the land, and for injunction against further trespass. It appeared from the petition that the defendant corporation claimed the land sued for under a conveyance from the plaintiff. The petition was amended by allegations that the conveyance from the plaintiff to the defendant corporation was made to embrace the land sued for, by fraud practiced upon the plaintiff, and there was a prayer for the reformation of the conveyance. The substance of the allegations as to such fraud was: Plaintiff sold to Aycock certain described land, and executed to him a bond for title, in which the land sold was described as in effect all of a certain lot except described portions thereof belonging to the other parties. The bond contained a stipulation that the land sold should be subsequently surveyed by a competent surveyor, and that when so surveyed Aycock should pay to plaintiff a given sum cash and execute his notes, to mature at stated times, for the balance of the purchase price, the sum of the notes to be determined by the number of acres it should be found by the survey that the tract contained, and at a stated price per acre. A part of the land was afterwards surveyed and subdivided into town lots by agreement of plaintiff and Aycock, and the boundaries of the same marked and agreed upon between them, and the plat made by the surveyor filed and recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county where the land was situated. Aycock made the cash payment. After this the Cobb Realty Company was incorporated, and Aycock became a large stockholder therein and its president. He then informed the plaintiff that he had transferred the bond for title to the Cobb Realty Company, which was ready to pay the balance of the purchase price of that part of the land which had been surveyed and platted, and requested the plaintiff to convey such land to the corporation. Plaintiff expressed his willingness to do so, and found that Aycock had a deed already prepared for him to sign. Before signing the deed the plaintiff inquired of Aycock if the land described in the deed prepared at Aycock's instance described the land in accordance with the survey that he and Aycock had the surveyor to make, and a plat of which survey had been recorded, as stated. Aycock replied in the affirmative, and thereupon the plaintiff, having confidence in Aycock, and relying upon his representation that the deed he presented to plaintiff described the land in accordance with such survey and plat, executed the same to the Cobb Realty Company and delivered it to Aycock as president of the company. Subsequently the plaintiff discovered that Aycock had practiced a fraud upon him, in that Aycock had had another and different survey and plat of the land made without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, which last survey and plat embraced the land sued for; whereas the first survey and plat which had been agreed upon between them did not embrace the land sued for. The plaintiff could read and write, but had no knowledge of surveying, and was unable to ascertain, from the description of the land in the deed presented to him by Aycock, whether it differed from the plat of the survey which was first made of the land sold to Aycock, and which had been agreed to between them.

An examination of the bond for title given by the plaintiff to Aycock discloses the fact that the description of the land covers all the land described and conveyed by plaintiff to the Cobb Realty Company; and, this being true, we are unable to understand how the plaintiff had been defrauded, even though there may have been a material variance between the two surveys. The plaintiff has conveyed to the defendant company no more land than he was legally bound to convey under his bond. This conveyance, being only to that part of the land described in the bond for title which was surveyed, does not satisfy the bond. The defendant corporation, to whom the bond for title was assigned, is still entitled, upon payment of the agreed price per acre, to have the plaintiff convey the balance of the land described in the bond for title. There is no allegation that the acreage covered by the new plat was misstated, and thereby that the defendant procured a deed covering more acres than was paid for. But the allegation is that it embraced the land sued for, which was land which the plaintiff had never agreed to sell, either to defendant corporation or to any one else. This allegation, however, is not borne out by the bond for title, which controls; it appearing from that instrument that the plaintiff intended to sell all the land in the specified original land lot which lay west of the Georgia Northern Railroad, except the three described lots which were recited as being owned by other persons, thus showing an intention to sell all of that lot which he owned west of the said railroad, reserving to himself none of it. The land in dispute was some of the land which lay west of the railroad, and consequently the defendant, upon payment of the purchase price, was entitled to a deed; and it makes no difference that it might or might not have been included in the survey of the town lots. As there was no ground alleged for reforming the deed, and the deed concluded the plaintiff as to his right to recover the land, the judge erred in refusing to dismiss the petition on general demurrer.

CARRIERS (§ 197*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—CHARGES—CONNECTING CARRIERS.

When an owner delivers goods to a carrier for transportation to a destination beyond its line, and for that purpose to be delivered by it to a connecting carrier in order to continue the transportation, or where it becomes necessary for that purpose to make successive deliveries from one to another upon a continuous line or succession of carriers, the first and each succeeding carrier, if each conducts business independently of the others, becomes the agent of the owner to make delivery of the goods to the next carrier; and if in such case the initial carrier gives to the owner a bill of lading by the terms of which the goods are to be delivered at the terminus of its line to a named connecting carrier, to be transported over the latter's line and certain other designated lines to destination, and by the fault or negligence of the initial carrier the goods are transported to destination over other lines than those named in the bill of lading, the final carrier has the right to pay the charges for freight, if within the ordinary rates and apparently regular, of the prior connecting carriers over whose lines the goods were transported, and to hold the goods for reimbursement, as well as for its own share of the freight earned and for demurrage due it, provided the final carrier had no knowledge or notice of the agreement between the owner and the initial carrier, embodied in the bill of lading, as to a different routing of the goods. Bird v. Georgia R., 72 Ga. 655; Georgia R. Co. v. Murrah, 85 Ga. 343, 11 S. E. 779, and authorities cited; Goodin v. Southern Railway Co., 125 Ga. 630, 634, 54 S. E. 720, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1054, 5 Ann. (a) The final carrier and the next preceding connecting carrier would be none the less independent carriers merely because the settlement of the proportionate freight charges due each of them, according to regular published rates for goods carried over both lines, was made by their respective auditors at stated intervals, instead of such charges being paid at the junctional point by the receiving line to the delivering line.

(b) Applying the law as above announced to the facts of this case, the trial judge erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of trover and bail, brought by the owner of goods against the final carrier, and in overruling the motion for new trial made by the defendant.

The plaintiff specifically demurred to so much of the answer as set forth the will on the ground of irrelevancy. Held that, though the will may not be relevant to the real issue in the case, yet, as the plaintiff in her petition called on the defendant to produce this instrument and prayed its cancellation, the averments respecting it are responsive to the plaintiff's own allegations and prayer.

4. PLEADING (§ 98*)—ANSWER—RESPONSE-NESS.

The defendant also averred that the plaintiff's intestate died shortly after his marriage, and that, in ignorance of the fact that a child would be born to his widow, she entered into an agreement with her respecting the disposition of her husband's property. This matter is irrelevant, because the defendant claimed no right or benefit under the agreement, and because any arrangement between the plaintiff as an individual and one of the defendants would not estop the former in her representative capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 200, 201; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 194*)—DEMURRER—GROUNDS—MATTERS OF INDUCEMENT.

There were some special grounds of demurrer relating to the relevancy of certain averments in the answer; but, as they may properly be considered as matters of inducement to the material averments of the defense, there was no error in overruling these grounds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 444-446, 449-452; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

6. WITNESSES (§ 160*)—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTIONS WITH PERSONS SINCE DECEASED.

In a suit instituted by an administrator, a defendant is an incompetent witness to testify in his own favor concerning transactions and communications with the deceased person, whether such transactions or communications were had by such deceased person with the party testifying or with any other person. Acts 1900, p. 87.

7. INSTRUCTIONS—PAROL TRUST.

Some of the excerpts from the charge were constructed to fit the allegations of the answer setting up a parol express trust, and for that reason were erroneous.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by Mrs. D. N. Wilder, as administratrix, against Mrs. F. E. Wilder and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

A. H. Davis, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. Mrs. Dovie N. Wilder, as administratrix of her deceased husband, brought an action against Mrs. F. E. Wilder, the mother of the plaintiff's intestate, to recover certain realty. It was alleged that the legal title to the property was in the plaintiff's intestate, but that the defendant claimed title under an alleged will of the plaintiff's intestate, which had never been probated, and was void because of the birth of a child after its alleged execution, there being no provision in the will in contemplation of such an event. Petitioner prayed for the cancellation of the will and a recovery of the property. The defendant in her answer admitted that the legal title was in the plaintiff's intestate, but averred that the equitable title was in her, firstly, because the property was purchased with her own funds and the legal title was taken in the name of her son, under an understanding and agreement that the property was always to be hers, and that the son should make to her such conveyance as she might require; and, secondly, that the property was purchased with the joint accumulations of the savings of herself, her sister, and her son, and the title was taken to the son under an agreement that the property was to be hers, charged with the right of the son and sister to live in the house so long as defendant occupied it as a home. The sister of the defendant was made a party to the suit, and adopted the defendant's answer as her own. The trial resulted in a verdict for the defendants, and a new trial was refused.

[1] 1. The plaintiff's demurrer challenged the sufficiency of the defendant's allegations to raise an implied or resulting trust. Express trusts are those created by agreement of the parties; implied trusts are such as are inferred by law from the nature of the transaction or the conduct of the parties. Civil Code, § 3732. Implied trusts are sometimes called resulting trusts. Civil Code, § 3739, enumerates the following instances of circumstances where a trust will be implied: "1. Whenever the legal title is in one person, but the beneficial interest, either from the payment of the purchase money or other circumstances, is either wholly or partially in another. 2. Where, from any fraud, one person obtains the title to property which rightly belongs to another. 3. Where, from the nature of the transaction, it is manifest that it was the intention of the parties that the person taking the legal title shall have no beneficial interest. 4. Where a trust is expressly created, but no uses are declared, or are ineffectually declared, or extend only to a part of the estate, or fall from any cause, a resulting trust is implied for the benefit of the grantor, or testator, or his heirs." The answer sets up that the money of the defendant, acquired from her earnings and from gifts of her sister and son, was used in the purchase of the land, and that, though she caused the legal title to be taken in the name of the son, she was actuated to this course because she was a widow, and regarded her son as the man of the house, but that it was the common understanding and agreement of all parties concerned that she was to be the real owner, and that the son should make her a conveyance whenever required by her. As between parent and child, payment of the purchase money by one and causing the conveyance to be made to another will be presumed to be a gift; but a resulting trust in favor of the one paying the money may be shown and the presumption rebutted. Civil Code, § 3740. If the mother bought the property with her own money and took the title in the name of her son, and nothing else appeared, then the transaction would be a gift. But if the title was taken in the name of the son under circumstances indicating that no gift was intended, and that the mother was to continue to be the owner of the property notwithstanding the legal title was put in the son, as between them a trust would result to the mother. Dyer v. Dyer, 1 Lead.

Cases in Eq. 314; Cottle v. Harrold, 72 Ga. 830; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1037, 1038. In such cases the court may hear parol evidence of the nature of the transaction or the circumstances or conduct of the parties either to imply or rebut the trust. Civil Code, § 3741.

[2] 2. But the other defense stands on an entirely different footing. In the latter the defendant undertakes to ingraft a parol trust on a deed. The essence of the averment is that the property was bought with money belonging to the defendant, her sister, and her son, and that title was made to the latter under an express agreement that the property was to be held for the defendant, subject to the right of the sister and the son to live in the house as long as the defendant occupied it as a home. This is an express trust, resting upon the agreement of the parties, and must be created or declared in writing. Civil Code, § 3733. The demurrer to so much of the answer as undertook to set up a parol express trust should have been sustained.

[3-7] 3-7. The rulings made in headnotes 3 to 7 do not require discussion.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

ROME INDUSTRIAL INS. CO. v. EIDSON.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 376*)—WAIVER OF FORFEITURES—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

A policy of insurance required the payment of a weekly premium, and declared that, if any payment should not be made when due, the policy should be void. It also contained this clause: "Its terms cannot be changed or its conditions varied, except by a written agreement, signed by the president or secretary of the company. Therefore agents (which term includes superintendents and assistant superintendents) are not authorized and have no power to make, alter, or discharge contracts, waive forfeitures, or receive premiums on policies in arrears more than four weeks. * * * Should this policy become void in consequence of nonpayment of premium, it may be revived, if not more than 52 premiums are due, upon payment of all arrears and the presentation of evidence satisfactory to the company of the sound health of the insured." Held, that the company could thus limit the authority of its agents as to waiving forfeitures or receiving overdue premiums, and one who accepted a policy with these terms in it was charged with notice of such limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 952-955; Dec. Dig. § 376.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 664*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—EVIDENCE.

Under such a policy, it was error to admit evidence tending to show that, when the wife of the insured went to the local assistant superintendent, in a city other than that where the home office of the company was located, seeking to have a lapsed policy revived, and paid to him past-due premiums, she informed him of a sickness which her husband had undergone, and offered to have an examination made, and that the assistant superintendent told her it would be unnecessary, that he would see the physician, that she was "all right," and that the policy was as good as ever. In the absence of any enlargement of the authority of the agent, or ratification of his acts, such assurances by him were beyond his authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1555, 1687, 1688, 1699; Dec. Dig. § 664.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

The evidence did not authorize the court to charge in effect that if the jury believed that after lapse the policy was revived, or again brought into force and effect, by the company and the insured, and if under such revival the premiums and assessments past due were paid and accepted by the company, then if the premiums were kept up, and the terms of the policy otherwise complied with on the part of the insured, the company would be liable, or to charge that the company could not accept default payment, if any were made to it, with knowledge of the default, and retain the premium until after the death of the insured, and then repudiate the payment and liability under the policy and retain the premiums.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 505, 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 669*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where a policy of life insurance provided that, if any premium should not be paid when due, the policy should become void, but that a lapsed policy might be revived upon payment of all arrears and "the presentation of evidence satisfactory to the company of the sound health of the insured," it was error to charge that evidence of health, if presented, "ought to have been strong enough to have been satisfactory to the company, or sufficient to have been satisfactory to a reasonable man."

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by J. A. Eidson against the Rome Industrial Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Mrs. Julia Eidson brought suit against the Rome Industrial Insurance Company on a policy issued upon the life of her husband. The insured was required to pay a weekly premium of 70 cents. The policy also contained the following terms: "This policy is issued upon an application which omits the warranty usually contained in applications, and contains the entire agreement between the company and the insured and the holder and owner hereof. Its terms cannot be changed, or its conditions varied, except by a written agreement, signed by the president or secretary of the company. Therefore agents (which term includes superintendents and assistant superintendents) are not authorized and have no power to make, alter, or discharge contracts, waive forfeitures, or receive premiums on policies in arrears more than four weeks, or to receipt for the same in the receipt book, and all such arrears given to an agent to be at the risk of those who pay them, and shall not be credited upon the policy, whether entered in the receipt book or not. If this policy be assigned or otherwise parted with, or if any erasure or alteration be made therein, except by indorsement signed by the secretary, or if any premium shall not be paid when due, this policy shall be void. * * * Should this policy become void in consequence of nonpayment of premium, it may be revived, if not more than 52 premiums are due, upon payment of all arrears and the presentation of evidence satisfactory to the company of the sound health of the insured." It was conceded that the policy lapsed in February, 1908, for nonpayment of premiums. But the plaintiff contended that it was renewed in August, following, before the death of her husband, the insured. The jury found for the plaintiff. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused, and it excepted.

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, of Atlanta, and Dean & Dean, of Rome, Ga., for plaintiff in error. Napier, Wright & Cox, and Stevens & Ogburn, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] 1, 2. The policy on its face contained limitations on the authority of the agent. The company could waive a forfeiture by its conduct, without a written entry; and it would doubtless not be permitted to dally with an insured by accepting his money and application for a revival, retaining them an unreasonable time, and rejecting the application after his death. Georgia Masonic Insurance Co. v. Gibson, 52 Ga. 640. Some courts hold that a general agent of the company can waive a forfeiture by reason of the apparent authority conferred on him as an agent, in spite of provisions like those contained in this policy. But this court is committed to the doctrine that the company can limit the authority of the agent effectively as to one who has notice of the limitation, and that such terms in the policy charge the insured with notice. Hutson v. Prudential Ins. Co., 122 Ga. 847, 50 S. E. 1000; Vardeman v. Penn Mutual Life Ins. Co., 125 Ga. 117, 54 S. E. 66, 5 Ann. Cas. 221; Bank of Commerce v. New York Life Ins. Co., 125 Ga. 552 (3), 557, 54 S. E. 643. It was accordingly error to admit evidence to the effect that the assistant local superintendent undertook to waive requirements of the policy as to revival, and also assured the wife of the insured that the policy was as good as ever, unless such acts were brought to the knowledge of the company and ratified by it. It may be unfortunate if the wife of the insured relied on such statements of the agent; but, if one takes a policy containing such limitations upon the authority of the company's agent, he has to abide by the agreement, unless it is waived by some one having greater authority than the agent. This ruling is not in conflict with those which hold that in the inception of the contract, in consummating the insurance and putting the policy in force, knowledge of the agent entrusted with doing so is attributable to the company, and waives a condition against its going into effect, arising from facts so known. Johnson v. Aetna Ins. Co., 123 Ga. 404, 51 S. E. 339, 107 Am. St. Rep. 92. In the latter case, the policy is being put in force. In the former, it is in force, and its terms govern the future power of an agent to waive forfeiture.

[3] 3. The court charged in substance that if, after the policy lapsed, it was again brought into force and effect by the parties to it, the company and the insured, and if, under such revival, the premiums and assessments past due were paid and accepted by the company, then if the premiums were kept up, and the terms of the policy otherwise complied with on the part of the assured, the company would be liable. He also charged that the company could not accept default payments, if any were made to it, with knowledge of the default, and retain the premium until after the death of the assured, and then repudiate the payment and liability under the policy, and retain the premium.

We fail to find in the record evidence authorizing these charges. The policy lapsed in February, 1908, for nonpayment of premium. No effort to revive it was made until the following August. The insured then signed an application for that purpose, and his wife paid to one of several agents known as "assistant superintendents" in the company's Atlanta office the amount necessary to cover the monthly premiums due from February until that time. The evidence tended to show that the agent forwarded the application to the home office of the company at Rome, but it was rejected, and he was notified; that a letter was written by one of the agents in the Atlanta office, directed to the applicant, which bore date August 28th, but was not received by the wife of the insured until September 5th, after his death. In this it was stated that the application had been declined, and that the amount which she had paid to the assistant superintendent would be returned to her by him. It was tendered to her later, but she declined to receive it. There was no evidence to show that the money was forwarded to the company, or received or held by it. The only intimation to that effect is to be found in the evidence of one Bradley, who stated that he was acting superintendent of defendant for the Atlanta district, and testified that, when he received the notice of the rejection of the application, he wrote the letter of August 28th, and it was mailed the same day, in the afternoon; that "at that time I made the remittance from this office to the home office. I did not receive any amount of money from Mr. Akin [the assistant superintendent to whom it was paid by the wife of the insured], or remit to the company any amount of money. It has not been remitted from this office." One clause of this statement, taken alone, might indicate that he remitted the money to the home office after the application had been rejected, and after he had notified the insured of that fact by mail; but, taken together, the witness can hardly mean by his testimony that such was the fact. There was evidence that the secretary of the company offered to pay to the brother of the wife of the insured the amount of the premium; but this did not show that the company had received that amount from the local agent. It appeared to be rather in the nature of an offer of compromise. There was also no evidence that, after a revival of the policy, the premiums were then kept up.

[4] 4. The presiding judge charged: "To make the attempt to revive effectual, it must be shown to you that evidence of the sound health of the insured was presented to the company, and, if presented, it ought to have been strong enough to have been satisfactory to the company, or sufficient to have been satisfactory to a reasonable man." The policy declared that, if any premium should not be paid, "this policy shall be void." In providing a method of obtaining a revival, one requirement was "the presentation of evidence satisfactory to the company of the sound health of the insured." It did not say "sufficient to satisfy a reasonable man," as the judge charged. Where the company reserved to itself the question of satisfaction, it would be changing the contract to hold that what would satisfy a reasonable man would answer the terms of the policy. Doubtless the company must act honestly and in good faith in passing upon the question. But, if it does so, the test applied by the trial court was erroneous. Mackenzie v. Minis, 132 Ga. 323 (1, 2), 327, 329, 63 S. E. 900, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1003, 16 Ann. Cas. 723; Stewart v. Exum, 132 Ga. 422 (3), 425, 64 S. E. 471; Ronald v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, 132 N. Y. 378, 382, 384, 30 N. E. 739; 2 Joyce, Ins. § 1276. A company may waive this requirement, or estop itself by its conduct from setting up noncompliance with it. But that is a different thing from defining what is a compliance. In this case there was evidence that the policy had lapsed for some six months when the effort was made to revive it, that the insured had been in bad health, that he died in three or four weeks after the application for reinstatement, and that he had been rejected as a risk by another company to which he applied for insurance.

ESTILL v. SAVANNAH BANK & TRUST CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 265*)—RENT—DISTRRAINT.

Although a tenant, who is a merchant, may sell and dispose of a considerable portion of his stock of merchandise, including all the goods in the store of a certain class, at a reduced price, and not with the intention of replacing these goods with other goods of a similar character or value, and though such a sale have the effect of decreasing the value of the stock of goods carried, it is error to charge as matter of law that this would have the effect of subjecting the tenant to immediate distraint under the provisions of section 3700 of the Civil Code of 1910, relative to tenants seeking to remove their goods from the premises.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1062-1074; Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

2. DISTRRAINT FOR RENT.

Would the sale by such a tenant of his entire stock of goods in bulk have the effect of subjecting the tenant to distraint under the statute above referred to?—quære.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by the Savannah Bank & Trust Company trustee against J. H. Estill. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Robt. L. Colding, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. W. L. Clay, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. The plaintiff in the court below sued out a distress warrant against Estill, the defendant, on the ground that the defendant "is seeking to remove his goods from the premises." The distress warrant was levied upon a stock of goods on the leased premises. Estill filed a counter affidavit, in which he deposed "that it is not true, as alleged in the affidavit upon which the distress warrant issued, that this defendant is seeking to remove his goods from the premises leased by him, as alleged." The trial upon the issue thus formed resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled.

[1] Section 3700 of the Civil Code provides that "the landlord shall have power to distrain for rent as soon as the same is due, or before due if the tenant is seeking to remove his goods from the premises." The distress warrant in the present case was issued on the ground that the tenant "is seeking to remove his goods from the premises." The tenant was a merchant, his stock of goods consisting of wall paper, a small quantity of paints, and some sash and blinds. There was evidence to show that he had sold the sash and blinds for about $30, and that this amount was about 50 per cent. of the regular selling price. He had also sold some paint, the quantity of which was not very definitely stated, but must have been inconsiderable, as there was not enough of any one kind to paint a house. As to the sale of the sash, blinds, and doors, the tenant himself testified on the trial that it was his intention "not to handle that line of goods any more, * * * that he was going to put in a larger stock of wall paper," and that he had "just gotten in a new lot of wall paper." A witness for the plaintiff, who had purchased some brushes, putty, and oil at a reduced price from one of the salesmen of the defendant, stated that the reason given for "reducing the price was that they were going out of business, or liquidating." This reason was stated by a Mr. Kelley, or a Mr. Paxton, who were salesmen for the store.

Upon the trial, in course of his instructions to the jury the court charged them as follows: "If you find that what was done was in the usual course of business and trade as carried on in that place, the mere selling of goods to get other goods in their stead, or to get rid of old stock, or which was not otherwise merchantable or not in first-class condition, that would not be a removal in the eyes of the law. But if the intent was to impair the stock, to get rid of any considerable portion of it finally, without the idea of restoring it in some way or other to the business, but with the idea of disposing of it at a sacrifice in order to get out of business finally, then, under such circumstances as those, if you find that was not in the usual and ordinary course of business as carried on there, that would be a removal in contemplation of law." Complaint is made of this charge. We do not consider this charge as merely submitting the proposition of law that, if a merchant sells or is seeking to sell his stock of goods in bulk, in such a case a distress warrant might be issued against him under the provisions of the statute above quoted. But the charge is more comprehensive than that, and is liable to be understood, and was probably understood by the jury, to mean that if a merchant sells any considerable portion of his stock of goods with intent to impair the stock, and without the idea of restoring it in some way to the business, and this was not done in the usual and ordinary course of business as carried on there, this would be a removal in contemplation of the law. And certainly the portion of the charge set forth above was open to the broad construction just placed upon it, under the court's additional instruction, which is also complained of in the motion for a new trial, and which is in the following language: "Take into consideration all of the circumstances as detailed to you from the stand, and reach a conclusion whether or not what was done was in the usual and ordinary course of trade and business as there conducted by the tenant, or whether it was beyond the usual and beyond the ordinary course of business, and what was done amounted to an impairment of the stock and business, with no intention of getting rid of old stock that could not be sold in the ordinary course of business and putting something back in place of it."

In fact the controlling idea running through the entire charge was that if the sale of the goods referred to by the witnesses in their testimony was not in the usual and ordinary course of trade, but was for the purpose of getting a final disposal of these goods, and without the intent of replacing them with other goods, and that this amounted to an impairment of the stock of goods in the business, the landlord had the right, under the statute, to issue the distress warrant. We do not think this doctrine is sound. While it has been held, as against a tenant of agricultural lands, that a sale of any part of the crops gives the landlord the right to sue out a distress warrant at once against a tenant who is seeking to remove his goods from the premises, we do not think that this principle can be extended to cover the case of a merchant who offers a portion of his goods for sale at reduced prices, even though such a sale is not in the usual and ordinary course of business, and will have and is intended to have the effect of reducing the amount of his stock. That a difference might exist in the application of the rule to agricultural tenants and other tenants who remove or are seeking to remove their property from rented premises was recognized in Daniel v. Harris, 84 Ga. 479, 10 S. E. 1013, one of the cases in which it was ruled that the removal and disposal by an agricultural tenant of a part of the crop produced on the premises would subject the tenant to immediate distraint. In the case just cited it was said: "It is contended that the mere fact that a tenant is seeking to remove his goods from the premises will not justify the suing out of a distress warrant before the rent is due, but that the removal contemplated must be fraudulent, or with some intent or purpose to deprive the landlord of his rent, or to hinder, obstruct, or delay him in the collection of it. We think, however, that in the case of agricultural tenants what the statute has in view as to commercial crops, though it may be otherwise as to ordinary property, is the mere removal, and not the purpose of it. The statute gives the landlord a special lien upon the crop. Code, § 1997. This lien attached to the whole of the crop, and not to a part only. Without the landlord's consent, therefore, the tenant, however free from intention to defraud or injure his landlord, has no right to remove the crop or any part of it from the premises."

We do think, because a merchant, finding one line of goods, or goods kept in one department of his store, unprofitable to handle, decides to close out that line of goods and to no longer handle it in his business, or because for any other reason he sells or offers to sell all of his goods in such line or such department, though it be a considerable portion of his stock of merchandise, and though the sale may be made without intent to replace these goods with goods of like kind or like value, then it can be declared as matter of law that he hereby becomes subject to immediate distraint for rent not then due. Whether such evidence might be submitted for the consideration of the jury, to assist them in determining, as matter of fact, whether the merchant is seeking to remove his goods, is another matter.

[2] A different question would be presented from that which we have decided above, if it had appeared from the evidence that the defendant had sold or was offering to sell his stock of goods in bulk, and the trial judge had charged the jury distinctly that such a sale of goods by a merchant in bulk would authorize the landlord to distrain immediately.

2. PARTNERSHIP (§ 183*)—RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES AS TO THIRD PARTIES—APPLICATION OF ASSETS TO LIABILITIES.

Error from Superior Court, Berrien County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by W. B. Goodman against A. E. Bullard and another, in which C. D. Shaw and another intervene. Judgment sustaining in part demurrer to intervention, and interveners bring error. Affirmed.

On and prior to September 25, 1907, there existed a partnership doing business under the name of C. D. Shaw & Co. The members of the firm were F. A. Shaw, C. D. Shaw, W. B. Goodman, and A. E. Bullard. On the date above mentioned the two Shaws sold the half interest which they together owned in the firm to Goodman and Bullard and J. T. Allen; the interest sold to Goodman and Bullard being a one-fourth interest, and a like interest to Allen. J. T. Allen gave his notes, with W. B. Allen as surety, to the Shaws for the purchase price of the one-fourth interest sold by them to him. After such sale the firm was reorganized and did business in the name of A. E. Bullard & Co.; A. E. Bullard, W. B. Goodman, and J. T. Allen constituting the partnership. On May 21, 1909, on his petition, W. B. Goodman was appointed receiver for the assets of the new firm. On May 20, 1909, the Shaws sued out an attachment against J. T. Allen for the purchase price of the one-fourth interest in the partnership of C. D. Shaw & Co. sold by them to Allen. The attachment was not levied, however, as the assets of A. E. Bullard & Co. were in the hands of Goodman, as receiver. On August 11, 1911, the Shaws obtained against J. T. Allen, as principal, and W. B. Allen, as surety, a common-law judgment on the notes given for the one-fourth interest in the firm of C. D. Shaw & Co. sold to J. T. Allen. The Shaws by leave of the court subsequently filed an intervention in the suit brought by Goodman against the firm of A. E. Bullard & Co., in which intervention they sought a decree establishing a prior lien in their favor on the assets in the hands of the receiver, except as to older judgments and liens against the partnership assets; their contention being that as to the one-fourth interest in such assets belonging to J. T. Allen they had a superior lien, except as to older judgments and liens against the partnership of Bullard & Co. Upon the filing of such intervention, from which the foregoing facts appear, together with the fact that J. T. Allen was insolvent (it not appearing, however, upon what ground a receiver was appointed for the firm), a rule nisi was issued, calling upon the receiver, Goodman, to show cause why the intervention should not be allowed. Upon the matter coming on for a hearing at the first term of court thereafter, Goodman demurred to the petition for intervention, upon which demurrer the court ruled "that the debts of the partnership must be paid out of the partnership assets in the hands of the receiver, before payment of any part of the debts of the interveners is paid out of such assets; and the demurrer is sustained to the intervention, in so far and to the extent that it seeks priority of payment over the creditors of the partnership in the partnership assets." The Shaws excepted to this ruling.

Lankford & Dickerson, of Douglas, and J. P. Knight, of Nashville, for plaintiffs in error. W. D. Bule, W. G. Harrison, and Hendricks & Christian, all of Nashville, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. The judgment sought to be established as a lien against one-fourth of the partnership assets in the hands of the receiver, and of a superior dignity to all liens upon such assets, except older judgments and liens against the partnership, was not a judgment against the partnership, but was one against J. T. Allen as an individual. Under the well-established rule as to the disposition of partnership assets by a court through the hands of its receiver, the joint or partnership assets will be applied first to the payment of partnership debts, and none of such assets can be devoted to the payment of the individual indebtedness of the partners until all of the partnership debts have been satisfied. It does not appear from the petition for intervention whether the assets in the hands of the receiver were sufficient to pay the partnership debts; but the contention made in the petition was that the judgment which the Shaws had obtained against Allen individually, who was a member of the partnership, had a prior lien on one-fourth of the partnership assets, except as to older judgments and liens against the partnership. Clearly such a contention was not sustainable. The attachment sued out by the Shaws against Allen as an individual, and for the purchase price which he had agreed to pay them for their interest in the partnership which they had sold to him, certainly did not operate to give the Shaws any lien as against Allen's interest in the partnership over that of other creditors of the firm. The attachment was never levied, and, indeed, it could not have been levied upon Allen's interest in the partnership, even though the assets of the firm had not been in the hands of the receiver. The Civil Code expressly provides that an attachment against an individual member of a copartnership shall be levied only upon the separate property of such copartner. Section 5067. From what has been said it is manifest that the court did not err in granting the order of which complaint was made. Camp v. Mayer, 47 Ga. 414 (7). See, in this connection, Sheppard v. Bridges, 137 Ga. 61, 74 S. E. 245.

HUFF et al. v. YARBROUGH et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

DEEDS (§ 124*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATE CONVEYED.

J. F. Huff executed the following instrument: "Georgia, Cobb County. This indenture, made this the 29th day of May, 1890, between J. F. Huff and Mrs. Martha Huff, both of the county and state aforesaid, witnesseth: That the said J. F. Huff, for and in consideration of the love and affection of his wife, the said Mrs. Martha Huff, the said J. F. Huff hereby gives, grants, and conveys to the said Mrs. Martha Huff all the property, both real and personal [which included the land in controversy], belonging to the estate of the said J. F. Huff, in the county of Cobb, state of Georgia, at his death, should the said Mrs. Martha Huff survive the said J. F. Huff, and the said Mrs. Martha Huff shall have the property as aforesaid, with all the rights and privileges belonging thereunto, for the support of the said Mrs. Martha Huff; * * * and should there remain any property, real or personal, at the death of the said Mrs. Martha Huff, the same shall be divided equally between James Huff and Mary Ragsdale." There arising a controversy as to whether this paper was not void, on the ground that it was testamentary in character and improperly executed and attested, all his children joined in executing an instrument which rendered it effectual to convey property according to the terms thereof. After the death of J. F. Huff, Mrs. Martha Huff conveyed the land referred to in this writing to the defendant in the instant case, and after the death of Mrs. Martha Huff the said James Huff and Mary Ragsdale brought suit to recover the land, alleging that they had a vested remainder interest therein, and were entitled to possession thereof upon the termination of the life estate. Held that, under the terms and provisions of the instrument set forth above, Mrs. Martha Huff had authority to consume the entire estate for her support, the corpus as well as the income, and that a sale of the land for that purpose by her, and a conveyance executed in pursuance thereof, divested James Huff and Mary Ragsdale of any interest they might have had in the land.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by James Huff and another against E. E. Yarbrough and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

James Huff and Mary Ragsdale brought an action for the recovery of land in Cobb county, against E. E. Yarbrough and certain named tenants of the latter. It is alleged in the petition that plaintiffs and defendant claim under a common source of title, to wit, through J. F. Huff. Petitioners base their claim of title upon the two written instruments hereinafter set forth, each executed with the formality of a deed, and upon the further fact that Mrs. Martha Huff, therein named, has since died. The first of these instruments, executed by J. F. Huff, is as follows: "Georgia, Cobb county. This indenture, made this the 29th day of May, 1890, between J. F. Huff and Mrs. Martha Huff, both of the county and state aforesaid, witnesseth: That the said J. F. Huff, for and in consideration of the love and affection of his wife, the said Mrs. Martha Huff, the said J. F. Huff hereby gives, grants, and conveys to the said Mrs. Martha Huff all the property, both real and personal, belonging to the estate of the said J. F. Huff, in the county of Cobb, state of Georgia, at his death, should the said Mrs. Martha Huff survive the said J. F. Huff, and the said Mrs. Martha Huff shall have the property as aforesaid, with all the rights and privileges belonging thereunto, for the support of the said Mrs. Martha Huff; and should there remain any property, real or personal, at the death of the said Mrs. Martha Huff, the same shall be divided equally between James Huff and Mary Ragsdale." The other instrument was executed jointly by all the children of J. F. Huff, after his death, and was accepted by Mrs. Martha Huff, the widow of J. F. Huff, in full and final settlement of a controversy which had arisen between herself and the children of J. F. Huff as to her interest in the latter's estate. This instrument reads as follows: "State of Georgia, County of Fulton. This indenture, made this 24th day of April, 1891, between William T. Huff, James C. Huff, Henry T. Huff, John W. Huff, and Mary E. Ragsdale, all being 21 years of age and being all the children of J. F. Huff deceased, late of Cobb county, Georgia, and all of Fulton county, Georgia, do by these presents consent to and convey all and singular the rights to said party of the second part under a deed of gift made to the said M. A. (Martha) Huff [reference here being made to the first quoted instrument], and the consideration of this agreement is the relinquishment, giving up, and electing of the provisions of said deed of gift by the said party of the second part in lieu of dower, child's, and any and all claim to any part in the real estate of the land of the said J. F. Huff, deceased, in Fulton county, Georgia, this to be full settlement to her, as widow of said J. F. Huff, deceased, in the land in Fulton county, as aforesaid." The petition further alleges that the defendant claims title to the land in controversy by reason of a deed of conveyance executed by the said Mrs. Martha Huff subsequently to the execution of the foregoing instruments, whereby she undertook to convey to defendant the land in controversy. The defendants filed a general demurrer to the petition, which the court sustained, and dismissed the petition.

Walter McElreath and J. A. Watson, both of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. J. Z. Foster, of Marietta, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). Under the allegations of the petition, the written instrument executed by J. F. Huff is to be given effect and construed according to the words and terms thereof, inasmuch as subsequently to the death of J. F. Huff all of his children joined in the execution of the other written instrument, conveying to Mrs. Martha Huff, the widow of J. F. Huff, "all and singular the rights" to the property purporting to have been conveyed to her by the instrument first set forth above. It is conceded in the petition brought by the complainants that this deed, which all the children of J. F. Huff joined in executing, was effectual to convey "all and singular the rights to the property" involved in this suit, which purports to have been conveyed or disposed of by the writing executed by J. F. Huff. And what right and interest in and to that property were conveyed by the written instrument last referred to must be ascertained from the language of that instrument itself. Considering the instrument in its entirety we are satisfied that it was the intention of the maker thereof to give to his wife all the property referred to therein, with authority to consume the entire property for her support, the corpus thereof as well as the income, and that the complainants in this case took no interest in the property, except one purely contingent upon there being a remainder of the property which had not been disposed of by Mrs. Martha Huff during her life. There are stronger grounds for holding that these complainants had only a contingent interest in this property than there was for a similar holding in the case of Darnell v. Barton, 75 Ga. 377. In that case it was said: "The sole point in this case turns on whether the husband or plaintiff in error took a vested remainder on the death of his ancestor under the will. The bequest is of 'all of my property, both real and personal, or whatsoever kind it may be, to my beloved wife, Jane Barton, for and during her natural life; and after the death of my said wife I direct that all remainder of my said property be sold by my executors and be equally divided among my children; and in the event that any of my children should die prior to the death of their said mother, leaving a child or children living, then I desire said child or children so left should stand in the place of its or their deceased parent, and heir a child's part; that is, the part that the deceased parent would have taken if living.' The husband of plaintiff in error was one of the sons of the testator, who died before his mother died, and left no child. We think that his interest in the remainder was contingent on his surviving his mother, or his children's doing so, if he had any, to take his share. Really the contingency is double. It is only the remainder or residue of the estate, not consumed by the wife of testator, which was to be sold by the executors, and the proceeds of that residue divided. At the mother's death, and not before, could the estate bequeathed in remainder be ascertained, so as to be sold and divided. The remainder was contingent on what the life tenant did not consume, and the executors of the will were then to ascertain it, sell it, and divide it. The thing itself bequeathed, therefore, is contingent on what was left by the widow."

It will be noted in the excerpt from the instrument quoted in the decision cited that the bequest of property to the legatee was followed by the expression "for and during her natural life," which does not occur in the instrument which we have under consideration in the present case. And in discussing the item of the will involved in Darnell's Case this court said, in the case of Hudgens v. Wilkins, 77 Ga. 555, after quoting that item of the will in full: "It was only what remained of personalty and realty of every sort of property that was to be sold and divided by the executors. It was only that left of the corpus that was then—at the death of the widow—undisposed of. It was only 'all the remainder of my said property' that was to be sold and divided. Nothing may have remained. The event of any remainder was uncertain. What the entirety left would be was uncertain. What each would get was thus equally uncertain. So that there was nothing to vest until the mother's death; nothing certain; not an item of property, and it could not vest until ascertained. To ascertain it the executors were to act; to sell it and divide it was devolved upon them; and it is inconceivable that the event of any remainder at all necessarily would happen. It is upon the uncertain contingency of such an event that any proceeds of any property would be subject to such sale and division by the executors."

It appearing from the petition that Mrs. Martha Huff during her life conveyed the property in controversy to the defendant in this case, and it not appearing therefrom that this conveyance was not made for the purpose of procuring a support for herself as contemplated in the deed of her husband, J. F. Huff, the petition showed on its face that the complainants had no title to the property which they sought to recover, and the court properly dismissed the petition on general demurrer.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

GEORGIA RY. & ELECTRIC CO. v.
TOMPKINS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 808*)—INJURIES FROM DEFECTS—LIABILITIES OF PERSONS CAUSING DEFECTS.

Where a street railway company, which owned land abutting on a public highway outside of the limits of a municipal corporation, for its own benefit and without permission from the proper authorities, as required by the statutes, and in violation thereof (Pen. Code 1910, §§ 543-545), dug up the highway and placed a catch-basin in it on the edge of the sidewalk, with a pipe leading therefrom across the street under the surface to another catch-basin, and then refilled the ditch, this was unlawful; and if a person legitimately passing over the catch-basin after its construction stepped in a hole in its covering and was injured, the railway company was liable for such injury, without the necessity for showing that the top of the catch-basin was negligently constructed, or that the company was negligent in causing or permitting a hole to exist therein, it not appearing that the injured person was wanting in ordinary care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1684-1687, 1690-1694; Dec. Dig. § 808.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 808*)—INJURIES FROM DEFECTS—LIABILITIES OF PERSONS CAUSING DEFECTS.

An owner of property abutting upon a street or highway is not, because of such ownership, liable for defects in such street or highway. But this rule does not relieve the owner of abutting property from liability, if he unlawfully places in the highway a structure which later gets in bad repair and causes injury to a passer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1684-1687, 1690-1694; Dec. Dig. § 808.*]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 55*)—COMPUTATION OF PERIOD—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION—LIMITATIONS APPLICABLE.

Suit for a personal injury caused by stepping into a hole in the top of such a catch-basin was not barred by the statute of limitations, because the basin was originally constructed four years before the suit was brought, where the person injured sued within less than two years from the time when the injury occurred.

(a) The statute of limitations applicable to the prosecution of a person who wrongfully obstructs or interferes with a highway has no application to a suit by one who suffers a personal injury by reason of the existence of a catch-basin so unlawfully built.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 299-306; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 808*)—INJURIES FROM DEFECTS—LIABILITY OF PERSONS CAUSING DEFECTS.

The evidence was not such as to require a reversal, under the contention that the verdict was unauthorized, because the evidence showed that the county authorities had assumed jurisdiction over the structure in question and had relieved the defendant from any duty in regard to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1684-1687, 1690-1694; Dec. Dig. § 808.*]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 759*)—TORTS—DEFECTS IN STREETS.

When the limits of the municipal corporation were extended, so as to include a part of a highway which had previously been beyond the limits, such part of the highway then became one of the public streets of the city, and the municipality became liable for failure to keep it in proper repair, as it would be for failure to repair its other streets.

(a) But, whether or not the municipality was liable on account of an injury occurring there, this did not operate to release from liability one who unlawfully placed in the highway before it became a street a catch-basin which caused a personal injury to a passer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1595-1600; Dec. Dig. § 759.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 818*)—INJURIES FROM DEFECTS—ACTIONS—ISSUES AND PROOF.

Allegations and proof as to the ownership by the defendant of abutting property, the situation of its tracks and station for passengers at that point, the digging of a ditch across the street, and the laying of a pipe connecting this with another catch-basin were competent, as showing the situation and surroundings, and that the defendant built the catch-basin for its own benefit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1726-1738; Dec. Dig. § 818.*]

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 818*)—INJURIES FROM DEFECTS—ACTIONS—ISSUES AND PROOF.

Evidence on the part of the city engineer that the construction of sewers came within the control of the engineering department of the city, and that such department had never had anything to do with the catch-basin in question, was admissible as tending to show that the city had never assumed or exercised control over such basin as a part of its drainage system.

(a) So, likewise, evidence of the chief of the sanitary department was admissible to show that such department cleaned the catch-basins in the city, and that they had never cleaned out the one in question. If his other evidence as to the practice in cleaning catch-basins rendered the admissibility of this doubtful, its admission would not require a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1726-1738; Dec. Dig. § 818.*]

8. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—ASSESSMENT—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

In a suit for a personal injury, where the nature and extent of the injury, and the character of the treatment administered, the services rendered by physicians, and the amount paid therefor were fully proved, a charge to the effect that the plaintiff, if entitled to recover would be entitled to recover such reasonable amount of physician's bills and necessary expenses incurred in consequence of the injury as might have been proved to the satisfaction of the jury, was not without evidence to support it, although no witness expressed the opinion that the charges were reasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 548-555; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

9. NEW TRIAL (§ 63*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—OBJECTIONS AT TRIAL.

Where there were two counts in the petition, and the verdict was in favor of the plaintiff, without stating on which count it was based, if this furnished any ground for objection to the verdict when returned, it was no cause for a new trial, in the absence of any such objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

10. REVERSAL NOT REQUIRED.

None of the other assignments of error require a reversal.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by H. C. Tompkins against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Colquitt & Conyers, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Jas. L. Key, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The Georgia Railway & Electric Company, without permission from the county authorities, constructed a catch-basin on the edge of a highway near the city of Atlanta, with a pipe running under the street to another catch-basin, and thence connecting with a drain. Afterwards the limits of Atlanta were extended, so that the highway at this point and the catch-basin were taken into the city. About four years after its construction, the plaintiff, while going to board a street car at night, stepped upon the covering of the catch-basin. At that time there was a hole in such covering, into which he stepped and was injured. He recovered a verdict, and after the refusal of a new trial the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. The digging up of the public highway and placing the catch-basin there, with its connecting pipe, without permission of the proper authorities, was unlawful. Pen. Code, §§ 543, 544, 545. The defendant, having placed the basin on the edge of the street or sidewalk to protect its own property from surface water, was liable for damages resulting therefrom. If it been placed there by permission of the proper authorities, the question of liability for injury would have depended on diligence or negligence in the manner of the construction or maintenance, if there were a duty to maintain. But if one unlawfully places such an obstruction or excavation in a public highway, he is not relieved from liability resulting therefrom by setting up that he exercised diligence in the manner of the creation and maintenance thereof. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 433; 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 1725; Congreve v. Morgan, 18 N. Y. 84, 72 Am. Dec. 495; 2 Elliott on Roads & Streets (3d Ed.) §§ 899, 902; Joyce on Nuisances, § 230. Note, also, the language of Penal Code, § 543, as to damages. The evidence did not require a finding that there was any want of ordinary care on the part of the person injured.

[2] 2. An owner of property abutting upon a street or highway is not, by virtue of being such owner, liable for defects in the street or highway. But this rule has no application where the owner of abutting property creates a defect in a street or highway or a nuisance therein. In the latter event he is liable, not because he owns the abutting property, but because he creates or maintains the thing from which injury results.

[3] 3. It was contended that if the placing of the catch-basin at that point was without authority when it was constructed, about four years had elapsed from that time until the suit was brought, that the defendant was not shown to have taken any further action after the construction was completed, and that a suit for an injury arising from such construction was barred by the statute of limitations. Inasmuch as the plaintiff was not hurt until 1908, and therefore had no cause of action until that time, and brought suit within less than two years after his cause of action arose, it is not easy to see how such cause of action was barred because the original construction of the catch-basin occurred two or three years before the injury. If the plaintiff had a cause of action arising from a personal injury to him, it could not well be barred before it arose, and it was not barred afterward. If the construction of the catch-basin in the highway by the defendant for its own benefit, without permission of the authorities, was the creation of a nuisance, injury from the maintenance of a nuisance furnishes ground for recovery, as well as injury arising from its original creation. No formality is necessary to maintain a nuisance. If it is kept or continued, when it should have been abated, it is maintained. That the defendant was not proved to have had work done at this place after constructing the catch-basin and before the injury does not suffice to show that it did not maintain the basin. In fact, the defendant's agent directed that the catch-basin be repaired after the injury. Though this was not admissible as evidence of negligence, it tended to show an assertion of control over and maintenance of the structure, even after the plaintiff was injured. City Council of Augusta v. Marks, 124 Ga. 365, 52 S. E. 539; Wood on Nuisances, § 865; 29 Cyc. 1260.

The limitation of actions as to a continuing nuisance affecting the value of property cannot be applied to a case like this, where no injury arose to the person of the plaintiff at once upon the construction of the basin, but by its existence at the time when he was hurt. Likewise the statute of limitations applicable to the prosecution of a person who wrongfully obstructs or interferes with a highway has no application to a suit by one who suffers a personal injury by reason of the structure.

[4] 4. It was contended that the evidence showed that the county authorities had assumed jurisdiction over this basin after its erection, and had relieved the defendant from any duty in regard to it, and that the verdict was unauthorized. We cannot concur in this contention. The mere fact that the county or municipal authorities did not promptly require the plaintiff to remove the basin as a nuisance did not necessarily operate to accept it as a part of the public works. Whether it might have any evidential value is not the question. Nor do we think that the other evidence relied on for that purpose was sufficient to support the contention of the defendant.

[5] 5. When the limits of the city of Atlanta were so extended as to include the highway at that point, it became one of the public streets of the city, and the municipality became liable for failing to keep it in proper repair, as it would be for failing to repair other streets. It was contended that this duty on the part of the municipality relieved the defendant from any duty or liability on account of the catch-basin. This contention is not sound. Whether or not the city is liable for permitting a nuisance to exist in one of its streets, or permitting one of them to be in bad repair, this furnishes no relief to a person who creates the nuisance or puts the streets in bad repair. The possible liability of the city does not exculpate one who unlawfully places in the highway that which causes an injury to a passer. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 1727; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 433.

The argument that, if one cuts up a suburban tract of land into lots and streets, or lays a sidewalk on a country road, and the place where this is done is subsequently taken into the corporate limits of a city, the municipality becomes liable for failure to keep it in repair, and the person making the plat or laying the sidewalk is not liable on account of a bad condition which may arise therein, is not applicable to this case. The authorities cited, on those subjects, have reference to a case where the original act was lawful, and the injury involved resulted from subsequent negligence on the part of the municipality or others.

It was urged that the defendant, having put down the catch-basin and the drain, could not take it up or alter it without permission, and therefore it could not be held liable for not doing so. The sufficient answer to this proposition is that the defendant has made no effort to do so, with or without permission. If one should dig a hole in the middle of a city street and erect a post there without authority, it would furnish no argument against his liability for injuries resulting therefrom that, if he undertook to dig up the street in order to get the post out of the way without permission, he would again violate some law. This would lead to the position that, if one can get a nuisance erected in a street, he can keep it there without liability for damages by saying that he would have to dig up the street to get it out, and that he would have to ask the permission of the municipal authorities to dig up the street.

[6] 6. It was contended that the ownership by the defendant of abutting property, the situation of its tracks and station for passengers at that point, the digging of the ditch across the street, and the laying of a pipe connecting this with another catch-basin were irrelevant matters, and that the allegations on the subject should have been stricken, and the evidence rejected. Such allegations and evidence were proper to show the situation and surroundings, and that the defendant built the catch-basin for its own benefit.

[7] 7. Objection was made to evidence on the part of the city engineer that the construction of sewers came within the control of his department, and that such municipal department never had anything to do with the catch-basin in question. This evidence was admissible, in connection with that showing that no permission to do the work was originally obtained. It tended to prove that the city, through its officials dealing with matters of sewers and drains, never assumed or exercised jurisdiction over this particular catch-basin, by dealing with it in any way, so as to recognize it as a part of the municipal drainage, or authorize the defendant to assume that it had thus been taken over by the city.

The evidence of the chief of the sanitary department was also admitted, over objection, to show that that department had a force of men who cleaned catch-basins in the city, and that he did not think they ever cleaned out the catch-basin in question. This was admissible for the same reason. If its admissibility was rendered doubtful by the statement of the witness that he did not know there was no sewer there on that street in 1903, and that they never cleaned out catch-basins except where there was a sewer, the admission of the evidence would not cause a reversal.

[8] 8. The presiding judge charged that the plaintiff, if entitled to recover, would be entitled to recover such reasonable amount of physician's bills and the necessary expenses incurred in consequence of the injury as might have been proved to the satisfaction of the jury. It was urged that this charge was without foundation in the evidence, because there was no proof that the amount of the physician's bills was reasonable or necessary, or what was the value of the services. As to this point counsel cited Allen v. Harris, 113 Ga. 107, 38 S. E. 322, and So. Ry. Co. v. Williams, 113 Ga. 335, 38 S. E. 744. In the first of those cases it was held that evidence of what was paid for professional services is not, without more, sufficient proof of their value. From the decision it seems that the only proof introduced in support of two items of damages recovered, on account of bad faith or stubborn litigiousness on the part of the defendant, was that the plaintiff paid a surveyor $3 for surveying a lot intended to be described in the deed which it was sought to have reformed, and paid his attorney $200 for bringing and prosecuting the case. It was said that it might have been legitimate to show what was actually paid for the services, but this alone was not sufficient to establish that such services were worth the amount contracted to be paid or actually paid therefor. In the second case above cited it was held that, while proof of the cost of an article or thing is not a criterion of its value, yet such evidence is admissible as a circumstance in an inquiry instituted to ascertain the value. In the present case there was proof of the amount of expenses incurred and paid by the plaintiff for treatment on account of the injury. But the evidence did not stop there. The physicians who attended him were introduced, and described the nature of the injury, the treatment given to him, and the nature and extent of the services rendered.

In Baker v. Richmond City Mill Works, 105 Ga. 225, 31 S. E. 426, it was held that jurors, in passing upon the testimony of an expert witness as to the value of professional services, are not absolutely bound by his opinion, but may exercise their own judgment on the subject, taking into consideration the nature of the services, the time required to perform them, and all the attendant circumstances. This ruling has since been followed. Jennings v. Stripling, 127 Ga. 778, 784, 56 S. E. 1026. If the jury are not bound by the opinion evidence, but may put their own estimate upon the value of the services, in view of their nature and character and the attendant circumstances, it cannot be said there is nothing on which they may base a verdict, or on which the judge may base a charge, if the nature of the injury, the character of the services rendered, and the amount paid therefor are all proved, but there is a mere omission on the part of a witness to say that he thinks the amount was reasonable.

[9] 9. It was contended that there were two counts in the petition, and that the verdict did not show on which one it was based. If there would have been any merit in this as an original proposition, the defendant was not shown to have made any objection to the verdict when returned, or to have invoked any ruling of the court on the subject. Dalton v. Drake, 75 Ga. 115 (2).

[10] 10. There were various other assignments of error, distributed through 30 grounds of demurrer and 22 grounds of the motion for a new trial. What has been said above disposes of the most substantial questions raised. As to the others not specifically mentioned, it is sufficient to say that they require neither discussion nor a reversal.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

DARSEY v. DARSEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 141*)—DIRECTING VERDICT—UNDISPUTED EVIDENCE.

Under undisputed evidence, and admissions contained in the plaintiff's petition, the verdict in favor of the defendant being demanded, the judge did not err in directing it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 336; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1047*)—REVIEW—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

Evidence admitted over objection by the plaintiff, or that which was offered by the plaintiff and excluded, in view of the admissions in the petition and other uncontradicted evidence, would not have affected the result announced in the first headnote, and accordingly it is unnecessary to pass on any assignments of error based on rulings as to the admissibility of evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4132, 4133, 4146-4152; Dec. Dig. § 1047.*]

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by Lizzie Darsey against Rebecca Darsey and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

On October 21, 1902, Mrs. Lizzie Darsey instituted suit against Mrs. Rebecca Darsey, George E. Darsey, L. O. (Oscar) Darsey, and others, who were children and heirs at law of Jesse R. Darsey, who died in 1899, for the recovery of lot of land No. 26 in the Twenty-Second district of Decatur county, Ga., and seeking also a decree "setting up, establishing, and confirming" the plaintiff's title to the land above mentioned, "and forever barring and annulling all claims that may be urged by any of the aforesaid heirs of Jesse Darsey * * * to said land by reason of their inheritance from their father." On the trial the judge directed a verdict in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff's motion for a new trial was overruled, and she excepted. The plaintiff, Jesse R. Darsey (under whom the defendants claimed by inheritance), and Mrs. Arenzi Daniel (née Darsey) were sisters and brother, and constituted all of the heirs at law of their father, Jesse Darsey, who died intestate in 1865, prior to July. After his death the lands of his estate were divided in kind by allotment on July 21, 1865, between the three heirs above named. At that time the two daughters, Lizzie and Arenzi, were married, the former to John F. Darsey and the latter to Robert Daniel. The lands which were to be divided were appraised by five disinterested persons and drawn for by the parties at interest. In this allotment Jesse R. Darsey (under whom the defendants claim by inheritance, and who died in 1899) drew the lot in dispute, and also lots 193 and 194 in the Eleventh district of Mitchell county. Lot No. 25 in the Twenty-Second district of Decatur county, and one-half of lot No. 385 in the Nineteenth district of Decatur county, constituting the home place of Jesse Darsey, deceased, were drawn by plaintiff, or her husband, John F. Darsey, and they thereafter, until December, 1865, resided on the property so drawn. Other lots unnecessary to mention were drawn by the remaining heir, Arenzi Daniel, or her husband, Robert Daniel. At the time of the allotment deeds were executed. Lizzie Darsey and Arenzi Daniel were not named as parties thereto, but their respective husbands were named as parties. Among the deeds so executed was one dated July 21, 1865, by which Robert Daniel and Jesse R. Darsey conveyed to John F. Darsey lot No. 25 and the east half of lot No. 385 in Decatur county, representing the allotment to Lizzie Darsey. The consideration named was $1,058.33. Another of such deeds bore the same date and recited the same consideration; but it was executed by Robert Daniel and John F. Darsey, and conveyed to Jesse R. Darsey lot No. 26 (the land in dispute), and also lots 193 and 194 in the Eleventh district of Mitchell county. Immediately after this allotment Jesse R. Darsey expressed a preference for lot No. 25 and the east half of lot No. 385, which had been drawn by Mrs. Lizzie Darsey and her husband, and a verbal agreement was entered into by which this land was to go to Jesse R. Darsey in exchange for the whole or some part of the land which had been allotted to Mrs. Lizzie Darsey, or her husband, John Darsey. No deeds were executed between them evidencing this exchange, but Jesse R. Darsey in pursuance of the trade took possession of lot No. 25 and the east half of lot 385, and continued thereafter to maintain his possession; and Mrs. Lizzie Darsey and her husband, John Darsey, about December 1, 1865, moved to Mitchell county and took possession of lots 193 and 194, which had been allotted to Jesse Darsey. They continued in possession for about four years, and sold the property to John P. Heath for $2,250. Lot No. 26 in Decatur county, at the time of the allotment, and for a number of years thereafter, was wild land, and not in the actual possession of anybody; but in 1888 or 1889, before the death of Jesse R. Darsey, a house was erected thereon, a farm cleared, and other valuable improvements made, and the house was occupied by L. O. (Oscar) Darsey, one of the defendants in this case, and subsequently by his tenants or those claiming with or under him up to the time of the filing of the suit.

All that has been stated has been admitted by both sides, except as follows: It was contended by the plaintiff that in so far as her husband, John F. Darsey, participated in the allotment and exchange with Jesse R. Darsey, and the subsequent management of the property received in exchange, he did so as her agent, and all that he did in that connection was her act and deed, and also that the possession of lot 26, which commenced before the death of her brother, Jesse R. Darsey, was by her permission as accommodation to her brother, and not under any adverse claim of right. On the other hand, it was contended by the defendants that all that John F. Darsey did was in behalf of himself as by assertion of his marital rights to the property inherited by his wife, and that lot 26 in Decatur county was not included in the exchange of lots, but that Jesse R. Darsey had retained and continuously asserted title to it, and that the entry of possession in 1888 or 1889 was by right of his title, and in no manner under the plaintiff; also that the possession last mentioned was commenced by two of the defendants, George E. Darsey and L. O. Darsey, under an agreement with their father, J. R. Darsey, by which, if they entered possession, and made certain valuable improvements, and occupied the land for a certain number of years, the land should be theirs, and that the terms of such agreement had been complied with by George E. and L. O. Darsey; and thereupon it was sought to have the title decreed to be in George E. and L. O. Darsey, and, if that could not be done, then to all of the defendants.

Hawes, Pottle & Wright, of Blakely, for plaintiff in error. M. E. O'Neal, of Bainbridge, and Pope & Bennett, of Albany, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. According to the case as made by the plaintiff, the following facts appear: Jesse Darsey died, leaving certain real estate. On July 1, 1865, there was an agreed division or partition among his heirs. One of these was Jesse R. Darsey, and another was his sister, the present plaintiff, Lizzie Darsey, the wife of John Darsey. Deeds were made by the respective tenants in common for the purpose of carrying into effect the partition thus made. As to the share which fell to the plaintiff, the other tenants in common made a deed to John Darsey, and he and the plaintiff went into possession of the land so conveyed, and remained in possession until December 1, 1865. This, under the law as existing prior to the act of 1866 (Acts 1866, p. 146), known as the "Married Woman's Act," operated to put the title to the share which fell to the plaintiff into her husband, and it became his absolutely by virtue of his marital rights and of such conveyance and dominion. Code of 1861, §§ 1701, 1702; Arnold v. Limeburger, 122 Ga. 72, 49 S. E. 812. The share which fell to Jesse R. Darsey included two lots in Mitchell county, and lot 26 in Decatur county, the lot now in dispute. A deed was made to him, which was signed by John Darsey and Robert Daniel, the husbands of the other two tenants in common. According to the plaintiff's allegation and proof, on the day when the partition was made, a parol agreement was made with her brother, Jesse R. Darsey, by which there was to be an "exchange of shares," so that the share which was allotted to the plaintiff, and which passed to her husband, as above stated, should go to Jesse R. Darsey, and the part which was allotted to him, and conveyed to him, as above stated, should be transferred to plaintiff. After the marital rights of John Darsey had fully attached to the share allotted to the plaintiff, she had no interest whatever in it. The plaintiff contends that this share was delivered to her brother, Jesse R. Darsey, in lieu of the share allotted to him in the division. Her husband was present, and either made the trade or certainly took part in making it, so that, according to her own showing, it was in law an exchange between her husband and her brother, whether she took part in the negotiations or not. No trust was shown, and no creation of a separate estate. This would not serve any title in her to that which was exchanged by her brother for the property of her husband. According to the basis on which her claim rests, she acquired nothing by the exchange. If any equitable title arose from it, it was in her husband, not in her. After December 1, 1865, she and her husband took possession of the two lots in Mitchell county, which had formed a part of her brother's share in the partition of the estate. Lot 26 in Decatur county, the land in dispute, was wild land, and nobody had actual possession of it. She exercised no dominion over it, paid no taxes upon it, and did nothing to assert, much less create, title to it herself. Her testimony indicated that the taxes were paid by her brother, Jesse R. Darsey.

The defendants are the widow and children of Jesse R. Darsey. They contend that in the partition of the estate lot 26 fell to his share. They deny that it was included in the trade under which plaintiff asserts title, but contend that the two lots in Mitchell county alone were included, and that Jesse R. Darsey retained the title to the lot now in dispute, which was acquired by virtue of the partition. If the contention of the defendants is true, and the lot in dispute was never traded by Jesse R. Darsey at all, of course the plaintiff would have no case, and would not be entitled to recover. Nor would she have title or be entitled to recover if the lot was included in the trade, because the property traded to Jesse R. Darsey, constituting the consideration paid to Jesse R. Darsey for the property in dispute, was the property of John Darsey, and no deed was ever made to plaintiff. If John Darsey did not make the trade alone, as some of the plaintiff's testimony indicates, but they negotiated together, this would not alone serve to put any title in the plaintiff. John Darsey is not shown ever to have done anything to relinquish his rights, or to convey any rights to plaintiff. Therefore, in either event, whether the contention of the defendants or that arising from the pleadings and evidence of the plaintiff be correct, the latter has no title, legal or equitable, to the land in dispute. In the evidence of the plaintiff there are some loose and vague expressions that Oscar Darsey, one of the defendants, moved on the land with her consent and permission; but immediately thereafter she testified that she did not have any conversation of any kind with Oscar Darsey relative to his possession of the property at the time he went upon it, and never said anything at all about it until he was going to sell it, "and I put in my claim and tried to explain it, but could not make any agreement relative to it." She also used certain expressions to the effect that "we were not going to charge him for the land," etc. Apparently this referred to herself and her husband. Inasmuch as she had no title to the land, as has been shown above, her consent or agreement was unnecessary. If John Darsey had title to the land, and consented, this would not make Oscar Darsey the plaintiff's tenant, or Oscar Darsey's possession the plaintiff's possession; and if John Darsey conferred with the plaintiff in regard to the management of his property, and she acquiesced, especially in view of the fact that he had acquired the property by reason of his marital rights, it amounted to nothing more than a conference between husband and wife. Taking her testimony as a whole, it makes no case of tenancy or permissive holding by the plaintiff, requiring a submission of the case to the jury.

Under the views above expressed, had the evidence objected to by plaintiff been excluded, or that which was offered by her and excluded been admitted, the result would not have been affected.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

2. DAMAGES (§ 142*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—NOMINAL DAMAGES.

In an action on a contract to recover for breach thereof, where special damages were alleged, plaintiff could not recover nominal damages, where neither nominal nor general damages were sought.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by A. L. Green against M. C. Morris. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. V. Pool, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. W. S. Dillon and Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. Green sued Morris for damages for breach of contract. The substance of the petition, now material, was as follows: Plaintiff, defendant, and another person, who was the inventor and owner of a device for the construction of automobiles, but who was without financial means of placing the same on the market, entered into a parol agreement to organize a corporation capitalized at $100,000, for the purpose of manufacture, sale, etc., of automobiles, and doing a general automobile business. Under the agreement, each of the three parties was to receive $17,000 worth of stock, and the plaintiff and defendant were to furnish the money for the purpose of organizing the corporation and placing the automobiles on the market. A charter was to be applied for, and the corporation organized at once. Plaintiff, "relying and acting on the terms of the contract as above set forth," spent several weeks traveling about endeavoring to interest the public in the proposed corporation, and succeeded in getting a number of persons interested therein, who were ready and willing to take stock in the corporation as soon as it could be chartered and organized. The time and service of plaintiff while so engaged were worth $200. Plaintiff, "realizing that [the defendant] and himself were without sufficient funds to successfully organize and operate said concern beneficially to themselves and others who might take stock in the company when chartered and put in operation, * * * decided to sell one-half of his interest, which would be $8,500." Another person offered to trade to plaintiff $5,000 worth of stock in another named company for one-half of plaintiff's interest in said business, which was 85 shares, which proposition plaintiff accepted. Defendant, upon learning of such trade between plaintiff and such other person, informed the latter that "plaintiff had no interest in the said business" with the defendant, and that neither plaintiff nor the party with whom he had so traded should ever have any interest therein. Plaintiff "was ready and willing and anxious to apply for a charter for said company, to organize and begin business at once, according to the terms of the contract previously made between" the defendant himself and the other party thereto; but the defendant "refused to go ahead and organize the said company." The statement made by the defendant to the person with whom the plaintiff had traded for the $5,000 worth of stock in the other company prevented the trade from being consummated, whereby the plaintiff lost $5,000, the value of the stock he was to receive. The defendant refused to permit plaintiff to have any interest in the business for which the corporation was to be organized, but with several named persons the defendant organized the corporation himself, investing therein $4,000, and subsequently selling out his interest for $10,000. By reason of the facts alleged, defendant has damaged the plaintiff $13,750. The petition was dismissed on general demurrer, and the plaintiff excepted.

[1] It does not appear that plaintiff paid anything toward organizing the corporation and placing the automobiles on the market, although under the terms of the contract he and the defendant were to furnish the money for such purpose. Indeed, it appears from the petition that plaintiff and defendant were without sufficient funds to successfully organize and operate the contemplated corporation. The petition alleges that, in order to raise funds for the purpose of organizing the corporation, plaintiff sold half of his interest therein to one who owned stock in another corporation, and was to receive in payment of his half interest $5,000 worth of stock in such other corporation. It appears, however, that the plaintiff had no interest in the business for the transaction of which the corporation was to be organized, for the reason that he had contributed nothing towards such business, no corporation had been formed, and, of course, he could have no stock therein. While it is alleged that plaintiff spent several weeks in endeavoring to induce other people to take stock in the contemplated corporation, and that his time and services in so doing were worth a given sum, it does not appear, from the terms of the contract set out in the petition, that he was under any obligation to perform such services.

[2] The suit was for damages in the sum of $13,750, which sum was evidently made up of the $5,000 which plaintiff alleged he lost by reason of the defendant breaking up the trade by which plaintiff was to obtain $5,000 worth of stock in another company, and the amount of $8,500, which was the value of half of the $17,000 of stock which plaintiff was to have in the business to be incorporated, which half interest he would retain after paying for the $5,000 worth of such other stock. As we have already intimated, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for such damages; nor was he entitled to recover nominal damages, for the reason that neither nominal nor general damages were sought to be recovered. Hadden v. Sou. Messenger Service, 135 Ga. 372, 69 S. E. 480. It follows that the court did not err in dismissing the petition on general demurrer.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SIMMONS v. THOMPSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 461*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

D. A. Thompson owned a tract of land in the town of Covington, and carved out of it several parcels fronting south on Conyers street. One of these was sold to W. B. Lee. Subsequently the most easterly parcel, which bordered easterly on New street, was sold to W. R. Ingram; the deed describing the property as follows: "All that tract or parcel of land lying and being in the city of Covington, Newton county, state of Georgia, known as lot No. 9 in a survey of D. A. Thompson's land, made by J. M. Heiger, fronting on Conyers street 100 feet, and running back north 220 feet, more or less, until the back line comes even with W. B. Lee's lot, bounded on the south by Conyers street, west by lands of D. A. Thompson, north by D. A. Thompson, east by New street, 33 feet wide, which said street is to be kept open as far back as Ingram's lot runs at least." Held, the descriptive words "running back north 220 feet, more or less, until the back line comes even with W. B. Lee's lot," are ambiguous, and subject to be explained by parol evidence, in an action of complaint for land between Thompson and his remote grantee.

2. EJECTMENT (§§ 64, 111*)—PLEADING—VERDICT.

In a suit for the recovery of land, the petition should describe the land with such accuracy that, if a general verdict is found for the plaintiff, a writ of possession may issue based on such description. If the evidence authorizes a recovery for a part of the land included in the description, the verdict should likewise describe the land recovered with sufficient accuracy. In the present case the petition described the land for which suit was brought in a vague and indefinite manner. Three amendments were made to it, but all of them were filed on the same day, and it cannot be determined with certainty from the record in what order they were made. They varied the description of the land in dispute, though themselves subject to criticism as to definiteness. The verdict was generally in favor of the plaintiff. The evidence did not authorize a recovery based on any description made in the petition or the amendments, as a whole. The verdict did not describe any particular part of the land included in such description, so as to adjust it to the evidence. Held, that a new trial must be granted.

DECISION OF SUPREME COURT CONTROLLING.

The only question raised by the record, relied upon by the plaintiff in error, was as to the constitutionality of the statute under which the indictment was framed. Acts 1903, p. 90; Penal Code, § 715. This question having been certified by this court to the Supreme Court, the case is fully controlled by the answer of that court, in the opinion handed down August 12, 1912 (138 Ga. 489, 75 S. E. 619), and accordingly the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

This is the third appearance of this case before this court. First, it was here on exceptions to the overruling of a demurrer and the allowance of an amendment to the petition; and this court held that the petition set out a cause of action. News Publishing Co. v. Lowe, 8 Ga. App. 333, 69 S. E. 123. Second, it was here on exceptions to a judgment awarding a nonsuit; and this court reversed that judgment, it being held that the plaintiff proved his case as laid, and that the alleged publication was prima facie libelous. Lowe v. News Publishing Co., 9 Ga. App. 103, 70 S. E. 607. It is now here for the purpose of having the trial of the case reviewed on the facts, on exception to the judgment overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial. A careful examination of the record shows that the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff entitled him to recover damages for the libel, and that the evidence in behalf of the defendant was material only on the question of mitigation of damages. The motion for new trial contains several objections to excerpts from the charge. These excerpts, considered in connection with the charge as a whole and in the light of the issues raised by the evidence, are without material error. No prejudicial error of law appears, substantial justice was reached by the verdict, and the litigation should end.

1. PARTIES (§ 7*)—ACTIONS BY TRUSTEE OR ASSIGNEE.

A trustee or assignee, who holds the legal title of choses in action under a valid deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, can sue to recover the amount of an account included in the deed of assignment, for the use of one who purchased the account at a public sale held by him as such trustee or assignee. The legal title to the account as a chose in action is in the trustee or assignee, and the equitable interest is in the purchaser of the account.

Error from City Court of Sandersville; E. W. Jordan, Judge.

Action by W. A. McCarty, for use of A. C. Harrison, against J. Q. May. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. E. Hyman, of Sandersville, for plaintiff in error. Evans & Evans, of Sandersville, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Brown & Co. sued J. Q. May for the sum of $97.65, alleged to be due on account. The plaintiffs insisted that they gave a check to May for this amount, which May wanted to pay on insurance premiums, and that May never paid back the sum so advanced. May admitted that they gave him the check for that sum, for the purpose stated; but he testified that he paid them the cash for the check when he received it. After the suit was filed, Brown & Co. failed in business, and made a written assignment to W. A. McCarty, for the benefit of their creditors, and McCarty accepted the trust, and proceeded, as such trustee or assignee, to liquidate the business, and, in pursuance of the deed, sold at public sale all the accounts and choses in action of Brown & Co., and A. C. Harrison became the purchaser thereof. The books of account and choses in action, including the account against May, were delivered to Harrison by McCarty, but no written transfer or assignment was made by McCarty to Harrison. During the trial an amendment was allowed, without objection, striking the names of Brown & Co. as plaintiffs, and substituting as plaintiff W. A. McCarty, as trustee, suing for the use of A. C. Harrison. A verdict was rendered for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepts to the judgment overruling his motion for a new trial.

[1] 1. The plaintiff in error insists that there was no evidence of any written transfer or assignment of the account to Harrison, and therefore no proof of his ownership. The rule is that transfers of accounts must be in writing. Civil Code 1910, § 3653; Swann-Davis Co. v. Stanton, 7 Ga. App. 668, 67 S. E. 888; Turk v. Cook, 63 Ga. 681. We do not think that this principle is pertinent or controlling, under the facts in the instant case. It is admitted that McCarty, as trustee or assignee, held the legal title to the choses in action by a valid instrument in writing. This title was still in him at the time the suit was filed, since he had not made any written transfer thereof to Harrison; but Harrison bought at the public sale, and the equitable title was in him. Suit must be brought by one who holds the legal title, for the benefit of the one who holds the beneficial interest; and so McCarty, as the holder of this legal title, was suing for the use of Harrison, who held the equitable title. This was in accordance with the statute. Civil Code 1910, § 5516. Brown & Co. having made a deed of assignment to McCarty, they could not sue, and Harrison, the purchaser at the sale made by McCarty, trustee, could not sue, because he held only the beneficial interest. The legal title was in McCarty, and the suit could only have been brought by him. May was bound to pay to the one who held the legal title, who, under the evidence, was McCarty, the nominal plaintiff.

[3] 2. The next ground insisted upon by the plaintiff in error is that the court erred in admitting in evidence the ledger and cash book kept by Brown & Co. These books were admitted, not as primary evidence, but for the purpose of corroborating the evidence of Brown. Brown & Co. kept a clerk, but Brown testified that he gave the check in question to May, and that he knew that these books and this account were correct; and, besides, under the evidence, the cash book was clearly a book of original entries, and admissible. The books were admissible under the rulings of this court in Bush v. Fourcher, 3 Ga. App. 43, 59 S. E. 459.

[2] 3. The only real issue in the case was that of payment. Brown testified that he advanced the money sued for, by a check given to May, and that May had never paid the debt. May admitted getting the check, but testified that he paid the money at the time he received the check. The jury believed Brown's evidence, and the trial judge approved the verdict. In the absence of material or prejudicial error of law, the judgment refusing another trial must be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

EXPRESS COMPANIES—LIABILITIES.

In view of the ruling of the Supreme Court in answer to questions certified to it by this court (138 Ga. 443, 75 S. (Syllabus by the Court.)1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 880)—PROCEEDINGS TO TRANSFER CAUSE—APPEAL BOND.

Where a lien had been foreclosed, and personal property levied upon, and a claim interposed, and the property left by the levying officer in the possession of the defendant, upon the giving of a forthcoming bond, and subsequently the claimant appealed from an adverse judgment to the superior court, and the surety on the appeal bond was the same person as the surety on the forthcoming bond, there was no error in dismissing the appeal, on the ground that there was no sufficient appeal bond given. One who is surety on the forthcoming bond in a claim case cannot be surety on an appeal bond entered by the claimant, as in such case the plaintiff in execution would not, by the giving of the appeal bond, obtain additional security. The case is fully controlled by the decisions in Woodliff v. Bloodworth, 121 Ga. 456, 49 S. E. 289, and Hines v. International Harvester Company, 7 Ga. App. 364, 66 S. E. 989.

Lipscomb, Willingham & Wright and Nathan Harris, all of Rome, for plaintiff in error. Eubanks & Mebane, of Rome, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The suit was brought in the city court of Floyd county, and was returnable to the June term, 1911. In due time for this term the deputy sheriff of Floyd county made a proper entry of personal service on the petition. At the appearance term the defendant filed a motion to dismiss the petition, alleging that the service was invalid, because it was made upon him in Chattooga county, where the deputy sheriff of Floyd county was without authority to make such service. On the filing of this motion the judge, without hearing any evidence in support of the traverse of the entry of service, passed an order in which, after reciting that it appeared that the service was perfected beyond the limits of Floyd county, Ga., and in the county of Chattooga, he directed that the defendant be again served with a copy of the petition and process, and that it be returnable to the September term of the city court of Floyd county. In compliance with the foregoing order, the clerk of the court attached new process to the petition, returnable to the September term of the court, and personal service was made upon the defendant by the deputy sheriff. No traverse was made as to this entry of service. The motion to dismiss the petition on the grounds stated was filed August 16, 1911, and on the same day the defendant filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, based on the ground that he was a nonresident of the county of Floyd, and lived in the county of Chattooga; and on August 18, 1911, he filed a general demurrer to the petition. On March 21, 1912, after argument, the court sustained the traverse to the service of the petition, vacated the entry and the process, and dismissed the suit, and the plaintiff excepts to this judgment.

It is first insisted by the plaintiff that the entry of service made by the deputy sheriff of Floyd county was sufficient to put the burden of proving the ground of the traverse on the defendant, and that, without such proof, the order passed on August 19, 1911, sustaining the traverse and ordering the clerk to attach process returnable to the September term, was unauthorized. It may be true that the sheriff's entry was sufficient prima facie; but the defendant took no exception to the order of the court sustaining the traverse without evidence, but substantially accepted the benefit of the order, and he cannot now be heard to contest it.

It is next said by the plaintiff that the judge fully adjudicated the exception to the process when he sustained the traverse filed August 10, 1911, and that the question was res judicata, and that he had no jurisdiction to enter the subsequent order dismissing the petition on March 21, 1911. This position would unquestionably be sound if the judge had authority to pass the order on August 19th, requiring that a second process be made returnable to a subsequent term. Section 5570 of the Civil Code of 1910, provides that, "whenever process is not served the length of time required by law before the appearance term, such service shall be good for the next succeeding term thereafter, which shall be the appearance term." If, therefore, the traverse of the original service had been sustained on the ground that the service was made too late, the order directing that additional service be made would clearly have been within the purview of the authority of the court, and the case would simply have stood returnable to the September term.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error called attention to the fact that, before the traverse was made to this second process, the defendant had appeared and filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, and had also filed a general demurrer, which was equivalent to a waiver of all defects in the process. The view that we take of this case, under the admitted facts of record as herein stated, is that the order passed on August 19th, directing that additional process be made upon the defendant, was a mere nullity, that it did not displace the traverse filed by the defendant, and that the subsequent appearance of the defendant to the filing of this traverse did not constitute any waiver of his right to insist upon the ground of the traverse; and the judgment of the court sustaining the traverse being unexcepted to by the defendant, assuming (as the court necessarily did in passing the order) that the ground of the traverse was true, it necessarily followed that the deputy sheriff of the county of Floyd, where the suit was pending, had no authority to make service of the process and petition on the defendant in the county of Chattooga, and the service was invalid.

For the reasons stated, we think that the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed. Hood v. Powers, 57 Ga. 244; Peck v. La Roche, 86 Ga. 314, 12 S. E. 638.

FLINN. (No. 4,066.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

The first, second, third, fourth, and fifth grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial are only amplifications of the general grounds of the motion, and raise no other question than that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, and is therefore contrary to law. The evidence was in sharp conflict on the controlling issue of fact, and cannot be disturbed by this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3935-3937; Dec. Dig. § 1002.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 52*)—GROUNDS—IRREGULARITIES—RENDITION OF VERDICT.

The sixth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial assigns error because the verdict is not unanimous; one of the jurors having stated to the court that the verdict was not his verdict. In a note to this ground the trial judge states that no request was made to poll the jury, that, when the case was submitted to the jury the previous night, it was agreed by counsel for both parties that, if the jury found a verdict during the night, they could disperse, and that the verdict should be retained by the foreman and received in court the next morning. The jury reached a verdict during the night and dispersed. Next morning the foreman handed the verdict to the clerk, who published it, and the jury were discharged.

A few minutes thereafter one of the jurors stated to the judge privately that he did not want to agree to the verdict, and only did so because he did not want to remain in the jury room all night. Held, there was no error in the refusal of the judge to reassemble the jury for further consideration of the case.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 303*)—RECORD—QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 278*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—CARE REQUIRED—QUESTION FOR JURY.

While, generally, a railroad company's employees in charge of a passenger train are not required to physically assist passengers to alight therefrom, yet in a particular case there may be circumstances which impose such a duty. And where a passenger is an old woman, incumbered with the care of four children, nine, seven, five, and three years of age, respectively, and one of them is sick, and the passenger thus incumbered requests the assistance of the conductor in changing cars, it is a question for a jury to determine whether a failure to render such assistance under these circumstances amounted to actionable negligence. Georgia Railroad Co. v. Rives, 137 Ga. 376, 73 S. E. 645, and citations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1080, 1081; Dec. Dig. § 278.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 277*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—ACTION FOR INJURIES—DAMAGES.

An aged woman passenger, in charge of four small children, one of whom was sick, was compelled to change cars in order to reach her destination. When the conductor examined her ticket she informed him of her burdens and requested him to assist her in making the change of cars at the proper station. This he promised to do. When this station was reached, neither the conductor nor any other employee of the railroad company rendered her any assistance in changing cars as she had requested. When she disembarked from the car in which she had been traveling, she asked the conductor, who was standing near, to indicate to her the proper car for her to take, and the conductor, in compliance with her request, directed her to a car, lighted and filled with passengers, which she, without assistance, boarded with her four children. When she had traveled some distance on this car, the same conductor, who had previously examined her ticket and had been informed of her situation and destination, again appeared for the purpose of taking up her ticket, and informed her that she had gotten aboard another car of the same train from which she had disembarked. The conductor then stated to her that he would put her off at the next station and would furnish her transportation back to the point of change for her destination. The conductor did put her off at the next station, but did not furnish her with any transportation. She was refused tickets back to the point where it was necessary for her to change cars to reach her destination. There was no train of cars returning to the point of change until late in the evening, and she was compelled to remain all day and until 11 o'clock at night at the depot where she had been put off by the conductor, incumbered with her children, and without any assistance, and thereby suffered great inconvenience, physical discomfort, and mental anguish. On proof of the above facts she recovered a verdict for $150. Held: (a) The verdict was fully authorized; and, even if regarded as nominal damages, it was not excessive. (b) The measure of damages which she was entitled to recover was not limited to the amount that she had paid for her return ticket from the point where she was put off the train by the conductor back to the point where she was compelled to change cars to reach her destination. She was entitled to recover compensatory damages for the mental suffering and physical discomfort to which she was subjected by the failure of the conductor or other employé of the railroad company to exercise that degree of extraordinary diligence which is the legal standard imposed by the law of this state upon carriers of passengers. Hopkins on Personal Injuries (2d Ed.) § 661 et seq.; *G. LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. THARPE.

(No. 4,252.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 158*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

Public policy forbids a common carrier, to fix, by a mere arbitrary preadjudgment of damages, the measure of its liability in case of loss of or damage to goods delivered to it for transportation. An agreement made in good faith between shipper and carrier, that goods delivered for transportation are of a given value, is valid and enforceable. The facts bring the present case within the rule first above announced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 663-667, 690-703½, 708-710, 718, 718½; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 163*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—ACTION FOR LOSS OR INJURY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where, in an action for damages for loss of goods delivered to a common carrier for transportation, the plaintiff proves the actual value of the goods, if the carrier in defense to the action relies upon a stipulation in the contract of affreightment fixing the value of the goods at a sum greatly less than their actual value as shown by the evidence, the burden is on the carrier to show that the sum named in the contract was not a mere arbitrary preadjudgment of damages, but was an actual bona fide agreement as to the value of the goods.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 722-725; Dec. Dig. § 163.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 218*) — CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—NOTICE OF CLAIM FOR DAMAGES.

A stipulation, in a contract of affreightment for the transportation of live stock, that, before the animals are removed from the place of destination and mingled with other animals, written notice of claim for damages shall be given to the agent of the carrier, may be waived by the carrier. It appearing in the present case that the agent of the carrier received without objection, and acted upon, an oral notice of the claim for damages, the stipulation in the contract above mentioned was waived, and cannot be set up by the carrier in defense to an action for damages for the death of the live stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 674-696, 927, 928, 932-949; Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

4. INJURIES TO LIVE STOCK SHIPPED—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NO ERROR.

The evidence authorized a finding that the death of the live stock was due to the fact that they were given improper food by the agent of the carrier, en route to their destination. The jury were authorized to find that this negligent act of the carrier caused the plaintiff damage. There were no material errors of law, and the recovery in favor of the plaintiff cannot be interfered with.

Error from City Court of Moultrie; J. D. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by E. M. Tharpe against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

On October 28th a car load of mules was delivered to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company at Columbia, Tenn., to be shipped to the plaintiff at Moultrie, Ga., over the lines of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to Montgomery, Ala., and from that point to Albany, Ga., over the Central of Georgia, and from Albany to Moultrie over the lines of the Georgia Northern Railway. The car reached Montgomery on Saturday afternoon, October 29th, and remained there over Sunday, arriving at Moultrie on the afternoon of November 1st. While at Montgomery the agent of the initial carrier fed and watered the stock.

The shipment was made under a special contract of affreightment, signed by the initial carrier and the Columbia Mule Company, the consignor, and contained, among other things, the following stipulations: "Said shipper will load and unload said animals at his own risk, and feed, water, and attend the same at his own expense and risk while they are in the stockyards of the carrier awaiting shipment, and while on the cars or at feeding or transfer points, or where they may be unloaded for any purpose. Should damage occur for which the said carrier may be liable, the value at the place and date of shipment shall govern the settlement, in which the amount claimed shall not exceed for a stallion or jack $150, for a horse or mule $100, mare and colt together $100, yearling colt $50, cow and calf together $35, domestic horned animals $30 each, yearling cattle each $15, calves, hogs, sheep, or goats $5 each, chickens, ducks, and guinea fowls $2.50 per dozen. As a condition precedent to the shipper's right to recover any damages for loss or injury to said animals, he will give notice in writing of his claim thereto to the agent of the railroad company or other carrier from whom he receives said animals, before said animals are removed from the place of destination above mentioned, or from the place of delivery of the same to said shipper, and before said animals are mingled with other animals." Indorsed on the back was the following: "The attention of the shipper has been called to the terms, conditions, value, etc., herein named." Also: "Bill of lading accepted with full knowledge of all its conditions, shipper's load and count."

When the mules reached Moultrie the plaintiff unloaded them from the car and placed them in his barn in the city of Moultrie. The next day several of the mules appeared to be sick, and the plaintiff verbally notified the agent of the Georgia Northern Railway at Moultrie of this fact, and this agent in turn notified the Central of Georgia Railway Company, but did not notify the initial carrier, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. The agent at Moultrie promised the plaintiff to go down and examine the stock, but having been later informed that the stock appeared to be all right, did not make the examination. Shortly afterwards eight of the mules died. On November 16th, while the remainder of the mules were still in the plaintiff's barn, and before they had been mingled with other stock, the plaintiff caused written notice of the death of the eight mules and his claim for damages therefor to be served upon the agent of the Georgia Northern Railway Company at Moultrie. Suit was thereafter brought against the initial carrier for $1,950 as the value of the eight mules which had died.

The plaintiff testified, in substance, that the agent at Moultrie had first refused to permit him to take the mules from the car before the surrender of the bill of lading, which had not yet arrived, but finally agreed that he would turn the mules over to the plaintiff as "railroad mules," and that the plaintiff might place them in his barn. It appears that the mules were shipped at a reduced rate of freight. The plaintiff testified that, so far as he knew, the same rate was charged that was ordinarily charged for freight of that character; that he had made no agreement with the carrier in reference to the value of the stock, and that so far as he knew the shipper made no such agreement. There was no evidence, other than the statements appearing in the bill of lading, in reference to any agreement between the initial carrier and the shipper as to the value of the stock. There was evidence for the plaintiff that the actual value of the eight mules which had died was $1,950.

The plaintiff's theory was that the mules had died as a result of having been fed decayed and poisoned food in Montgomery by the agent of the defendant. There was testimony that the death of the mules was the result of having eaten improper food for some time within 24 or 36 hours prior to their death. There was also evidence that, while the mules were fed by the plaintiff after they reached Moultrie, the food given was of the best quality and not defective in any respect. It appears, from the evidence, that within the period of 24 or 36 hours prior to their arrival at Moultrie they were fed at Montgomery, Ala., by the agent of the initial carrier. The jury found for the plaintiff the amount sued for, and the defendant's motion for new trial was overruled.

J. H. Merrill, of Thomasville, and Tye, Peeples & Jordan, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. W. W. Dykes, of Americus, and Shipp & Kline, of Moultrie, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. [1] 1, 2. It is argued in behalf of the defendant that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, he could not recover more than $100 for each of the mules; that being the valuation agreed on in the contract of affreightment. While the liability of a carrier of live stock is somewhat different from that of a common carrier of other things, growing out of the inherent differences between live stock and inanimate property, nevertheless a common carrier of goods which transports live stock is, as to such property, a common carrier. In this state a common carrier is not permitted to relieve itself, by contract, from liability resulting from its own negligence, except that it may stipulate for liability only in the event of gross negligence. Cooper v. Raleigh & Gaston R. Co., 110 Ga. 659, 36 S. E. 240. As a corollary from this principle, it follows that a common carrier cannot, by a mere arbitrary preadjustment of damages, enter into an agreement that in case of loss or damage it shall be liable only for a named sum, less than the actual damages which have been sustained by the owner. This question was thoroughly considered by the Supreme Court in the case of Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Hall, 124 Ga. 322, 52 S. E. 679, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 898, 110 Am. St. Rep. 170, 4 Am. Cas. 128, where after reviewing the previous decisions of the Supreme Court, the rule was announced to be as follows: "A railway company in its capacity as a common carrier may, as a basis for fixing its charges and limiting the amount of its corresponding liability, lawfully make with a shipper a contract of affreightment embracing an actual and bona fide agreement as to the value of the property to be transported; and in such case the latter, when loss, damage, or destruction occurs, will be bound by the agreed valuation. But a mere general limitation as to value, expressed in a bill of lading, and amounting to no more than an arbitrary preadjustment of the measure of damages, will not, though the shipper assent in writing to the terms of the document, serve to exempt a negligent carrier from liability for the true value." There is no evidence in the present case that there was any actual bona fide agreement between either the shipper or the owner and the carrier as to the value of the property to be transported. So far as appears, the sum fixed in the contract of affreightment was a mere arbitrary amount, without any reference to the real value of the property transported. The fact that on the bill of lading there was an indorsement that the shipper's attention had been called to all of the terms of the bill of lading and that he had assented thereto does not alter the rule.

[2] It is contended, however, that this stipulation ought at least to cast the burden on the owner of the stock to prove that the stipulation as to the value was not a bona fide agreement, but only an arbitrary preadjustment of damages. We cannot assent to this view. A common carrier cannot stipulate against negligence. To permit it to contract, in case of loss on account of its negligence, to pay a sum greatly less than the real value of the article lost, would be in effect to permit it to contract against its own negligence. Where it is shown that the article transported is lost as a result of the negligence of the carrier, and the value of the article thus lost is also made to appear, and this value is largely in excess of the amount fixed in the contract of affreightment, the presumption is that the carrier has endeavored by contract to relieve itself from liability resulting from its negligence, and the law casts upon the carrier the burden of showing that that which appears to be a contract against negligence and a mere arbitrary preadjustment of damages was really an agreement entered into in good faith between the parties upon a sufficient consideration that the real value of the property was as stated in the bill of lading. In this case the owner testified that he did not make any agreement in reference to the value, and that, so far as he knew, the shipper had made no such agreement in his behalf. This being so, the carrier could reduce the amount of its liability below the actual value of the rules only by showing that a bona fide agreement was entered into between the shipper and the carrier, fixing the value of the property at the amount stated in the bill of lading. Not having carried this burden, the carrier cannot rely upon what appears to be a mere arbitrary statement in the bill of lading as to the value of the property transported. See Hutchinson, Carriers (3d Ed.) § 427, p. 449. This we think is the right result, irrespective of the provisions of the act of Congress known as the "Hepburn Act." That act provides that a common carrier, transporting property from a point in one state to a point in another state, shall issue a bill of lading therefor, and "shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass, and no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed." The language of this section is very broad, and probably prohibits any limitation, even by express bona fide agreement, on the value of the goods shipped. Indeed, Mr. Hutchinson states broadly that such a limitation would be absolutely void, as in violation of the section of the Hepburn Act above quoted. Hutchinson, Carriers (3d Ed.) § 548. As stated above, however, it is not necessary for us to make any authoritative ruling upon this question.

[3] 3. It is further contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, because he failed to give notice in writing of his claim, as provided in the contract of affreightment. That contract provides that written notice of the claim for damages shall be given to the agent of the carrier before the animals are "removed from the place of destination above mentioned, or from the place of delivery of the same to said shipper, and before said animals are mingled with other animals." Such a stipulation is reasonable and valid. Roberts v. G. S. & F. Ry. Co., 10 Ga. App. 100, 72 S. E. 942, and citations. In order, however, for such a stipulation to be held to be reasonable, it must be given a reasonable construction. See Hutchinson, Carriers (3d Ed.) § 443. The purpose of the notice is to enable the carrier to examine into the claim of damages before the animals become mingled with other stock; and thus, either through mistake or through fraud, the carrier may be deceived in reference to the extent of the damages or loss. Hutchinson, Carriers (3d Ed.) § 444. To hold that the stipulation required notice of damage to be given before it was discovered, or could by the exercise of ordinary care be discovered, would be to give the stipulation an unreasonable construction. It is argued in behalf of the plaintiff that, as Moultrie was the place of destination named in the bill of lading, i. e., "the place above mentioned," a notice given before the animals were removed from Moultrie would be a compliance with the contract. We do not think, however, that this is a fair meaning to give the stipulation. Such a construction might possibly be admissible if the language, "removed from the place of destination above mentioned," stood alone; but this language must be taken in connection with the language following, to wit, that the notice must be given before the animals are removed from the place of delivery and before they are mingled with other animals. A fair construction of this stipulation, taking all the language together, would seem to be that, after the animals are unloaded from the car and delivered to the consignee, he must give notice of any damage which he discovers, or which by the exercise of ordinary care he might discover, before he takes the animals away and mingles them with other animals.

It is well settled, however, that, while such a stipulation is reasonable and valid, it may, nevertheless, be waived by the carrier, either expressly or impliedly. Roberts v. Georgia Southern & F. Ry. Co., 10 Ga. App. 100, 72 S. E. 942, and citations. In Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Pickett, 87 Ga. 734, 13 S. E. 750, it was held that where the stock never reached the place of destination, and the plaintiff had actual knowledge of the injury from the beginning of the journey, and the stock were taken from the car with the defendant's consent, written notice as contemplated by the contract was unnecessary. In Hill v. Telegraph Co., 85 Ga. 425, 430, 11 S. E. 874, 21 Am. St. Rep. 166, it was held that, while the agent of the carrier was not bound to recognize an oral demand, yet, if he did so, making no objection to it on the ground that it was not in writing, this would amount to a waiver. In Carter v. Southern Ry. Co., 3 Ga. App. 34, 42, 59 S. E. 209, it was held that if the carrier's agent, without objection to the form of the notice, received and acted upon it, this would amount to a waiver of the requirement as to written notice. In the present case, without reference to the question whether the written notice given on November 16th was a compliance with the terms of the contract, we think there was sufficient evidence to authorize the jury to find that written notice was waived. There was an express agreement between the plaintiff and the agent at Moultrie that he should be allowed to take the mules and put them in his barn as "railroad mules." From this it is inferable that until the next day, when the bill of lading was surrendered, the plaintiff was the agent of the railroad company to take charge of the car of mules. As soon as it was discovered that the mules were sick, the plaintiff notified the local agent at Moultrie, and he in turn gave notice to the Central of Georgia Railway Company, one of the connecting carriers. It is thus apparent that the agent at Moultrie, who was, of course, the agent of the initial carrier, received and acted upon the oral notice. His conduct was such that the jury might find that he waived the stipulation in the contract requiring written notice to be served upon the carrier.

[4] 4. The evidence was conflicting. It may be that, under the terms of the contract requiring the shipper or owner to accompany the stock and feed and water them, the railroad company was not bound to feed the stock. See, in this connection, Weaver v. Southern Ry. Co., 11 Ga. App. —, 75 S. E. 447. When the carrier undertook to feed and water the stock, it was, of course, bound to give them proper food, and exercise at least ordinary care and diligence in feeding and watering them. While there was direct evidence in behalf of the carrier that the food given the stock at Montgomery was not defective in any respect, there was evidence from which the jury were justified in finding that the stock were improperly fed at Montgomery, and that this improper feeding was the cause of the death of eight of the mules. This being so, it cannot be said that the jury were not authorized to find that the defendant had failed to overcome the presumption of its negligence arising from proof of the damages. There are several special assignments of error complaining of charges of the court.

What we have said above disposes of all of the material questions arising in the case, and there was no such error in any of the instructions complained of as will require the grant of a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

HUNT v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF MACON. (No. 4,293.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 532*) — RECORD — BILL OF EXCEPTIONS — PETITION FOR CERTIORARI.

"In order for this court to review the refusal of the judge of the superior court to sanction a certiorari, the petition for certiorari must be incorporated in the bill of exceptions, or otherwise verified as a part thereof by the trial judge. An unsanctioned petition cannot be specified as a part of the record. Clarke v. Deal, 4 Ga. App. 326, 61 S. E. 295; Hall v. State, 2 Ga. App. 437, 53 S. E. 558." *Wimpey v. JACKSON COAL & COKE CO. et al. v. PHILLIPS LINE et al.

SEWARD & ROPER v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 13, 1912.)

1. RECEIVERS (§ 196*) — COMPENSATION — CHARGES.

Receivers, operating under the orders of the court the business of the insolvent company, though unsuccessfully, not being charged with bad faith, are entitled to allowance of reasonable compensation for their services, and a fortiori cannot be chargeable with the expenses of operation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. §§ 659-661; Dec. Dig. § 196.*]

2. RECEIVERS (§ 153*)—LIENS—PRIORITIES — RECEIVERSHIP.

The state and city having no lien on the personal property of an insolvent, which went into the hands of receivers, for the taxes previously assessed thereon, they never having exercised their right of levy or distress, priority of payment should not be given therefor, but only for the taxes thereafter assessed against and due from the receivers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. §§ 467-471; Dec. Dig. § 153.*]

3. RECEIVERS (§ 202*)—ACCOUNTING—MOTION TO SURCHARGE.

The motion to surcharge the accounts of the receivers being accompanied by no data on which the court could ascertain with any degree of certainty what items or matters were complained of, it was too vague and indefinite to warrant entertaining it, especially when it was accompanied with a disclaimer of any intention to impute bad faith to the receivers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. §§ 669, 670; Dec. Dig. § 202.*]

4. RECEIVERS (§ 155*)—PAYMENT OF CLAIMS—PRIORITIES—EXPENSES.

Though the bill for a receiver was filed by the trustees for creditors, to whom an insolvent company made an assignment, yet, the receivership being at the instance and for the benefit of the bondholders of the company, that it might, if possible, be sold as a going concern, expenses incurred in an effort to carry on the business through the receivers will be preferred in distribution of the assets to the claim of the bondholders, by reason of their having had to pay under a bond given by them to have a steamer of the company released from a libel which had been sued out against it before the assignment, though the court, by its decree authorizing the receivers to have the steamer released, provided, if said bondholders had to pay the libellant anything in accordance with the terms of the bond, they should be subrogated to libellant's right of priority of payment out of the proceeds of the steamer.

Appeals from Hustings Court of Petersburg.

Suit was filed by Bartlett Roper, Jr., and J. A. C. Groner, trustees, against the Phillips Line and others, for a receivership. From a decree ruling on exceptions to a master commissioner's report filed in such suit, two appeals, one by the Jackson Coal & Coke Company and others, and the other by Joseph W. Seward and Le Roy Roper, are taken. Reversed and remanded.

In Appeal of Jackson Coal & Coke Company et al.:

Hughes & Little, Willcox & Willcox, Harry E. McCoy, and W. McK. Woodhouse, for appellants. Carl H. Davis, Richard B. Davis, Chas. E. Plummer, Wm. B. McIlwaine, and Geo. Mason, for appellees.

In Appeal of Seward & Roper:

Carl H. Davis, Richard B. Davis, and Paul Pettit, for appellants. Hughes & Little, Willcox & Willcox, Harry E. McCoy, W. McK. Woodhouse, and W. B. McIlwaine, for appellees.

CARDWELL, J. The appeal in each of these cases is taken from a decree of the hustings court of the City of Petersburg entered therein on April 5, 1911, ruling upon exceptions to a master commissioner's report filed in the chancery cause then pending under the style of Roper & Groner, Trustees, v. Phillips Line et al.; and, though separate and distinct questions are presented in each appeal, they were argued together, and will therefore be disposed of in this opinion.

The Phillips Line was organized as a corporation in 1908 for the purpose of taking over the property, franchises, etc., of the Petersburg, Newport News & Norfolk Steamboat Company, a transportation company theretofore operating a line of boats on the James and Appomattox rivers between Richmond, Petersburg, and Norfolk, and the conduct of these operations was continued by the Phillips Line until January, 1910; on which date it made an assignment of its property, etc., to Bartlett Roper, Jr., and J. A. C. Groner, trustees for the benefit of the company's creditors. On the same day the said trustees filed the original bill in the above-named cases, asking for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of and operate the property of the defendant company, in order to preserve it from dissipation by reason of litigation then pending or threatened, and to endeavor to sell the property, franchises, etc., of the company as a going concern. On the day of the filing of said bill, the hustings court entered its decree taking possession and control of the defendant company's property, etc., and appointing said trustees, Roper and Groner, as receivers to take, hold, and operate the property under the orders of the court. At this time the assets of the company consisted of the steamers Pokanoket and Aurora, a certain interest in some wharf property, and a freight and passenger business between the points named; while its liabilities amounted to $59,795.36, consisting of capital stock outstanding, bonds and overdue interest thereon, taxes, operating expenses, including repairs, note due for wharf property secured by deed of trust, and an alleged debt due to one T. M. Davis.

A few days before said bill was filed and the receivers in the cause appointed, the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Company had filed its libel in the United States District Court at Norfolk, Va., against the steamer Pokanoket for $9,520 due it for repairs on the steamer, and the firm of Smith & McCoy had intervened in the proceeding for a certain amount due them for repairs on her; so that, at the time of the assignment made by the Phillips Line and the appointment of the receivers, the steamer Pokanoket was in the hands of the United States marshal, by virtue of the attachment issued in the libel proceedings, and in order to obtain possession of the steamer the receivers arranged with J. W. Seward, Le Roy Roper, and the Petersburg Investment Corporation, who were the holders of the bonds of the company, to execute or to guarantee a surety for the execution of a bond for the release of the steamer, upon the condition, as the reports of the receivers to the court state, that "if Seward, Le Roy Roper, and the Investment Corporation be compelled, in accordance with the terms of said bond, to pay to the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Company the amount due to it by the Phillips Line as aforesaid, they, the said bondholders, will be held by the court to occupy the same position and to have the same priority of payment out of the proceeds of the sale of the said Pokanoket as is now held by the said Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Company."

The reports of the receivers just referred to were received by the court, approved, and the proposed arrangement for having the Pokanoket released to the receivers was sanctioned and authorized by the court's decrees entered, respectively, on February 1 and 5, 1910. The last-named decree, after setting forth the proposed arrangement to have the Pokanoket released to the receivers, specifically provided that "if the said bondholders, or such of them as execute or cause to be executed said bond, are called on to pay and do pay to the person filing said libel proceedings, or to any person who may intervene in said proceedings, by petition or otherwise, any amount, then the said bondholders shall be entitled to and shall have against said steamer Pokanoket and shall be subrogated to all of the rights, claims, and liens against said steamer Pokanoket as would be had under the laws of the United States or the state of Virginia by the persons whose claims are so paid, in case the said bond were not executed, and in case the said libel proceedings were allowed to proceed to a sale of the said steamer Pokanoket, and the said bondholders paying such claims shall be protected as fully as if they held said claims and were enforcing same in admiralty proceedings." The provision of the decree of February 5th is practically the same as the provision contained in the decree of February 1, 1910, for the carrying out of the plan to have the Pokanoket released to the receivers.

Upon the release of the Pokanoket, as provided in said decree, she was turned over to the receivers, who operated her, together with the Aurora, until some time in October, 1910, when, having been unable to dispose of the property, etc., of the company as a going concern, and the receivers having become largely in debt to various persons on account of their operations, the business was brought to a close; the Pokanoket being sold in the early part of November following for $13,000, and the Aurora, together with some other property of the company, in the early part of 1911 for $1,050, the entire assets thus realized being $14,050.

While negotiations looking to the sale of the Pokanoket were pending, the proposed purchasers thereof ascertaining that the appellants in the first of these appeals and other supply and repair creditors of the receivers claimed to have liens upon the Pokanoket for supplies furnished to, or repairs made upon, the steamer declined to pay the purchase price therefor agreed on, unless the receivers would arrange with such claimants to release their claims against the Pokanoket; whereupon an agreement was reached between the receivers and said creditors that the purchase price of the steamer, $13,000, should be deposited to the credit of the court in the cause, to stand in lieu of the steamer until the creditors' liens thereon asserted were finally adjusted.

The matter then came before a master commissioner of the court, to whom the cause had been referred, and appellants Jackson Coal & Coke Company et al., upon notice, appeared before the commissioner and asserted their right to a lien, under their said stipulation, against the proceeds of the sale of the steamer, by virtue of section 2963 of the Code, as well as the general maritime law, for the amount due them, respectively, claiming by virtue of their lien a priority of payment out of the said fund. This contention was in the main sustained by the commissioner, who reported that said appellants were entitled to the same priority against the proceeds of the sale of the steamer over the general creditors of the receivers and of the company which they would have had if their liens had been adjudicated in an admiralty proceeding against the steamer, and gave them a preference next after the payment of "seamen's wages." The commissioner also reported that all the money received by the receivers during any month was disbursed during the same period, that the receivers were behind in their accounts as early as April 1, 1910, and that the majority of the indebtedness due by them was contracted prior to July 15, 1910.

It appears that, pursuant to the guaranty bond executed by Le Roy Roper, Seward, and the Investment Company in order to procure the release of the Pokanoket to the receivers from the attachment lien thereon in the aforesaid libel proceedings, Le Roy Roper and Seward were compelled to pay $4,406.91 each, and they made claim before the commissioner that they were entitled to priority of payment out of the proceeds of sale of the Pokanoket for the amount so due them, respectively, over debts due to creditors of the receivers, and that they were entitled to this preference by reason of the said decrees of the court of February 1 and 5, 1910; but with respect to this debt due to Le Roy Roper and Seward the commissioner reported that it was really in the nature of a debt due by the defendant company, and placed it in the fourth class of debts reported by him, which practically defeated the collection of any part of it, to which ruling of the commissioner Roper and Seward excepted.

There were also other and various exceptions to the commissioner's report, and on a hearing upon the report and the exceptions thereto the court overruled the exceptions filed as to the priority of payment of taxes, the exceptions of Roper and Seward, and overruled the report of the commissioner as to the method reported by him for the distribution of the fund under the control of the court, and entered its decree distributing the fund, first, to the payment of court costs, including allowances to the receivers and their counsel; second, to the payment of taxes; third, to the payment, pari passu, of the claims of the creditors of the receivers on account of their operation of the Phillips Line; and, fourth, to the payment of the guarantors on the bond given for the release of the Pokanoket.

It appears, also, that objection was made in due time by the creditors to any allowance being made to the receivers and their counsel, and a motion was made to surcharge the receivers' accounts, which objection and motion were also overruled.

Had the method of distribution of the fund reported by the commissioner been sustained by the trial court, appellants in the first-named appeal would have had no cause of complaint, as they would have received their money in full; but under the method of distribution adopted by the court's decree they can only receive a part thereof. Accordingly they assign as error the overruling of so much of the report of the commissioner as sustained their liens and awarded payment thereof out of the proceeds of sale of the steamers, etc., next after payment of seamen's wages, and in entering the decree directing payment of these and other claims of the creditors pari passu.

The second assignment of error is practically the same as the first, and the disposition of one will dispose of the other; the gravamen of the exceptions being that the court erred in not directing the payment of said appellants' claims in full.

The third assignment of error is to the ruling of the court making allowances to the receivers and their counsel.

The fourth assignment of error relates to the provision in the decree for the payment of taxes, and giving them priority over the creditors of the receivers; and the fifth assignment of error is to the action of the court in overruling appellants' motion to surcharge the accounts of the receivers.

Section 2963 of the Code, under which the supply and repair creditors of the receivers claim preference in the distribution of the fund under the control of the court, provides: "If any person has any claim against the master or owner of any steamboat or other vessel, raft or river craft, or against any steamboat or other vessel, raft or river craft found within the jurisdiction of this State, for materials or supplies furnished or provided, or for work done for, in or upon the same, * * * such person shall have a lien upon such steamboat or other vessel, raft or river craft for such materials or supplies furnished, work done or services rendered. * * *"

Unquestionably the lien provided by the statute is ordinarily a right of property in the vessel, raft, or river craft, existing independently of possession, and arises as soon as the contract for the materials, supplies, etc., is made, and may be enforced against the boat, raft, or river craft in the hands of the purchasers thereof, and such liens have been enforced so frequently in the admiralty courts that citation of authority is unnecessary; but can such a lien be enforced under the facts and circumstances of this case to the exclusion of court costs, including allowances to the receivers, and of the lien of claimants in the aforesaid libel proceedings in the federal court, to whose rights appellants Seward and Le Roy Roper were subrogated by the decrees of the trial court in this cause?

[1] The receivers were, of course, acting under the orders of the court, and it is very true that the plan to operate the business of the insolvent company, the Phillips Line, was not pursued to a successful result by the receivers, so as to bring about a sale of the property, etc., as a going concern, as was designed; but the receivers are not charged with bad faith in the conduct of the business, and the only complaint is that they did not act wisely and failed to make certain reports to the court which they should have made. In these circumstances, the receivers were entitled to an allowance of reasonable compensation for their services, and a fortiori cannot be charged with the expenses of operation. The allowances to the receivers and to their counsel is not, as we understand appellants' contention, considered unreasonable, and therefore the court did not err in directing their payment as a part of the court costs incurred in marshaling and disposing of the property of the insolvent company, whose property came into the hands of the receivers and under the control of the court.

[2] With respect to that part of the decree appealed from which directed the payment of taxes due from the Phillips Line and its predecessor in title to the state of Virginia and the city of Petersburg out of the fund under the control of the court, and giving the taxes priority in payment over the creditors of the receivers, the court erred, except as to the taxes for the year 1910. The property upon which these taxes were assessed was wholly personal, and no effort appears to have been made, certainly as to the years prior to 1910, either by the auditor of the state or by the city of Petersburg, to collect the taxes until the property was placed in the hands of the receivers in this cause and an account of debts against the Phillips Line ordered. The state had a right, under sections 604-623 of the Code, for one year from the date on which the taxes in her favor were assessed, to levy upon the property assessed with the taxes, which right was not exercised; and it appears that the city of Petersburg had a right of distress against the property assessed with taxes in its favor, which the city might have exercised before the taxes were returned delinquent, or the property upon which they were assessed had passed into the hands of subsequent purchasers, and thereby have secured a lien therefor, but these rights were never exercised.

Under these circumstances, neither the state nor the city had a lien upon the property of the Phillips Line when it went into the hands of the receivers for the taxes due them respectively, and therefore the position of the state and city was no better than that of the general creditors of the company, and they were not entitled to share in the proceeds of sale of the company's property, except as to the amount of taxes due them (the state and the city), respectively, for the year 1910, assessed against and due from the receivers.

[3] With respect to the fifth assignment of error in the petition for the first-named appeal, we deem it only necessary to say that the motion to surcharge the accounts of the receivers was accompanied by no data upon which the trial court could have ascertained with any degree of certainty what items or matters in the accounts of the receivers, which had been audited and approved by the court, were complained of, and therefore the motion to surcharge the accounts was too vague and indefinite to warrant the court in entertaining the motion, especially when the motion was accompanied with a disclaimer of any intention to impute bad faith on the part of the receivers.

[4] This brings us to a consideration of the first and second assignments of error by the appellants in the first-named of these appeals, upon which the contention is made that the trial court should have directed the payment of their respective claims in full, there being a sufficient fund under the control of the court; and in this connection it is necessary to consider the question presented on the second of these appeals, which is whether or not the court erred in denying the appellants Seward and Roper the priority claimed by them in the distribution of the proceeds of sale of the steamer Pokanoket, which was practically to deny them the payment of any part of their claim, amounting approximately to $9,000.

To sustain their contention the supply and repair creditors of the receivers, appellants in the first of these appeals, rely upon the decision of this court, construing section 2963 of the Code, supra, in People's Bank v. Va. Textile Co., 104 Va. 34, 51 S. E. 155, 7 Ann. Cas. 583; while the appellants Seward and Roper rely upon the decrees of the trial court of February 1 and 5, 1910, under which it is claimed that the court made with said appellants an agreement that, if they guaranteed the bond to be executed by the receivers of the court for the purpose of releasing the Pokanoket from the lien of the libel proceedings instituted in the United States District Court at Norfolk, Va., and pending at the time of the institution of this suit, and appellants were called on to pay and did pay any amount on account of the said guaranty, they should be repaid by the court such amount out of the proceeds of sale of the Pokanoket when the boat was sold by the court.

The case of Bank v. Textile Co., supra, was decided upon sound principles of equity and justice, well established by the authorities, and declared to be the policy in this state by statute—section 2963 of the Code. In that case the court said: "The general rule is conceded that the appointment of a receiver does not affect vested rights or interests of third persons in property which is the subject of the receivership, or disarrange the order of priority of liens. But this principle is subject to an exception as firmly established as the rule itself, namely, that where the receiver is appointed at the instance and for the benefit of lien creditors, and charged with the duty of operating the property for their advantage, all proper charges, expenses, and liabilities incurred incident to the receivership are held to be a first charge upon not only the current earnings but also the corpus of the estate."

The bill in that case was filed by the bank for the ultimate purpose of enforcing the lien of a deed of trust upon the plant of the defendant the Virginia Textile Company to secure coupon bonds to the amount of $25,000, all of which were held by the plaintiff, which bill, filed in open court, made defendants thereto the Textile Company and the trustees in the deed of trust, who were also attorneys for the plaintiff, and one of whom was the president of the bank. After setting out the indebtedness of the Textile Company, default in the payment of certain of its notes and installments of interest on the coupon bonds, and that loss and damage would result from a scramble among creditors for priority and a wasting of the assets by a multiplicity of suits, the bill prayed for the appointment of a receiver to continue the business of the company under the direction of the court, etc.; and the truth of all the allegations of the bill was admitted by the defendants in their answer, and they united in the bill's prayer. Accordingly a decree was passed by the court, appointing the president of the plaintiff bank receiver, with direction to take possession of all the company's property, etc.

In the case now in judgment the Phillips Line was admittedly insolvent, a libel had been sued out in the United States District Court at Norfolk against the Pokanoket, one of the company's steamboats, and thereupon the assignment of January 27, 1910, by the company of all of its assets to Bartlett Roper, Jr., and J. A. C. Groner was executed, and in turn, on the same day, these trustees filed their bill asking for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of and operate the property, in order to preserve the company's assets from dissipation * * * and endeavor to sell it as a going concern. Le Roy Roper and Seward, appellants, were bondholders of the Phillips Line. Seward was the vice president of the company, and signed the answer of the company, uniting in the prayer of said bill of the trustees for the receivership. He also executed for and on behalf of the company the deed of assignment to Roper and Groner, trustees; the said Roper and Groner being on the same day, on their own motion, appointed receivers, the attorney for the receivers also acting as the attorney for Roper and Seward.

The two decrees of the court to which we have adverted were based upon two reports filed by the receivers for the purpose of obtaining said decrees, the first of which reports, filed on January 31, 1910, contains the following language: "The said receivers further report that Joseph W. Seward, Le Roy Roper, and Petersburg Investment Corporation are the holders of the \$15,000 of notes or bonds of said Phillips Line, holding respectively 6, 6, and 3 of the said bonds. In order to have the said steamer Pokanoket released from the lien of said libel, the said bondholders have agreed that the said bond of \$12,000 shall be executed, and that they will be responsible therefor in the proportions in which they hold bonds of the company, to wit, in the proportion of $\frac{2}{15}$, $\frac{2}{15}$ and $\frac{1}{15}$, respectively, as more fully appears from Exhibit A herewith filed. Upon the condition, however, that if they be compelled, in accordance with the terms of said bond, to pay to the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Company the amount due to it by the said Phillips Line as aforesaid, that they, the said bondholders, will be held by the court to occupy the same position, and to have the same priority of payment out of the sale of the said Pokanoket, as is now had by the said Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Company."

The receivers' second report practically repeats what is just quoted from the first, upon which the decree of February 5, 1910, was based, and contains this statement: "Your receivers are of opinion that it is necessary, to the best interest of all parties concerned, and particularly of the bondholders of said Phillips Line, that the said steamer Pokanoket be released and turned over to your receivers, so that she may be put into operation between Petersburg and Norfolk; and in this way hold the business which she had before the libel proceedings were instituted."

It seems to us that it plainly appears from the record that, while the receivership was nominally applied for by Roper and Groner as trustees under the deed of assignment, it was at the instance and for the benefit of the bondholders, Roper and Seward. Both the deed of assignment and the bill show that parties holding claims upon which libel proceedings could be and were instituted were vigorously protecting their rights, and that the bondholders next in right of priority would absorb the remaining assets of the company; therefore it was apprehended that the libel proceedings would be so far-reaching and expensive as to defeat the bonds, and the assignment was made and the receivership asked for on the same day, in order that the bondholders might thereby be protected and benefited by obtaining control of the boats and operating them through the receivers.

As said by the commissioner in his report in the cause: "In volunteering to take the position of the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Company and other petitioning creditors in the libel proceedings, and to deliver the steamer Pokanoket into the possession of this court for the purpose of operation, they [Le Roy Roper and Seward] impliedly, if not expressly, agreed to all proper expenses incurred in operating the boats, and held out to the supply men, repair men, seamen, and all others who dealt with the receivers, the corpus of the estate, as well as its earnings, as a basis of credit sought and given."

In these circumstances appellants Seward and Roper cannot in equity and good conscience be heard to say that, while they have invited all that has been done in the proceedings to wind up the business of the Phillips Line and to protect its property, for the ultimate benefit of the bondholders of the company, and that this business should be carried on in the interest of all concerned, particularly of the bondholders, and impliedly, if not expressly, agreed that all proper expenses incurred in the effort to carry on the business should be "a charge upon the corpus of the estate, as well as its earnings," still, although the business carried on particularly for their benefit has been unsuccessful, they are to be preferred in the distribution of the assets of the insolvent company over the supply men and repair men who dealt with the receivers charged with the conduct of the business in their interest, and whose debts were necessarily contracted by the receivers.

"If the court was without power in such cases to charge the expenses of the receivership on the property, the innocent officer of the court would have to bear the loss. If such was the law of receivership, no one could be found to accept the important office." Huling v. Jones, 63 W. Va. 696, 60 S. E. 574.

In Kneeland v. American Loan & Trust Co., 136 U. S. 98, 10 Sup. Ct. 950, 34 L. Ed. 379, the court said: "A court which appoints a receiver acquires, by virtue of the appointment, certain rights and assumes certain obligations, and the expenses which the court creates in discharge of those obligations are burdens necessarily on the property taken possession of; and this irrespective of the question who may be the ultimate owner, or who may have the preferred lien, or who may invoke the receivership." See, also, Va. & Ala. Coal Co. v. Railroad & Banking Co., 170 U. S. 356, 18 Sup. Ct. 657, 42 L. Ed. 1068; International Tr. Co. v. U. S. Coal Co., 27 Colo. 246, 60 Pac. 621, 83 Am. St. Rep. 59, and note.

The established rule recognized in the cases just cited is fully sanctioned and approved in People's Bank v. Textile Co., supra, and is in strict accord, when applied to a case like the one under consideration, with just and equitable principles and the general maritime law, as well as with the policy and terms of our own statutes.

With respect to the authorities upon which appellants Seward and Roper base their contention, it is only necessary for us to say that, so far as we have been able to examine them, they do not apply to a case where the controversy is between creditors of the receivers for operating expenses and holders of liens arising antecedent to the receivership, but only recognize the right of the court to take property subject to liens, and the duty of the court to recognize the existence of such liens undisturbed in their order by reason of the receivership.

We are of opinion that the lower court should have directed the distribution of the fund under its control in this case as follows: (1) To the payment of court costs, including allowances to the receivers and their counsel, taxes due the state of Virginia and city of Petersburg assessed against the property of the Phillips Line for the year 1910, and seamen's wages due from the receivers; (2) to the payment of the liens of appellants perfected under section 2963 of the Code for supplies furnished the receivers; (3) to the payment pari passu of the claims of the general creditors for general expenses incurred by the receivers; and (4) to the payment ratably of the taxes due the state and the city of Petersburg, assessed against the property of the Phillips Line's predecessor in title for the years 1907, 1908, and 1909, and the claim of Seward and Roper, guarantors on the bond of the receivers given for the release of the Pokanoket under the decrees of the court entered in the cause February 1 and February 5, 1910.

The decree appealed from is reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in the cause, to be had in accordance with this opinion.

Reversed.

(92 S. C. 374)

DOUGLAS v. CITY COUNCIL OF GREENVILLE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 10, 1912. On Submission to Full Court, Dec. 2, 1912.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§§ 57, 58*) — POWERS—SCOPE.

Municipal corporations have only such powers as have been expressly granted by the Legislature, or by reasonable implication, and a grant of power will be strictly construed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 144, 145-147, 148; Dec. Dig. §§ 57, 58.*]

2. LICENSES (§ 6*)—ORDINANCES—VALIDITY.

Civ. Code 1902, § 1999, which authorizes municipal, health, police, etc., regulations, authorizes an ordinance requiring a license to open and conduct a livery stable at a new location, and providing that, in considering an application for a license, proximity to populous residence neighborhoods, etc., shall be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 5, 6; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 63*) — LEGISLATIVE ACTION—JUDICIAL REVIEW.

The courts, in passing on the validity of legislative action, cannot inquire into the legislative body's motives, and hence cannot consider an objection that an ordinance restricting location of livery stables was adopted to subserve private interests.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 155, 1378, 1379; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

4. NUISANCE (§ 3*)—LIVERY STABLES.

While a livery stable is not a nuisance per se, when properly located, it would be a nuisance in some places, without regard to how it was built or kept, because of many objectionable features which are inevitably incident to its existence and operation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5, 9-25; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 626*) — ORDINANCE—GENERAL OPERATION.

That an ordinance restricting the location of livery stables was adopted to prevent plaintiff from opening one under construction does not make it invalid, as discriminatory against him, if the ordinance is general in its operation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1380; Dec. Dig. § 626.*]

6. LIVERY STABLE KEEPERS (§ 2*) — ORDINANCES—VALIDITY.

A proper ordinance restricting location of livery stables is not invalid as to one who had bought a lot and commenced building operations at considerable expense before the ordinance was adopted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Livery Stable Keepers, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

7. MANDAMUS (§ 71*)—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—MUNICIPAL ACTION.

Mandamus lies to compel a municipal corporation to perform a purely ministerial duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 133; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

Mandamus proceeding by George J. Douglas against the City Council of Greenville. Petition dismissed.

Wilton H. Earle, of Greenville, for petitioner. L. O. Patterson and T. P. Cothran, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. The petitioner seeks to have an ordinance of the city of Greenville annulled, and to obtain a writ of mandamus, directed to the city council, commanding that body to issue to him a license to open and operate a livery, feed, and sales stable on his lot, on the corner of North and Laurens streets, in said city. On October 5, 1911, petitioner paid $22,100 for the lot, for the purpose of building a stable thereon, and, while it was worth what he paid for it for other purposes, he would not have bought it, if he had known that he would not be allowed to use it for that purpose. On October 6th he applied to the city engineer, who is ex officio building inspector, and authorized to issue building permits, and obtained a permit to build his stable. At that time, so far as it appears from the record, there was no ordinance on the subject of location of stables in the city. The ordinance under which the building permit was granted, related to the methods of constructing buildings and the kind of materials to be used, with a view to their structural safety and to the prevention of fires. Having obtained the building permit, petitioner contracted with a builder, bought several hundred dollars worth of building materials, cut down some shade trees on his lot, had the foundation graded for his stable, and incurred other expenses in preparation for the building of his stable.

On October 25th, when the residents and owners of property in the immediate neighborhood had discovered his purpose, they objected, and petitioned the council to prohibit the opening of a stable at that place, because it was in the midst of a densely populated residence section of the city, in which there was also situated a church and a hospital. Most active in pressing the objections of the neighboring citizens was Mr. W. E. Beattie, who was acting in the interest of his sister-in-law, whose residence adjoins petitioner's lot. Mr. Beattie is a member of the paving commission, which has the expenditure of large funds of the city, and in that way he is officially associated with the members of the council. He is also on terms of social or business friendship with most, if not all, of them. He exerted what influence he could to secure the passage of the ordinance and the refusal of a license to the petitioner under it. He went so far as to give bond to save the city harmless in the matter of expense incurred in defending the ordinance, if it should be attacked, and employed his own attorney to assist the city attorney in this case. It is therefore alleged, as one of the grounds of attack, that the ordinance is void, because its adoption was procured by improper influence, and because, in adopting it under such influence, the members of council perverted the power intrusted to them to be exercised for the public to the promotion of private interests. On November 7th the ordinance was adopted. For the purpose of testing its validity, petitioner immediately applied for a license to open a stable on his lot, which was refused in a formal resolution, which recites that the application had been considered in all its bearings, under the ordinance and with reference to the various matters mentioned in section 4 thereof, and that it was the sense of council that, under all the circumstances, it would not be for the best interest of the city to grant it.

In disposing of the questions before the court, it will be necessary to consider only the first and fourth sections of the ordinance. As originally adopted, they read as follows:

"Section 1. That from and after this date it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, company or corporation to open and conduct a livery stable, feed stable, sale stable or other similar institution within the city limits at any place, at which a similar business has not been conducted immediately preceding the date of the passage of this ordinance, without first applying to the city council and obtaining from said city council special permission to open and conduct said business at said place."

"Sec. 4. In considering and passing upon the question of granting permission to open and operate such livery stable, feed stable, sale stable, or other similar institution, regard shall be had by said council to the proximity of said proposed stable or similar institution to shipping facilities, to the avoiding or prevention of danger to pedestrians in consequence of the use of the streets by large numbers of animals, to the presence or absence of densely populated residence neighborhoods, and to the question whether the proposed stable or similar institution is so near to churches, schools or other institutions as to prove injurious to them, and to the matter of protection against fire losses."

This proceeding was commenced on November 28th, and on December 19th, after the issue herein had been joined and the case had been referred, for the purpose of having the testimony taken, at the suggestion of the city attorney, the council amended the ordinance, presumably for the purpose of strengthening it against this attack. The amendment consisted in substituting "or" for italicized "and" in section 1, and in striking out the italicized adjective sentence therein. Respondent was permitted to set up the amended ordinance in a supplemental return.

[1, 2] We notice, first, the contention that the ordinance is not within the legislative grant of power to the city. It is so well settled as to require no citation of authority that municipal corporations have and can exercise only their inherent powers and such as have been conferred upon them by the Legislature in express terms, or by reasonable implication, and also that the grant of power will be strictly construed against the municipality. Even under these rules, ample authority for the ordinance is found in section 1999, vol. 1, Code 1902, which confers upon cities and towns "power and authority to make, ordain and establish all such rules, by-laws, regulations and ordinances respecting the roads, streets, markets, police, health and order of said cities and towns, or respecting any subject as shall appear to them necessary and proper for the security, welfare and convenience of such cities and towns, or for preserving health, peace, order and good government within the same."

[3] The allegation that the ordinance was adopted and the license was refused through the undue influence of Mr. W. E. Beattie over the members of council, exercised for the purpose of subserving private interests, and not for the protection of public, is not sustained by the evidence. Private interests may be, and nearly always are, incidentally subserved in promoting the public good. But the members of the council deny emphatically that their action was controlled by the influence alleged, and assert positively that they were governed solely by what they believed to be for the best interest of the community. Aside from this, we cannot inquire into the motives which induce legislative action. In a proceeding to annul an ordinance of the city of San Francisco, it was alleged that it was adopted on account of a feeling of antipathy to the Chinese residents of the city; but the Supreme Court of the United States said they could not inquire into the motives of the board of supervisors in adopting the ordinance, "except as they may be disclosed on the face of the acts, or inferable from their operation, considered with reference to the condition of the country and existing legislation. The motives of the legislators, considered as to the purpose they had in view, will always be presumed to be to accomplish that which follows as the natural and reasonable effect of their enactment. Their motives, considered as the moral inducements for their votes, will vary with the different members of the legislative body. The diverse character of such motives, and the impossibility of penetrating into the hearts of men and ascertaining the truth, precludes all such inquiries as impracticable and futile. And in the present case, even if the motives of the supervisors were as alleged, the ordinance would not be thereby changed from a legitimate police regulation, unless in its enforcement it is made to operate only against the class mentioned; and of this there is no pretense." Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 5 Sup. Ct. 730, 28 L. Ed. 1145; Cooley, Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) 258. Whether an act or ordinance is within the power of the Legislature or municipal corporation is a judicial question; but whether it is a wise and proper exercise of the power is for the legislative body to determine, and for their action they are responsible only to the people whom they represent.

[4] We think the ordinance should be sustained as a valid and reasonable exercise of the police power. The place at which a thing is done may determine whether it is or is not a nuisance. While a livery stable is not a nuisance per se when properly located, it would be a nuisance in some places, without regard to how it was built or kept, because of many objectionable features which are inevitably incident to its existence and operation. Its proper location, therefore, depends upon a variety of circumstances, which involve the exercise of judgment and discretion when the matter is viewed from the standpoint of the public health, safety, and comfort; and it is therefore subject to municipal regulation. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 692; McQuill. Mun. Ord. § 450; 19 A. & E. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 430.

[5] The contention that the ordinance is discriminatory and denies to petitioner the equal protection of the law, cannot be sustained, notwithstanding it was adopted to meet his case. That was merely an incident. Its character in that respect must be judged from the ordinance itself. Upon its face, it does not appear to be discriminatory; nor does it appear that such will be the necessary result of its practical operation. While it was primarily aimed at petitioner, it applies to all others in similar circumstances, and it applies to all alike; and while it affords opportunity for unfair discrimination in its administration that does not necessarily make against its validity. Unlike the ordinance condemned in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 6 Sup. Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 225, which conferred "a naked and arbitrary power to give or withhold consent not only as to places, but as to persons," this ordinance vests in the council "a discretion to be exercised upon a consideration of the circumstances of each case," which is a proper exercise of the police power.

In Fischer v. St. Louis, 194 U. S. 361, 24 Sup. Ct. 673, 48 L. Ed. 1018, the Supreme Court of the United States had under consideration an ordinance which prohibited the building of any dairy or cow stable in the city, and the maintenance of any then existing, without consent of the municipal assembly. Fischer was convicted and fined for using stables which had been built before the passage of the ordinance. In response to his contention that the ordinance denied him the equal protection of the laws and deprived him of his property without due process of law, the court said: "Defendant's main contention, however, is that, by vesting in the municipal assembly the power to permit the erection of dairy and cow stables to certain persons a discrimination is thus declared in favor of such persons and against all other persons, and the equal protection of the laws denied to all the disfavored class. The power of the Legislature to authorize municipalities to regulate and suppress all such places or occupations as, in its judgment, are likely to be injurious to the health of its inhabitants, or to disturb people living in the immediate neighborhood by loud noises or offensive odors, is so clearly within the police power as to be no longer open to question. The keeping of swine and cattle within the city, or designated limits of the city, has been declared in a number of cases to be within the police power. The keeping of cow stables and dairies is not only likely to be offensive to neighbors, but it is too often made an excuse for the supply of impure milk from cows which are fed on unhealthful food, such as refuse from distilleries, etc. [Citing cases.] We do not regard the fact that permission to keep cattle may be granted by the municipal assembly as impairing, in any degree, the validity of the ordinance or as denying to the disfavored dairy keepers the equal protection of the laws. Such discrimination might well be made where one person desired to keep 2 cows and another 50; where one desired to establish a stable in the heart of the city, and another in the suburbs; or where one was known to keep his stable in a filthy condition, and the other had established reputation for good order and cleanliness. Such distinctions are constantly made the basis for licensing one person to sell intoxicating liquors and denying it to others. The question in each case is whether the establishing of a dairy and cow stable is likely, in the hands of the applicant, to be a nuisance or not to the neighborhood, and to imperil or conduce to the health of its customers. As the dispensing powers must be vested in some one, it is not easy to see why it may not properly be delegated to the municipal assembly which enacted the ordinance. Of course, cases may be imagined where the power to issue permits may be abused, and the permission accorded to social or political favorites and denied to others, who, for reasons totally disconnected with the merits of the case, are distasteful to the licensing power." To the same effect, see Lieberman v. Van De Carr, 199 U. S. 552, 26 Sup. Ct. 144, 50 L. Ed. 305; California Reduction Co. v. Sanitary Reduction Works, 199 U. S. 306, 26 Sup. Ct. 100, 50 L. Ed. 204; Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 20 Sup. Ct. 633, 44 L. Ed. 725.

[6] The facts that petitioner had been granted a permit to build and had incurred considerable expense preparatory to building cannot avail against the ordinance. "As the state may not, by any law or contract, surrender or restrict any portion of the sovereignty which it holds in sacred trust for the public weal, so a municipality, as a governmental agency, acting and bound always to act as trustee of the power delegated to it, may not, by contract, license, or by-law, surrender or restrict any portion of the police power conferred upon it." 28 Cyc. 696; Knoxville v. Bird, 12 Lea (Tenn.) 121, 49 Am. Rep. 326. These views do not conflict with the principles decided in Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 25 Sup. Ct. 18, 49 L. Ed. 169. That case was decided on a demurrer to the complaint, in which facts were alleged, which were admitted by the demurrer, which showed that the ordinance was not a bona fide exercise of the police power for the protection of the public, but that it was an arbitrary and capricious attempt to exercise that power to protect an existing gas company in the enjoyment of a monopoly, and for that reason the ordinance was held to be void. But the court distinctly recognizes and affirms the principles announced in Fischer v. St. Louis, in the following language: "It may be admitted as being a correct statement of the law as held by the California Supreme Court that notwithstanding the grant of the permit, and even after the erection of the works, the city might still, for the protection of the public health and safety, prohibit the further maintenance and continuance of such works, and the prosecution of the business, originally harmless, may become, by reason of the manner of its prosecution or a changed condition of the community, a menace to the public health and safety. In other words, the right to exercise the police power is a continuing one, and a business lawful to-day may, in the future, because of the changed situation, the growth of population, or other causes, become a menace to the public health and welfare, and be required to yield to the public good."

[7] The power of the court to compel a municipal corporation to perform a purely ministerial duty is not questioned. Although it should be a matter resting in discretion, the court would nevertheless compel its performance, if its refusal should be based upon a conclusion which is without foundation in fact—in other words, if the refusal is arbitrary or capricious. Mauldin v. Matthews, 81 S. C. 414, 62 S. E. 695, 128 Am. St. Rep. 919. For, "though the law itself be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet if it is applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as to practically make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution." Yick Wo v. Hopkins, supra; Kirk v. Board, 83 S. C. 372, 65 S. E. 387, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1188. But the facts of this case fall short of making it appear that the license was arbitrarily or capriciously refused. Numerous circumstances appear in the evidence upon which the discretion to refuse it might have been reasonably exercised.

The petition is therefore dismissed.

WALL v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 18, 1912.)

TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*)—DELAY IN DELIVERY OF MESSAGES — NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action against a telegraph company for delay in the delivery of a message, the issue of negligence held, under the evidence, for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Hampton County; Robt. E. Copes, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by Mamie Wall against the Western Union Telegraph Company. There was a judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. S. Smith, of Hampton, and W. H. Townsend, of Columbia, for appellant. G. H. Fearons, of New York City, and E. F. Warren and George Warren, of Hampton, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff, who lived in the country, two miles from Ridgeland, had instituted, or was about to institute, an action for divorce in Jessup, Ga. On October 15, 1909, her attorney, J. R. Thomas, delivered to the defendant telegraph company for transmission the following message: "Jessup, Georgia, tenth-fifteenth, nineteen hundred and nine. Mrs. Mamie Wall, Ridgeland, S. C. Papers will be ready to-morrow. Come No. 85 train. James R. Thomas." The telegram was not delivered until the plaintiff called for it on October 20th, in consequence of a letter received on the subject. The complaint alleges that the delay in delivery was due to the negligence, willfulness, and wantonness of the defendant, and that thereby the plaintiff "was prevented from keeping an important business engagement in Jessup, was inconvenienced, annoyed, subjected to expense, a trip from Ridgeland, S. C., to Jessup, Ga., which was fruitless, for the reason that the said message had not been delivered when called for at defendant's office, and otherwise damaged, to her injury in the sum of $1,999." The answer contains a general denial, and the special defenses that the plaintiff lived beyond the free delivery limits at Ridgeland, and the charge for delivery beyond the limits was not paid, and that the plaintiff was not known by the name of Mamie Wall, but by the name of Sallie Nettles, or Sallie Wall. At the conclusion of the entire evidence the circuit judge granted a nonsuit.

There was testimony on the part of the plaintiff tending to show that her real name, by which she was generally known, was Mamie Wall, and that she had signed receipts for express packages to the defendant's agent by that name; that on October 15th she was in Ridgeland and asked for a telegram; that when she called again, and received the telegram from the agent, he found it in his waste basket; and that the divorce proceedings were retarded by the delay in the delivery of the message. On the part of the defendant, there was evidence that the plaintiff was not known by the name of Mamie Wall, but as Sallie Nettles, or Sallie Wall, and that there was another woman living some distance from Ridgeland whose name was Mamie Wall; that the defendant's agent did not know the plaintiff as Mamie Wall, and that he made inquiries for Mamie Wall of persons most likely to know her, and was informed that no such person was living in Ridgeland; that he sent a service message, requesting payment or guaranty of the charge for delivery of the message to the other woman, known as Mamie Wall, living beyond the free delivery limits; and that the sender of the message refused to pay or guarantee the charge. This general statement is, we think, sufficient to show that there was an issue made by the evidence, on the decision of which by the jury the verdict would depend.

1. ACTION (§ 50*)—FORECLOSURE—PARTIES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 188, providing that, where a mortgage debt is secured by the obligation of any third person, plaintiff may make such person a party to the action to foreclose, an assignee of a mortgage and notes secured thereby may, on the default of the mortgagor, sue in one action the mortgagor to foreclose the mortgage and the mortgagee on his guaranty of the payment of the debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 511-547; Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

2. ACTION (§ 38*)—FORECLOSURE—CAUSE OF ACTION.

A complaint in an action by an assignee of a mortgage and the notes secured thereby against the mortgagor and the mortgagee, who guaranteed payment, which alleges the mortgagor's failure to pay the note first maturing, and that the whole debt became due pursuant to a stipulation of the mortgage; that by consent of the assignee the mortgagor had sold a part of the land and paid the proceeds on the debt, under an agreement that the same, though exceeding the amount then due on the notes according to their terms, should not affect the right to foreclose; that the mortgagor claimed the right to set off against the mortgage debt a specified sum for deficiency of the acreage of the tract conveyed by the mortgagee; and that to the extent of the shortage the consideration of the notes and mortgage had failed—states but one cause of action; and, though the allegations as to a deficiency in the acreage are not necessary to a cause of action, they are not entirely irrelevant, as they show that a shortage in the acreage impairs the validity of the notes and mortgage, so as to require the mortgagee to make good his guaranty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. § 549; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

3. MORTGAGES (§ 415*)—DEFENSES—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

The equity of a purchase-money mortgagor, based on a shortage in the acreage of the land conveyed by the mortgagee, depends on a failure of consideration; and the mortgagor may obtain relief in a suit to foreclose the mortgage, and the misrepresentation of the mortgagee as to the acreage is available, either as a separate cause of action or as a defense in the foreclosure action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1210-1224; Dec. Dig. § 415.*]

4. JURY (§ 13*)—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL.

Where a defendant sets up as a defense to an equitable cause of action facts which grow out of that cause of action, or the transactions which gave rise to it, and which are so interwoven with it as to be inseparable from it, the defense is not triable by jury as of right.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-83; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

5. MORTGAGES (§ 248*)—FORECLOSURE—MATURITY OF DEBT.

A stipulation, in a mortgage securing notes, that on the nonpayment of any note at maturity the whole debt shall become due, is for the benefit of the mortgagee or his assignee; and where the mortgagee has assigned the mortgage and notes the assignee alone may enforce or waive his rights under the stipulation, and the mortgagee, assigning the mortgage and notes and guaranteeing the payment thereof, is liable on his guaranty, where the whole debt becomes due by the failure of the mortgagor to pay the first note at maturity, though thereafter the assignee accepts from the mortgagor more than is due on the first note under the agreement that he will not waive his right to foreclose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 659; Dec. Dig. § 248.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 213*)—TRIAL—SUBMISSION OF ISSUES TO JURY.

Where, in a suit in equity, the court submitted to the jury issues prepared by plaintiff's attorney, and notice of the proposed submission was served on defendant's attorneys, defendant could not complain because the court submitted on its own motion other issues, in the absence of any objection at the time, or a refusal of request to be heard.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 213.*]

7. MORTGAGES (§ 486*)—FORECLOSURE—JUDGMENT.

Where the complaint in foreclosure of a purchase-money mortgage and to enforce the guaranty of the mortgagee, assigning the mortgage and notes, prayed for a reference to ascertain the amount due, and there was a finding of deficiency in the quantity of the land sold, and the court abated the amount due under the mortgage by the amount of the deficiency, and gave judgment against the mortgagor for the balance, with the right to foreclose, and against the mortgagee for the amount of the deficiency, the judgment was not assailable by the mortgagee, who did not object in the trial court to final judgment, nor ask for a reference, or opportunity to offer further evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1404-1411; Dec. Dig. § 486.*]

8. INDEMNITY (§ 9*)—ASSIGNMENT—WARRANTY.

A mortgagee assigned a mortgage and the notes secured thereby by an assignment stipulating that the notes should be indorsed without recourse. An instrument signed by the mortgagee under seal stipulated that he guaranteed the mortgage and notes to be valid, and obligated himself to protect the assignee against any losses. Held a guaranty of payment of the notes, and the assignee could sue thereon, on default of the mortgagor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indemnity, Cent. Dig. §§ 16, 17; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

9. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 34*)—MISREPRESENTATIONS.

A vendor may represent to a purchaser that his deed calls for a designated number of acres, so as to create in the mind of the purchaser the belief that the tract to be conveyed contains the designated number of acres; and where the vendor makes such an assertion with intent to create such a belief, and knowing that the tract does not contain that many acres, he is guilty of misrepresentation.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; Ernest Gary and Geo. W. Gage, Judges.

Action by E. H. Welborn against W. W. Cobb and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant J. W. Dickson appeals. Affirmed.

Bonham, Watkins & Allen and Leon L. Rice, all of Anderson, for appellant. Martin & Earle, of Anderson, for respondent.

HYDRIOK, J. On August 24, 1908, the defendant Dickson conveyed to the defendant Cobb a tract of land, described in the deed as containing 138 acres, more or less. The purchase price was $4,800, $1,000 of which was paid, and, for the balance, Cobb gave Dickson seven notes for $500 each, and one for $800, due at intervals of one year, with interest from date, and secured them by a mortgage of the land. The mortgage contained a stipulation that, if either of the notes was not paid at maturity, the whole debt should become due. On January 6, 1909, Dickson executed an assignment of these notes and mortgage, with others, to the plaintiff, in which he stipulated: "The notes to be indorsed without recourse on me." But an instrument of writing, signed by Dickson, under seal, and bearing date January 11,

1908, appears in the record, of which the following is a copy: "In view of the fact that the papers I am this day turning over to E. H. Welborn, as part payment for land deal made by and between the said E. H. Welborn and myself, have not as yet been examined by Welborn's attorney, I, J. W. Dickson, do hereby guarantee the papers, held by me and given by W. W. Cobb and J. P. Fortune, to be good and valid, and I hereby obligate myself to protect the said E. H. Welborn against any losses or otherwise pertaining to the above said papers of W. W. Cobb and J. P. Fortune."

In May, 1910, Welborn commenced this action against Cobb and Dickson for foreclosure. In addition to the facts above stated, the complaint alleged that the note which first became due was not paid at maturity, and that, under the stipulation of the mortgage above mentioned, the whole debt thereupon became due; that by consent of plaintiff Cobb had sold part of the land, and paid the proceeds on the mortgage debt, under agreement with plaintiff that such payment, though it exceeded the amount then due on the notes, according to their terms, should not affect his right to foreclose, which had already accrued, under the stipulation contained in the mortgage. Plaintiff alleged, further, that he was informed and believed that the defendant Cobb claimed the right to set off against the mortgage debt the sum of $845, with interest thereon from August 24, 1908, because of a deficiency in the acreage of the tract conveyed to him by Dickson, on the ground that Dickson had falsely represented to him that it contained 138 acres, when it contained only 113, and to the extent of the shortage the consideration of the notes and mortgages had failed. Dickson demurred to the complaint on numerous grounds, which need not be repeated, as they will be considered in what we shall say.

[1.] One of the grounds chiefly relied upon is that the complaint states no cause of action against him, and therefore he is improperly made a defendant. He contends that the complaint is fatally defective in its allegations as to him, because it is not alleged that the land still owned by Cobb is not worth and will not bring enough to pay the balance due plaintiff, or that plaintiff is in danger of any loss on the notes and mortgage. As Dickson guaranteed the notes and mortgage, and obligated himself to protect Welborn from loss on them, and as his principal had defaulted, we do not see upon what ground it can be contended that Welborn could not maintain this action against both Cobb and Dickson, without making the allegations suggested. Plaintiff was under no obligation, by the terms of his contract, to exhaust his remedies against Cobb before resorting to Dickson, but had the right to proceed against both at the same time and in the same action. Section 188 of the Code expressly covers the objection made by defendant. It provides: "If the mortgage debt be secured by the covenant or obligation of any person other than the mortgagor, the plaintiff may make such person a party to the action, and the court may adjudge payment of the residue of such debt remaining unsatisfied after a sale of the mortgaged premises against such other person, and may enforce such judgment as in other cases." See, also, Pom. Rem. § 334; Wiltzie Mtge. Foreclosure, §§ 77, 109; 27 Cyc. 1565.

[2] The next contention pressed under the demurrer is that several causes of action were improperly united in the complaint. This contention seems to be based upon the idea that the plaintiff sets up, in his complaint, a cause of action in favor of Cobb against Dickson for the deficiency in the acreage of the land, a cause of action with which, as Dickson contends, plaintiff has no concern; and he complains, further, that, if Cobb should be compelled to bring said cause of action against him in a separate action, he would be entitled to trial by jury, which has been denied to him by reason of his having been joined as a defendant, and compelled to litigate the issue between Cobb and himself in this action. Appellant has evidently failed to analyze and clearly comprehend the complaint. It states only one cause of action. True, the plaintiff does therein anticipate the defense which he was informed Cobb would make, by alleging the facts out of which it arose. While these facts were not strictly necessary to plaintiff's cause of action, because, as we have seen, the allegation that Dickson guaranteed the notes and mortgage was sufficient to make him a proper party defendant, still they were not entirely irrelevant, because they showed that, if Cobb established his defense, the validity of the notes and mortgage would be impaired, and that Dickson should thereupon be required to make good his guaranty. It appears, therefore, that plaintiff did not allege these facts, as appellant assumes, for the purpose of stating a cause of action which Cobb had against Dickson, and which he could maintain through the plaintiff, and in this action, or not at all. In this connection it may not be out of place to say that the decision of this court in the case of Latimer v. Wharton, 41 S. C. 508, 19 S. E. 855, 44 Am. St. Rep. 739, seems to have been misunderstood, at least to some extent, in the court below.

[3] That case does hold that in so far as the equity of a purchaser of land to be relieved from payment of the purchase money, or any part thereof, depends upon a mere failure of consideration, such equity can be set up only as a defense to an action for the purchase money. But that case does not hold, and we think no case can be found in our Reports which does hold, that a failure of consideration which results from a breach of warranty, express or implied, or from fraud, accident, mistake, or misrepresentation, intentional or unintentional, cannot be asserted actively as a cause of action and afford ground for relief. Therefore, in so far as Cobb's equity depended upon a mere failure of consideration, he could be relieved in this action, or not at all; but, in so far as it depended upon Dickson's misrepresentation, it was available to him, either as a separate cause of action against Dickson, or as a defense in this action. But appellant seems to overlook the fact that the same facts which constitute a cause of action may also constitute a defense. The facts here referred to are as a defense. Therefore there was no improper joinder of causes of action in the complaint.

[4] As to the right of a trial by jury: Where a defendant sets up, as a defense to an equitable cause of action, facts which grow out of that cause of action, or the transaction which gave rise to it, and are so interwoven with it as to be inseparable from it, the defense partakes of the nature of the cause of action and is equitable, and not triable by jury, as of right. In McLaurin v. Hodges, 48 S. C. 187, 20 S. E. 991, the action was to foreclose a mortgage. The defense was usury, and a counterclaim to recover double the usurious interest which had been paid was set up. Now, unquestionably, if the facts constituting that counterclaim had been set up in a separate action by the defendant against the plaintiff, the action would have been legal, and triable by jury. But, when set up as a defense to the plaintiff's equitable cause of action for foreclosure, this court held that, as it grew out of that cause of action, or the transaction which gave rise to it, and was inseparable from it, and as its determination would directly affect the amount recoverable on the equitable cause of action, it was an equitable defense and triable by the court. In Hunt v. Nolen, 46 S. C. 553, 24 S. E. 544, the court said: "This action for foreclosure is on the equity side of the court, and the defense is that there was a partial failure of consideration, arising out of the transaction in which the mortgage was given. The issues are therefore all equitable in their nature." To the same effect is Pratt v. Timmerman, 60 S. C. 187, 48 S. E. 255; and numerous other cases might be cited. Besides, there are numerous instances in which equity administers legal rights which arise incidentally or collaterally in causes of which it has taken jurisdiction. Hughes v. Kirkpatrick, 37 S. C. 161, 15 S. E. 912; Jenkins v. Jenkins, 83 S. C. 544, 65 S. E. 736; Ex parte Wilson, 84 S. C. 447, 66 S. E. 675.

[5] The contention that it appeared from the complaint that the action could not be maintained, because the debt was not due, is so clearly untenable as to require little discussion. The allegation that the whole debt became due according to the stipulation in the mortgage, by the failure to pay the first note at maturity, was admitted by the demurrer. The plaintiff also alleged that he did not waive, and did not intend to waive, his right to foreclose, which had accrued under that stipulation, by subsequently accepting more than was due on the notes at the date of the payment, and that Cobb agreed that his acceptance thereof should not be so construed; and that allegation was admitted by the demurrer. But Dickson contends that he was not a party to that agreement, and was not bound by it. A sufficient answer to that contention is that the stipulation in the mortgage was for the benefit of the mortgagee, or his assignee, and, when he assigned the mortgage to Welborn, the assignment carried with it all rights and privileges under the stipulation, and thereafter Welborn alone could enforce or waive his rights under that stipulation.

[6] The case was tried on the merits before his honor, Judge Gage, who submitted to a jury certain issues which had been prepared by plaintiff's attorneys, and of the proposed submission of which due notice had been served upon defendant's attorneys. In addition to those proposed by plaintiff's attorneys, his honor, of his own motion, submitted two others. Appellant imputes error to the court in submitting those issues of which no notice had been given him, on the ground that he had had no hearing as to them. Other reasons might be given for overruling this assignment of error; but it is enough to say that the record fails to disclose any objection made by appellant at the time to the submission of the additional issues, or that he asked to be heard as to their submission, and that a hearing was refused him.

[7] The findings of the jury, which were concurred in by the court, established the following facts: That Dickson misrepresented the acreage of the land to Cobb, but without intent to defraud him. (So far as the evidence shows, it does not appear that Dickson knew that the tract did not contain 138 acres. His deed, and several prior deeds in his chain of title, described it as containing 138 acres, more or less.) That the tract was sold as a whole, and not by the acre. That the deficiency amounted to 24½ acres, and that it was a gross deficiency. Thereupon the court, finding that the deficiency amounted in value to $972.20, and that there was then due on the notes and mortgage $1,041.55, abated the amount due by the amount of the deficiency, and gave the plaintiff judgment against Cobb for the balance, $69.35, with the right to foreclose, and gave his judgment against Dickson for the amount of the deficiency. There is no merit in appellant's contention that the court erred in giving such judgment, because part of the relief prayed for in the complaint was that the case be referred to a referee, to ascertain and report the amount due on the mortgage debt, and that he expected, therefore, that it would be referred, and at such reference he would have the opportunity to examine the witnesses as to the payments made. When the case was taken up for trial in open court, he should have known that it would be finally disposed of on that trial, or he should, at least, have informed himself as to that matter. But the record fails to show that he made any objection in the court below to a final judgment being passed, or that he asked for an opportunity to offer any further evidence, or for a reference. He had full opportunity to examine both plaintiff and Cobb as to payments made on the mortgage debt.

[8] It is contended that the court erred in disregarding the indorsement of the notes "without recourse," and in holding Dickson bound by the agreement, dated January 11, 1908, to guarantee payment and save Welborn from loss on the notes and mortgage. Appellant argues that the agreement dated January 11th did not bear its true date, and that it is inferable from the evidence that its true date was January 1st, and that it was intended to be only a temporary guaranty of the title to the land covered by the Cobb mortgage, pending the examination of that title by Welborn's attorneys, and that, when the transaction was subsequently closed, that agreement expired, because at that time Welborn's attorneys had examined and approved the title. An examination of the agreement does not warrant the inference of any such limitation of its purpose, or that it was intended to be only temporary, and of force only until the title could be examined. The findings and conclusions of the court are supported by the greater weight of the evidence.

[9] The appellant requested the court to charge the jury that, if he merely said to Cobb that his deed called for 138 acres, that would not be a misrepresentation. His honor refused the instruction, on the ground that it would be a charge on the facts. In this there was no error, because a seller might say to a buyer, "My deed calls for so much," in such a way and under such circumstances as to create in the mind of the buyer the belief that the tract contained that many acres. If he should make such an assertion with the intention to create such a belief, knowing that the tract did not contain that many acres, he would be guilty of misrepresentation. One may be guilty of misrepresentation in law, as well as in morals, by purposely creating a false impression of belief in the mind of another, with the intention that he act upon it, without making any positive or literal false statement of fact. The suppression of the truth, with misleading suggestions, may be as effective to create an erroneous or false impression as a direct falsehood.

The other points raised are either involved in and concluded by what has been said, or they are so clearly untenable as to require no special consideration.

Affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Dillon County; James W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by the Pee Dee Naval Stores Company against Robert P. Hamer, Jr., and others. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Willcox & Willcox, for appellant. Livingston & Gibson, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This action was commenced in the court of common pleas, and the object was to recover $1,731.85 on account of certain alleged breach of warranty contained in a deed made by defendants to plaintiff on December 24, 1902. The record shows that prior to December, 1900, the defendants were the owners of a large number of acres of timber lands in the state of Florida, approximating 50,000 acres. The plaintiff company was organized as a corporation under the laws of the state of South Carolina. Upon the formation of the corporation, the lands held by the defendants respondents were purchased by it, and a warranty deed of conveyance taken by it from the defendants respondents. The consideration was $23,000. The company, as organized, held the premises from December, 1900, until the fall of 1902, when J. W. Moore became the sole owner of the plaintiff corporation; he having purchased all of the stock of the stockholders therein. It appears at the time he purchased the stock, or a short time thereafter, he gave an option on the property, and in about two months sold it to the Naval Stores Manufacturing Company, of which W. B. Myers was president. It appears from Moore's testimony, when he investigated the title with a view of selling it, that it was then discovered that there was an outstanding judgment against the property for the sum of $1,165.51, with interest from May 11, 1891, in favor of, James E. Johnson, and that the judgment was a lien on the property. The evidence shows that he took up and discussed the matter with R. P. Hamer, and Hamer authorized him to make the best settlement of the matter he could; that in pursuance of this agreement and understanding with Hamer he went to Florida, and on the 25th day of November, 1902, entered into an agreement with Myers, president of the Naval Stores Manufacturing Company, by which Myers was to retain out of the purchase price which was to be paid for the property the sum of $1,320 in settlement of all defects in question to the title to the property sold.

Plaintiff then brought suit for this amount, alleging breach of warranty in the deed to it, and the cause was heard by his honor, Judge De Vore, and a jury, at the October term of court, 1910. At the close of the testimony, plaintiff moved the court to direct a verdict in its favor for full amount claimed, on the ground that the plaintiff had shown that at the time of its purchase of the lands there was an outstanding judgment, which was a lien on the land, in favor of James E. Johnson, and that it had to remove this incumbrance by paying $1,320. The court refused to direct a verdict, and the jury found in favor of the plaintiff a verdict for $660. Plaintiff appealed, and the only question raised is whether the circuit court committed error in refusing to direct a verdict for plaintiff as moved for.

We think the appeal should be sustained. There was no testimony in this, a contract case, to permit the jury to capriciously cut down the verdict to half of the amount actually proved. There was but one inference that could be drawn from the whole evidence in the case, and that was, if plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, it was entitled to recover the full amount it had paid out to clear its title to the land it had purchased from the defendants respondents, under a warranty deed.

[1, 2] The court should not permit a verdict to stand, where the jury found a verdict capriciously, or a verdict that the testimony does not warrant, or one contrary to the law as laid down by the judge. The undisputed testimony in the case establishes the warranty of the title by the defendants, the breach of the warranty, and the damage to the plaintiff in the amount mentioned and asked for, and his honor should have directed the verdict asked for. The defendants made no attempt to show a paramount title in themselves as against the one held by Drew, against whom the Johnson judgment was obtained; but, on the contrary, the evidence conclusively shows that at the time this judgment was rendered Drew had a perfect title, and no evidence is offered or attempt made by the defendants respondents to avoid liability by establishing the invalidity of the judgment recovered by Johnson. The evidence in the case, unexplained and uncontradicted, shows that the Johnson judgment was an incumbrance on the land at the time of sale by respondents to the appellant. It has been held in Kerngood v. Davis, 21 S. C. 210, that an outstanding judgment constituting a lien upon the premises is an incumbrance, and the covenantor can recover from his covenantor the amount of damages caused thereby.

[3] By the common law, if there is an outstanding title against his property, the grantee need not wait to be actually evicted, but he may pay off the incumbrance and then sue on his warranty. Lessly v. Bowie, 27 S. C. 198, 3 S. E. 199; Coleman v. Whittle, 79 S. C. 216, 60 S. E. 523, 128 Am. St. Rep. 841; Brown v. Thompson, 81 S. C. 380, 62 S. E. 440. There is no presumption that the common-law does not prevail in Florida. Crosby v. Railway Co., 81 S. C. 24, 30, 61 S. E. 1064. The evidence shows that there was an incumbrance on the property, and, if plaintiff was not actually evicted, there was such action on the part of the party holding said judgment as to make it necessary for the plaintiff to remove the same in order to prevent an eviction, and this gave the plaintiff the right to claim a breach of warranty and bring its suit.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to the circuit court, with instructions to the clerk of the court of Dillon county to enter up judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,320, with interest on that amount from November 25, 1902.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Hampton County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by W. E. Harter against the Bank of Brunson. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. De Loach, of Camden, and W. D. Connor, of Brunson, for appellant. W. S. Smith and J. W. Vincent, both of Hampton, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. On September 17, 1906, J. W. Sullivan, of Fairfax, S. C., for value received, made and delivered to plaintiff his draft for $200 on W. F. Cummings, of Hampton, S. C. Plaintiff indorsed the draft and deposited it with defendant, and the amount thereof was placed to his credit on his account with defendant. It was listed, with other items, on a blank form of deposit slip which was filled up and signed by plaintiff, and upon which, over plaintiff's signature, there was printed the following stipulation: "For value received, we the undersigned hereby agree in depositing the items listed below for collection or credit with the Bank of Brunson, Brunson, S. C., that we will not hold the bank liable to us for said items until the cash for each has been paid to the Bank of Brunson, Brunson, S. C."

[1] Defendant promptly forwarded the draft to the Bank of Charleston, its regular correspondent for the collection of items payable outside of Brunson. In due course of business, defendant should have received a report from its correspondent in about three days, but nothing was heard from the draft, until about the 1st of April, 1907—over six months after it was deposited—when defendant received information from the Bank of Charleston that it had been dishonored and protested, and that the draft, with notice of protest, had been mailed to defendant. The evidence fails to show when it was presented for payment, when protested, or when it was deposited in the mail. In fact, there is no competent evidence that any of the steps were taken which are necessary to fix the liability of the indorser; and the burden of proving that such steps were taken rested upon defendant. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1050. It appears, however, that defendant never received the draft, with the notice of protest, from the Bank of Charleston, and it is supposed that it was lost in the mail. On receiving the information above stated, in April, 1907, defendant notified plaintiff of the dishonor, protest, and loss of the draft, and charged his account with the amount thereof, and the protest fee. Plaintiff brought this action to recover the amount so charged to him, alleging that he had been damaged to the extent of that amount by defendant's negligence, in failing to give him notice, within a reasonable time, of the dishonor of the draft. Trial by jury was waived, and the issues were referred to a referee, who concluded that defendant was not liable to plaintiff, holding that, under the stipulation contained in the deposit slip, the credit given plaintiff for the amount of the draft was not absolute, but contingent upon its being collected by the exercise of due care and diligence by defendant, and subject to counter charge, if it proved uncollectible; that, when a bank receives paper for collection at a distant point, it must, according to the known usage and custom of the business, make the collection by means of the agency of others; that, if due care is exercised in the selection of suitable agents, the bank receiving such paper is not liable to its customer for their default or neglect, because the agents so selected are the agents of the customer, and not of the bank; that, in such case, the bank is liable only for its own neglect or default. The referee found that defendant was not guilty of any negligence, having promptly forwarded the draft to a suitable agent for collection, according to its own and the usual custom of the business. He also held that the negligence alleged was not the cause of any injury to plaintiff, because he found that the drawer was insolvent, when the draft was made, and has been so ever since. On exceptions the circuit court overruled the conclusion of the referee, holding that the agents selected by a bank for the collection of paper indorsed and deposited with it, under the circumstances stated, are the agents of the bank and not of its customer, and therefore that the bank is liable to its customer for their neglect or default. The court also found that the defendant itself was guilty of negligence in failing to find out sooner from its correspondent whether the draft had been received and collected, and in failing sooner to notify plaintiff of its dishonor; also, that plaintiff was injured by the delay in giving him the notice, because the drawer was solvent, when the draft was made, and, if timely notice had been given plaintiff, he could have recovered the amount from him, but that he was insolvent when the notice was given. Accordingly, judgment was given against defendant.

[2] It is scarcely necessary to say that, as this is an action at law, and the findings of the circuit court are not wholly unsupported by evidence, they are not reviewable by this court.

[3] The principal question of law involved was settled against appellant, and in accord with the decision of the circuit court, in Bank v. Cooper, 91 S. C. 91, 74 S. E. 368, where the court said: "In 1884, the Supreme Court of the United States adopted the English rule that a bank receiving a draft or bill of exchange for collection is liable for neglect of duty occurring in its collection, whether arising from the default of its own officers, or from that of its correspondent, or an agent employed by such correspondent, in the absence of any express or implied contract varying such liability. Exchange Nat. Bank v. Third Nat. Bank, 112 U. S. 276, 5 Sup. Ct. 141, 28 L. Ed. 722. * * * We adopt this rule as the just one, because it is in accord with the common understanding of bank and customer in their dealings. In depositing his paper the customer ordinarily surrenders all control of it, and has nothing to do with the means taken by the bank to collect. On the other hand, the bank undertakes the collection for its own profit, takes its own methods and selects its own agents. It seems therefore illogical to regard the collecting bank or any of the intermediate banks as agents of the depositor, or to put upon him loss due to their default."

[4] Whatever else may be the legal effect of the stipulation printed on the deposit slip, it does not purport to exempt the bank from liability for its negligence, or that of its agents; and it should not have that effect; nor can it be construed as a waiver of the rights of a depositor of commercial paper, under the law merchant, with regard to presentment, demand, and notice of dishonor. It does, however, afford evidence of an agreement that the paper so deposited was not absolutely sold to the bank, and that the credit given a customer on the deposit of such an item is not absolute, but contingent upon its collection; and therefore, if it proves to be uncollectible, notwithstanding the exercise of due and ordinary care and diligence on the part of the bank, such credit is subject to a counter charge, and the bank shall not be held liable for the failure to collect.

Under the facts found against appellant by the circuit court, judgment for plaintiff was inevitable.

Affirmed.

JONES v. ATLANTIC COAST LUMBER CORPORATION et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 17, 1912.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*) — SALES OF STANDING TIMBER—FAILURE TO CUT—ESTOPPEL.

Where a timber deed also conveyed to the grantee a right of way for a tramroad and a permanent road, the cutting of timber for the purpose of laying the tramroad was not a commencement of cutting on the timber contract; and the grantor, by failing to object to such cutting, or by participating therein, was not estopped to claim that by delay the grantee's rights under the timber contract had been lost.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 136*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—APPLICATION—QUESTIONS DETERMINABLE.

In an action by a grantor of timber, who also conveyed to the grantee a right of way, to enjoin the cutting of timber, on the ground that the grantee had lost his rights by delay, where, on motion for a temporary injunction, the grantee showed that cutting had been commenced and that, notwithstanding the delay, the grantor had acquiesced and participated therein, while the grantor presented affidavits to show that such cutting was not under the timber contract, but for the purposes of the right of way, a question of fact was presented which should be determined on the trial, and which did not justify the denial of the injunction, since, in an action for an injunction, where a temporary injunction is essential to the preservation of a legal right, if established as alleged in the complaint, it is error to refuse the temporary injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 305, 306; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 193*)—NECESSITY OF PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS BELOW.

An order granting a temporary injunction will not be reversed on the ground that the complaint is insufficient, where defendant did not question its sufficiency in the trial court, but merely moved to make it more definite and certain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1226-1240; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

4. INJUNCTION (§ 118*)—SALES OF STANDING TIMBER — ACTIONS ON CONTRACT — COMPLAINT.

In an action to enjoin the cutting of timber, a complaint, alleging the making of a contract for the sale of the timber, the date and consideration thereof, the number of acres of timber, that more than 13 years had elapsed, and that the grantor had forfeited his rights by not cutting the timber within a reasonable time, was sufficiently definite and certain as to the facts and circumstances upon which plaintiff based his conclusion that a reasonable time for cutting the timber had expired, since it was sufficient to open the door to proof of the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties when the contract was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 223-242; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 11*)—FORM OF ALLEGATIONS—ULTIMATE AND FIDUCIARY FACTS.

While a complaint must contain a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action, it need allege only the ultimate and not the evidentiary facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

6. PLEADING (§ 8*)—FORM OF ALLEGATIONS—FACTS OR CONCLUSIONS.

An allegation of a mere conclusion of law is insufficient to raise an issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 12-28½; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marion County; J. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by J. W. Jones against the Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation and another. From orders granting a temporary injunction and denying defendants' motion to make the complaint more definite and certain, the defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Willcox & Willcox, of Florence, and M. C. Woods, of Marion, for appellant. Mullins & Hughes and Henry Buck, all of Marion, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action for injunction and damages. The complaint alleges that on the 7th day of January, 1899, the plaintiff's grantor, David J. Atkinson, executed and delivered to one R. L. Montague a certain instrument of writing, styled and known as a "Deed and Contract," and commonly called a "Timber Deed," bearing date on said day, whereby he purported to sell and convey unto the said R. L. Montague all the timber of every kind and description to 12 inches stump diameter and upwards, 12 inches from the ground at the time of cutting, then standing and being upon a certain tract of land, the tract of land described in the complaint, together with certain timber rights, rights of way, privileges, and easements therein more specifically set forth, all of which will more fully appear by reference to said deed, a copy of which was thereto attached and thereby made a part of the complaint. That thereafter, by sundry mesne conveyances, the rights, etc., of said R. L. Montague were acquired by the defendant, Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation. That at the time the said deed was executed and delivered it was the intention of the parties that the grantee should at once, or within a reasonable time, commence to cut and remove the said timber, and continue without cessation until said timber should have been cut and removed. No time was fixed in the deed to commence. That, although a period of more than 12 years to wit, nearly 13 years, has elapsed and expired, neither the grantee nor his assigns had commenced the cutting and removal of said timber until the 20th of September, 1911. That a reasonable time for cutting and removing of said timber had expired long before said last-mentioned date. The plaintiff asked for an injunction against the defendants and for damages for the timber cut. After the service of the complaint, the plaintiff moved for and obtained an injunction pendente lite, and the defendant moved for order making the complaint more definite and certain, so as to require the plaintiff to allege the facts and circumstances upon which was based the allegation "that a reasonable time had long since expired in which to commence to cut and remove the timber." On the hearing, the defendant produced an affidavit of the plaintiff, in which it was admitted that the plaintiff himself had cut some timber on said land for the defendant in 1907, and the defendant claimed that the plaintiff was thereby estopped. The plaintiff made another affidavit, in which he said that, while it was true he had cut some timber on the land, the cutting was for the purpose of making a tramway, also provided for by his deed, and not to carry out the timber contract.

From this order of Judge Shipp, granting the temporary injunction and refusing to require the plaintiff to make the complaint more definite and certain, the defendant, Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, appealed upon four exceptions:

"(1) His honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, upon the showing made before him in enjoining the defendant, Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, from cutting and removing the sawmill timber from the land described in the complaint. He should have held that, from the admitted facts appearing in the return to the rule, the cutting of the timber conveyed by Atkinson to Montague was commenced within a reasonable time, and that, including the definite period of 10 years allowed for such cutting and removal, the defendant, Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, still had the right to cut the timber in question, and to exercise the other rights conveyed in the deed from Atkinson to Montague.

"(2) His honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in not holding that plaintiff, by his active participation in cutting and removing timber from the tract of land in question, embraced within the terms of the deed of Atkinson to Montague, during the year 1907, and in failing and neglecting at that time, or at any other time until the commencement of this action, to object to the cutting, or to take the position that a reasonable time had expired, was, at the time of the commencement of this suit, estopped from taking such position. He should have held the timber deed in question to be still valid and in full force, by reason of the estoppel of plaintiff to deny its validity or to contend that a reasonable time for commencing to cut had expired."

[1,2] These exceptions lose sight of the fact that the "Deed and Contract" not only conveys the timber, but also the right of way for a tramroad and a permanent road. If the cutting was for the purpose of laying the tramroad or railroad, then the cutting was not a "commencing" on the timber contract, and would not estop the plaintiff. This raised a question of fact to be determined on the trial of the cause. It is unnecessary to enter upon an extended discussion. In the recent case of McClary v. Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, 90 S. C. 153, 72 S. E. 145, this court says (quoting from Crawford v. Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, 77 S. C. 81, 57 S. E. 670): "Where the action is for the sole purpose of an injunction, and a temporary injunction is essential to the assertion and preservation of a legal right, if established as alleged in the complaint, it is error at law to refuse to set aside a temporary injunction." These exceptions are overruled.

"(3) His honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in not holding that the complaint in this action did not contain a statement of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, for this reason, in not refusing the injunction."

[3] This exception is practically a demurrer to the complaint. This question does not appear to have been made before Judge Shipp. The motion there was to make more definite and certain. This court could not find that his honor erred in not sustaining a motion upon which he was not asked to pass. This exception is overruled.

[4] "(4) His honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in refusing the motion for an order requiring plaintiff to make his complaint more definite and certain by stating the facts and circumstances upon which he based his conclusion that a reasonable time for cutting the timber in question had expired. He should have held that the complaint, in the particulars mentioned, is so indefinite and uncertain that the precise nature of the charge is not apparent, and should have required plaintiff to state facts, and not conclusions of law, as a basis of his claim, and, on his failure to do so, should have required his complaint to be dismissed."

We have been referred to Livingston v. Ruff, 65 S. C. 284, 43 S. E. 678.

[5,6] Undoubtedly the court requires a statement of the facts constituting a cause of action; but this means the ultimate facts, as distinguished from mere probative or evidentiary facts, as it is not required to state those facts which merely evidence the ultimate, basic facts upon which the action depends. It is also well settled that the allegation of a mere conclusion of law raises no issue. The order appealed from fully answers this question. In this case the contract is set forth in the complaint, with the date thereof, the consideration, the number of acres of timber, and there is an allegation that more than 13 years have elapsed since the contract was made. I think this opens the door for proof of the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties when the contract was made. This exception is overruled.

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from is affirmed.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 346*)—ACTIONS—ISSUES, PROOF AND VARIANCE.

Plaintiff cannot allege a joint liability on a contract and prove a joint and several or a several liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1718-1753; Dec. Dig. § 346.*]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§§ 136, 188*)—LIABILITY OF AGENT OF DISCLOSED PRINCIPAL.

Where an agent, authorized to contract for his principal, made a contract with a third person and disclosed the principal, the principal was alone liable to the third person; and in an action on the contract the agent was not even a proper party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 476-491, 711, 712; Dec. Dig. §§ 136, 188.*]

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 145*)—LIABILITY OF AGENT OF UNDISCLOSED PRINCIPAL.

Where an agent, authorized to make a contract for his principal, made a contract without disclosing the principal, the adverse party to the contract could not, on discovering the principal, hold both the agent and the principal, but he must elect which one he will hold.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where the court during the trial, announced that the declarations of an agent could not prove agency and adhered throughout the trial to the rule, an instruction on the question of the admissibility of the declarations of an agent to prove agency, though involved, was not prejudicial as leading the jury to believe that such declarations proved agency.

5. WORK AND LABOR (§ 6*)—ACTION ON CONTRACT MADE BY AGENT.

Where a railroad company bought ties from a third person and paid him therefor, and made no contract, directly or indirectly, with plaintiff jointly with the third person, or severally through him as its agent, plaintiff owning the ties could not recover from the company on a quantum meruit merely on the ground that the company used them in the construction of its roadbed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Chesterfield County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Actions by S. O. Goodale and by Gillespie Bros. against J. W. Page and the Bennettsville & Cheraw Railroad Company. From judgments for plaintiff in each action, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Stevenson & Matheson, of Cheraw, for appellants. Edward McIver and W. P. Pollock, both of Cheraw, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. The above-stated cases were tried together on circuit and in this court. The issues are the same in substance, and what is said in disposing of one applies to the other.

The plaintiff sued on two causes of action. In the first, he alleges a joint contract on the part of defendants with himself, whereby he was to furnish the railroad company with cross-ties at 25 cents each; that he delivered 12,221 ties under the contract; and that defendants owed him a balance therefor of $1,823.90. The second cause of action is based on quantum meruit; and it is alleged that plaintiff furnished and delivered to defendants 12,221 ties for use in the construction and repair of said railroad, and which were accepted and so used; that they were worth 25 cents each; and that defendants owe the plaintiff therefor a balance of $1,823.90.

The defendant Page denies the allegations of the complaint, and gives his version of the transaction between himself and the plaintiff, and also that between himself and his codefendant, as follows: He says that he made a contract with the railroad company to furnish it cross-ties of a specified size and kind; that he then made a contract with plaintiff to furnish a certain number of said ties at 25 cents each, which was 2 cents apiece less than the railroad company had agreed to pay him for them, the ties to be shipped to J. J. Heckart, an officer of the company; that his contract with plaintiff was independent of his contract with the railroad company, and that, in making it, he acted for himself alone, and not as agent of the railroad company, and that the railroad company had nothing whatever to do with his contract with plaintiff, except that, by his agreement with plaintiff, the ties were to be shipped to the railroad company, and were to be subject to its inspection; that plaintiff shipped a lot of ties under this contract, but many of them did not come up to the specifications agreed upon, and were rejected by the railroad company:

that he thereupon promptly notified plaintiff of their rejection, and they afterwards inspected them together, and it was found that many of them failed to come up to the size and kind agreed upon, and he and plaintiff then made a new contract, whereby he was to pay plaintiff the price agreed upon for all ties that came up to contract, and half price for all others which the company would accept, notwithstanding they did not come up to the specifications agreed upon; that he paid plaintiff for all ties used under this contract, except a balance of $89.52, which he was willing to pay.

The answer of the railroad company denies the allegations of the complaint, and alleges that it made a contract with its codefendant Page to furnish it cross-ties, and that it has fully complied with that contract and paid him for all the ties furnished under it; that it did not know plaintiff in the transaction, and made no contract with him, directly or indirectly.

Under the charge of the court, the plaintiff in each case recovered judgment against both defendants, and both have appealed therefrom.

[1-3] It is an elementary rule that you cannot allege one cause of action and prove another; nor can you allege a joint liability and prove a joint and several or a several liability in actions on contracts. Patton v. Magrath, Rice, 162, 33 Am. Dec. 98; Pope Mfg. Co. v. Cycle Co., 55 S. C. 528, 33 S. E. 787. Now, in this case, plaintiff alleged a joint contract on the part of the defendants with him. At the trial he was allowed, without amendment of his complaint, to attempt to prove a different contract—one which had not been alleged—to wit, a contract made with him by the defendant railroad company through the defendant J. W. Page, as its agent. It is clear that, if Page was the agent of the railroad company, and was authorized to contract for the company and did so contract, disclosing his principal, the company alone is liable to plaintiff, and Page is not even a proper party to the action. Waddell v. Mordecai, 3 Hill, 22; Pope v. Harter, 66 S. C. 54, 44 S. E. 407. But even if Page did not disclose his principal, the plaintiff could not, on discovering the principal, hold both the agent and the principal, but would be required to elect which one he would pursue. Gay v. Uren, 109 Minn. 101, 123 N. W. 295, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 742, and note.

There are a number of good reasons for the rule of procedure above stated; but it will be necessary to mention only one or two to show its importance to the defendants in its application in this case. Under the allegations of the complaint, the defendants being sued jointly, neither of them could have set up a counterclaim in favor of himself individually against the plaintiff. Pope Mfg. Co. v. Cycle Co., supra. If the contract which plaintiff was allowed to attempt to prove had been alleged, Page could have had the action dismissed as to him (Pope v. Harter, supra), and the other defendant could have interposed a counterclaim in its favor; or, if the venue was laid in the county of Chesterfield, because of the residence of the defendant Page in that county, it could have had the place of trial changed to a county of its residence.

It follows that the court erred in admitting evidence to prove a contract made by the company through Page, as its agent, and in charging the jury that if Page was the duly authorized agent of the company, and made the contract for the company, they might find a verdict against both defendants.

[4] The appellants contend that the court erred in admitting the declarations of the alleged agent to prove the agency, and in charging the jury that they might consider his declarations in aid of the other evidence tending to prove the agency, as, for instance, if the company held him out to the world as its agent. Throughout the trial, the court announced and adhered to the general rule that the mere declarations of an alleged agent are not admissible to prove the agency; and, while the part of the charge complained of is somewhat involved, we are not satisfied that, even if there was any error in it, the defendants were prejudiced by it.

[5] The next assignment of error is in the following instruction: "Now, with reference to the second cause of action, which in law is known as a quantum meruit suit, the law is this, for the purposes of this case: If the plaintiffs in both cases did ship cross-ties along the line of the railroad company, whether it shipped them to J. W. Page, contracting for himself, and the railroad accepted those cross-ties, or rather (strike out the word 'accept') and the railroad used those cross-ties in the construction or repairing of its roadbed, why, they would have to pay these people who owned the cross-ties what they are reasonably worth. It does not make any difference whether the plaintiff shipped the cross-ties to J. W. Page direct, or to the railroad company. If they were there, and the railroad company took them and used them in the construction of its roadbed and in the repairing of its roadbed, the railroad company would have to pay what they were reasonably worth." If the railroad company made no contract with plaintiff, directly or indirectly, jointly with Page, or severally through Page, as its agent, but if, on the contrary, as it alleged, it contracted with Page alone—bought the ties from him and paid him for them—it is not liable to the plaintiff. But, under the charge above quoted, the jury were bound to find for the plaintiff against the railroad company; for it was undisputed that plaintiff did ship cross-ties along the line of defendant's road, and that the company did use some of them; but, as we have seen, if the company bought them from Page and paid him for them, there being no contractual relation between the company and the plaintiff, the company is not liable to the plaintiff for the ties so used. This charge was also erroneous, in that it assumed that plaintiff was the owner of the ties when the company used them.

Reversed.

Evidence, on the trial of a negro for assault with intent to ravish, that he approached a white woman under a false pretense as to his purpose, asked if her husband was at home, and then requested her to have sexual intercourse with him, in connection with the improbability that he could have expected to accomplish his purpose without violence, was sufficient to present a question for the jury whether he intended to commit rape.

Gary, C. J., and Fraser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Hampton County; Robert E. Copes, Judge.

John Henry Sanders was convicted of assault with intent to ravish, and he appeals. Reversed.

J. W. Vincent, of Hampton, for appellant. R. L. Gunter, Sol., and W. D. Connor, for the State.

WOODS, J. The defendant appeals from a conviction and sentence under an indictment charging that the defendant on the 30th day of May, 1911, "in and upon one Mrs. A. James, in the peace of God and of the said state then and there being, did make an assault, and her, the said Mrs. A. James, then and there did beat, bruise, wound, and ill-treat, with intent her, the said Mrs. A. James, violently and against her will then and there feloniously to ravish and carnally know, and other wrongs the said Mrs. A. James then and there did, to the great damage of the said Mrs. A. James, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state." The statute of 1909, under which the indictment was found, provides: "Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of South Carolina, that any person convicted of rape or assault with intent to ravish shall suffer death by hanging, unless the jury shall recommend to the mercy of the court, in which event the defendant shall be confined at hard labor in the state penitentiary for a term not exceeding forty years or less than five years, at the discretion of the presiding judge." 28 St. 206.

The question made by the appeal is whether the circuit judge should have directed a verdict of acquittal on the ground that there was no evidence of an assault by the defendant on Mrs. James. It seems important to set out the entire evidence bearing on the question. The prosecutrix, Mrs. James, is a white woman living in the town of Brunson. The defendant is a negro. Mrs. James' testimony as to defendant's acts is as follows: "Q. State the circumstances under which you saw him and what occurred at that time. A. I was sitting out on my porch at good dark, and some one came up and says, 'Good evening, Mrs. James,' and I said 'Good evening.' He said, 'Minnie Fields sent me down here for 50 cents,' and I got it and gave him the money, and after taking the money he backed himself out in the shade of the house and propped himself on the balustrade, and asked me if my husband was at home. I asked him, 'Who are you?' and he told me his name was Son Best, and he said, 'No; not Son Best, Reverend Best.' Q. Was there a Reverend Best around there, if you know? A. Yes, sir. I said: 'No; my husband is not here: what do you want with him?' He said nothing, and he said, 'I want to ask a favor of you,' and I said, 'What is it?' He said, 'Nothing much, but I am kind of afraid to tell you,' and I said, 'I cannot accommodate you unless I know.' He said, 'I would like to see you in the room a minute,' and I said, 'Wait a minute.' I stepped in the hall, and got the pistol, and fired out at him three times. Q. Do you know whether you hit him? A. No, sir; I don't think I did, very much to my regret. Q. You said he was in the shadow of the house? A. The door was open, you know, and the light from the hall shone out in front of the house. Q. Did you see any one else with him? A. No one at all. Q. When he came up and said something about the money, where was he standing? A. Standing at the gate. Q. How far from the steps or piazza? A. I suppose eight or ten yards. Q. How far? A. About as far as from me to him (indicating man sitting near clerk's desk). Q. After you gave him the money, where did he go? A. He came up the steps, and I handed him the money. Q. How near were you sitting to the steps? A. He could have put his hand over the balustrade and touched me if he had tried. Q. How near was he to you? A. In two feet. Q. When he took the money, did he come around there in front of the steps? A. No, sir; when I handed him the money, he backed right in the shade of the steps. Q. How near was he to you then? A. In about two feet of me. He could have very easily put his hand over the balustrade. He made no attempt to put his hand on me, though he did not have any good intention."

J. M. Sullivan, the town marshal, who arrested the defendant, testified as to defendant's statements: "Q. Did you make any threats before he made that statement? A. No, sir; I assured him that he would not be hurt. We told him we were there to protect him, and he came out and told us his intention was to go there and have intercourse with Mrs. James. He said afterwards that another fellow was with him that same afternoon or night. Q. Did he say who that was? A. Yes, sir; he said his name was Ham Sanders. We found out afterwards that that was false."

Magistrate Dowling testified as follows on the same subject: "Q. Did he make any statement in your presence? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was that? A. He stated to myself and Sullivan together that he and another negro had had some talk that afternoon before the occurrence, and they had agreed together to do what he did. At first he said he made up his mind to go around there, and did go there, and told Mrs. James he wanted her to do a favor for him, and she asked him what kind of a favor, and he told us that he told her to go to bed with him. Q. Did he say what was his intention? A. His intentions were to go to bed with her."

[1] The evidence of an intent to commit a rape was the approach to Mrs. James under false pretense, the inquiry whether her husband was at home, and the improbability that even the madness of lust could have led the defendant, a negro, to expect to accomplish his purpose without violence. On the issue of intent, therefore, defendant's counsel very properly conceded that there was evidence for the consideration of the jury.

[2] The demand or solicitation by a man that a woman should submit to sexual intercourse with him, with the intention to enforce his demand by violence, is a heinous moral offense against society. But the General Assembly has not seen fit to make such a demand with such an intent a crime, unless accompanied by an assault. If there be a deficiency in the law in this respect, it calls for the exercise of the legislative, not the judicial, power of the state.

The term "assault" is a very ancient one in our law, and its meaning has been long settled. The holding that the acts of the defendant constituted an assault was not in accord with the common understanding of the meaning of assault, nor with the law as established by the courts. Not only do the facts fall short of the definition of assault, but we do not think a single case can be found where a court of last resort has decided that similar evidence would support a verdict of assault with intent to ravish. The essence of judicial authority on what is necessary to constitute an assault is thus given in 3 Cyc. 1020: "An assault is any attempt or offer, with force or violence, to do a corporal hurt to another, whether from malice or wantonness, with such circumstances as denote, at the time, an intention to do it coupled with a present ability to carry such intention into effect. * * * Mere preparation to commit a violent injury upon the person of another, unaccompanied by a physical effort to do so, will not constitute an assault; but there must be an attempt or offer, though interrupted—the commencement of an act which, if not prevented, would produce a battery. * * * The force or violence attempted or offered must be physical, and no words, of themselves, can constitute an assault." In State v. Davis et al., 1 Hill, 46, assault is thus defined: "The general rule is that any attempt to do violence to the person of another, in a rude, angry, or resentful manner, is an assault; and raising a stick or fist, within striking distance, pointing a gun within the distance it will carry, spitting in one's face, and the like, are the instances usually put by way of illustration."

The case of State v. Sims, 3 Strob. 137, is relied on to sustain this conviction; but it strikingly illustrates the difference between the attempt or offer to do violence to another necessary to constitute an assault, and the absence of such attempt or offer in this case. In that case the defendant and the prosecutor had a violent quarrel in the morning. Later in the day the defendant "turned his horse across the path before the prosecutor, and then shook his hickory over his head, in striking distance. He rode his horse twice very near to the prosecutor. The third time he rode nearly upon him. The prosecutor said, 'Don't ride upon me,' and, thereupon struck the horse with his jacob staff on the neck. The horse fell on his haunches. The defendant jumped down and picked up a junk, but dropped it without attempting to throw." On these facts the following instruction was sustained: "The jury were told, if the defendant rode his horse so near to the prosecutor as to endanger his person and create a belief in his mind that it was his intention to ride upon him, it would be an assault; so too, if he shook his hickory over his head, indicating an intention to strike, and within striking distance, it would be an assault." In State v. Johnson, 84 S. C. 45, 65 S. E. 1023, the conviction was for assault and battery with intent to ravish. The proof was that the defendant actually laid his hands on a young white woman, who was a teacher, and the sole question decided was that the circumstances warranted the inference that the touching of the white woman's person by the negro was an overt act done in the prosecution of an intention to commit rape. The case is no authority for the proposition that a solicitation with an intent to force compliance, but without any demonstration or menace, of any kind, constitutes an assault.

The case of Jackson v. State, 91 Ga. 322, 18 S. E. 132, 44 Am. St. Rep. 25, also relied on to support this conviction, was entirely different in facts. There the defendant, a negro, made the most violent demonstration and assumed the most threatening attitude possible for a man to assume towards a woman, when he went at night into the room of a white girl and got into the bed with her. Likewise in State v. Shoyer, 104 Mo. 441, 16 S. W. 286, 24 Am. St. Rep. 344, the defendant had not only got into the bed of the sleeping woman, but, when detected, was in the act of moving upon her to commit the rape. In Gaskin v. State, 105 Ga. 631, 31 S. E. 740, the court held there was no evidence of assault, although the facts were far stronger against the defendant than they are in this case. Among other authorities showing that the evidence does not sustain the charge, we cite Halrston v. Commonwealth, 97 Va. 754, 32 S. E. 797, Carter v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 312, 70 S. W. 971, and Clark v. State, 56 Fla. 46, 47 South. 481. We are not bound by these decisions, but a perusal of them will show how far outside of established law is the holding that the acts of the defendant in this case in any view constitute an assault with intent to ravish.

If A. goes to the house of B. with the intention to beat him, and on arrival expresses that intention to B., but makes no effort to execute his purpose, but, on the contrary, runs away when B. makes a hostile demonstration, it would not be contended for a moment that A. was guilty of an assault. So, in this case, whatever may have been the purpose of the defendant, he made no effort to carry it out, but took to his heels at the prospect of resistance. To hold that the acts of the accused in this case constituted an assault with intent to ravish would be to give a new meaning to the crime of assault, and thus by judicial legislation create a new crime—and that, too, when the punishment may be death. If there be need for such a change in the law, it is the concern of the General Assembly.

For these reasons, I think the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed.

HYDRICK and WATTS, JJ., concur.

FRASER, J. This appeal is from a conviction for assault with intent to ravish. The appeal here is on the ground that there is no evidence of an assault. The facts are undisputed, and are as follows: The "prosecutrix" was sitting alone on her piazza after dark, when a man (the appellant) approached the house, and, upon being asked his mission, said that he had been sent by the washerwoman of the "prosecutrix" to ask for a loan of 50 cents. The man gave the wrong name. By reason of the false statement he was allowed to approach to within two feet of the prosecutrix, and near enough to take the money from her. He made no attempt to take hold of her but approached near enough to do so. The appellant asked her if her husband was at home, and, being informed that he was not, asked her to go to her room with him, thereby soliciting carnal intercourse. The prosecutrix said, "Wait a minute." She then slipped into the hall, got the pistol, and fired out at him three times. The defendant then ran away.

The appellant claims that, inasmuch as he had not reached the stage at which he was to lay hands upon her, there was no assault. There was evidence (introduced without objection) that the prisoner confessed that he went to the house of the prosecutrix with intent to have carnal intercourse with her. The jury saw the appellant. They saw the prosecutrix. It was their province to say whether the appellant had any reasonable expectation that he could obtain the consent of the prosecutrix. If the appellant intended to have intercourse, and had no reasonable expectation that he could secure her consent, then the jury had the evidence from which they could infer that the appellant was there in pursuance of his purpose to use force; i. e., to commit rape. The intent is not a crime, and unless there was an assault there was no crime.

Appellant relies upon the following authority: Bishop on Criminal Law, 23, says: "Assault is an unlawful, physical force, partly or fully put in motion, creating a reasonable apprehension of immediate physical injury to a human being, as raising a cane to strike him, pointing in a threatening manner a loaded gun at him, and the like." The coming within reach of the prosecutrix with intent to carry out his purpose, together with his words showing his intent, is the unlawful physical force, partly put in motion, which created a reasonable apprehension of immediate physical injury, and is evidence sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty. This case is a very much stronger case than State v. Johnson, 84 S. C. 45, 65 S. E. 1023. In that case the placing of the hands upon the shoulders of the victim was no part of the final struggle, and the intent was only an inference from that fact. Here the intent is not an issue, and the appellant had proceeded as far by overt act as the prompt and effective resistance of the prosecutrix allowed. Jackson v. State, 91 Ga. 322, 18 S. E. 132, 44 Am. St. Rep. 25. "When a man, under the incitement of lust and with the intention of gratifying it by force, enter the bedroom of a virtuous woman at a late hour in the night, and gets upon the bed in which she is sleeping, within reach of her person, for the purpose of ravishing her, he commits an assault upon her, although he may not actually touch her, being prevented from doing so by her outcry and by the intervention of an occupant of the adjoining room." State v. Shroyer, 104 Mo. 441, 16 S. W. 286, 24 Am. St. Rep. 344. "It was not necessary, in order to constitute an assault, that actual violence should have been used. To sustain such an indictment [assault with intent to commit rape] it is not even necessary that the person of the one upon whom the attempt is intended should be touched. If the intent, with the present means of carrying it into effect, exists, and preparations therefor have been made, the assault is complete." State v. Sims, 3 Stro. 137. "To ride a horse so near one as to endanger his person and create a belief in his mind that it was the intention of the rider to ride over him would be an assault. His honor said to the jury that he did not think the defendant intended to either ride upon the prosecutor or to strike him, yet he thought, if his action and conduct was such as to create the belief in the mind of the prosecutor that he intended to ride upon or strike him, he would be guilty of an assault." This conviction was sustained. Wharton, Crim. Law, 1155. When the prisoner decoyed a female child into a building for the purpose of ravishing her, and was there detected while standing within a few feet of her in a state of indecent exposure, it was held that, although there was no evidence of his having actually touched her, he was properly convicted of an assault with intent to ravish.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 75*) — TEMPORARY INJUNCTION.

An order temporarily enjoining defendant receivers from polluting a stream in mining operations, as against their objections that plaintiff did not obtain leave to sue them, that the matters to be litigated were res adjudicata, that the relief could be obtained in another action pending, affirmed by divided court.

Hydrick and Woods, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Emma E. Williams against Charles D. Jones and another as receivers of the Haile Gold Mining Company. From a preliminary injunction, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 88 S. C. 522, 71 S. E. 26.

The following is substantially the case on appeal:

Exhibit D.

"The amended complaint pursuant to order of court dated July 22, 1907, of the plaintiff herein, would respectfully show to this court:

"(1) That the Haile Gold Mining Company now is, and was at the time hereinafter stated, a corporation created and existing under the laws of the state of New York. That it is entitled to sue and be sued in the courts of South Carolina. That it has real estate situated in the said state and county. That it conducts its business in Lancaster and Kershaw counties, in said state, with resident agents in each of said counties.

"(2) That the plaintiff is in possession of, and owner in fee simple of, the tract of land containing 400 or 450 acres of land, situated in Lancaster and Kershaw counties, said land situated on Little Lynches creek, lying on the north side thereof, and bounded on the south by Will Holden, S. L. Gardner, and others, north by the Mine branch and lands of Thurlow Blackmon. Said land is also adjacent to the land of Frank Hough and others.

"(3) That a considerable portion of said tract of land consisted of bottom lands alongside of said Little Lynches creek, and said Haile Gold Mine branch, subject to the overflow of the waters thereof, which were beneficial and fertilizing thereto until corrupted and ruined and tainted by the defendant, as hereinafter stated.

"(4) That the defendant, through its agents and servants, now is, and has been for a number of years engaged in the digging and mining of gold ore in Lancaster county, said state, and extracting gold therefrom by various methods, devices, and processes, in which large quantities of water and chemicals, consisting of deleterious substances, the exact nature and composition of which are unknown to the plaintiff, are used and employed.

"(5) That the pulverized tailings, debris, and refuse matter resulting in great quantities from defendant's operations at said locality, charged with mineral or chemical properties, corruptive odors, and destructive of the fertility of the soil when deposited and exposed, have been and are being continually and constantly by the defendant's agents and servants discharged into the tributary waters of Little Lynches creek and in the Mine branch by said defendant, knowing that the same must pass in the flow and overflow of said branch and said creek upon the bottom lands and other lands of this plaintiff included in the aforesaid tract of land, to plaintiff's irreparable damage.

"(6) That the waters of the said branch and the waters of Little Lynches creek, filled with and polluted by the aforesaid deleterious substances, have overflowed the once fertile bottom fields of plaintiff, included in the boundaries of the aforesaid tract of lands, and the said deleterious, destructive chemical substance or unknown materials have been deposited, and are being deposited, on plaintiff's said lands, and such deposits, together with the waters tainted with the said chemical substances aforesaid, have proven destructive to about 30 acres of the plaintiff's bottom lands and fields, and are fast encroaching upon the remainder, so that a great part of said lands have become unproductive, the fertility thereof totally destroyed, to such an extent that no vegetation will grow on same. The said chemicals or substances destroyed the trees and other vegetation of said lands included in the aforesaid tract, and no corn, wheat, oats, or other crops can be produced thereon, and plaintiff's other lands in said tract are fast falling with each recurring freshet or swell in said branch or creek.

"(7) That about 30 acres of said lands, bottom lands, have been ruined by said defendant in the manner and way aforesaid in so far as the purposes of agriculture are concerned, and the value of much more land included in the aforesaid tract of land has been partially impaired or destroyed by reason of the same cause, and plaintiff has been deprived of the use of 30 acres above described for the last six years or more. That the plaintiff, by reason of the aforesaid acts of the defendant, its servants and agents, has been damaged $1,500.

"(8) That the plaintiff, by reason of the aforesaid acts of the defendant, by which a nuisance has been created to the land, habitation, privilege, rights, and easements of the plaintiff to plaintiff's damages aforesaid, and hereinafter stated, and the plaintiff's damages are constantly increasing by the continuous nature of the said acts of the defendant, and the results of the same, and the defendant is going to continue the said acts and injuries, whereby the detriment of the plaintiff will be greatly aggravated and increased. That the plaintiff's damages are irreparable, her property is being destroyed and ruined, its value reduced and impaired, and the encroachments upon the plaintiff's rights are continuous and increasing.

"(9) That the plaintiff is advised and believes that her legal remedies against the defendant, its agents and servants, are wholly inadequate to compensate her for the serious and great injuries she has suffered, and continues to suffer, from the acts of the defendant, its agents, and servants, and that this court only can afford her the protection needed by the exercise of the injunction or the restraining power.

"Wherefore the plaintiff demands judgment for $1,500. (2) The defendant, its agents and servants, be restrained and enjoined from further letting loose or emptying the water, substances, tailing, debris, chemical, and detritus matters from its mining works or plant into said branch or Little Lynches creek, so that said water may be free from same, and have only the flow of water therein which naturally belongs thereto, and that said defendant be further enjoined and restrained from committing any acts whereby the plaintiff's rights may be impaired or otherwise interfered with by the means and acts aforesaid. (3) For such other and further relief as may be meet and just. (4) And for the costs of this action.

Exhibit E (Defendant's Answer).

"The defendant the Haile Gold Mining Company, answering the amended complaint herein, alleges:

"For a first defense:

"Admits paragraph 1 of said complaint; denies each and every allegation in said complaint contained, except in so far as the same be herein expressly admitted, and specifically denies, upon information and belief, the title of the plaintiff to the lands described in the complaint, and denies that there is as much of the land described in the complaint affected by the tailings from the mill, as is alleged in the complaint.

"For a second defense:

"That the defendant was not guilty of the grievances alleged in the complaint at any time within six years before the commencement of this action.

"For a third defense:

"That the defendant is seised and possessed of a tract of land situated in the county of Lancaster, in said state, whereon it carries on its gold-mining operations. That through this tract of land flows a small branch or stream of water, a tributary of Little Lynches creek. That into this branch, commonly called the Mine branch, on the premises of the defendant, the defendant and those from whom it derived title to said premises and mine have discharged the pulverized tailings, debris, and other waste material resulting from the operation of said gold mine for more than 20 years before the time of the alleged grievance. That said branch has been during all the time above mentioned held and used by this defendant, and those from whom it derived title, for the mining purposes above mentioned, claiming right and title thereto adverse to the plaintiff and all other persons using and enjoying said branch and its waters, for the said purpose complained of by the plaintiff in this action, during the said time, openly, and continuously, and without hindrance or molestation from the plaintiff or any other person.

"For a fourth defense:

"That the plaintiff has a plain and adequate remedy at law, and can be compensated for any damage she may have suffered by the operations of the defendant, of which complaint is made in this action, without the intervention of the court of equity.

"For a fifth defense:

"That the defendant has expended large sums of money erecting and maintaining its mining plant, and that defendant gives employment to a large number of operatives at remunerative prices, and through its operatives furnishes a market for the products of the land of the surrounding country, and the stoppage of said plant will throw out of employment a large number of operatives skilled in that class of work, and render it necessary for them to seek and obtain, at distant points, employment such as is suitable to their experience and training: and has in various ways advanced the value of property in that neighborhood (including the property of the plaintiff) to such an extent that if its operations were stopped by an injunction, such as is asked for herein, it would suffer a great loss itself, and entail a heavy loss upon the surrounding country, and depreciate the property of the entire community to such an extent that the injury and inconvenience to the country about the said mine would far exceed any damage which could possibly be suffered by the plaintiff. And it further says that, while it was erecting its plant and developing its property, the plaintiff stood by, knowing the said expenditure, and of the use that would be made of said branch and creek, and made no objections and has quietly acquiesced in same for more than 20 years, and by her laches she has deprived herself of the right to invoke the aid of the court of equity in restraining the defendant from operating its valuable plant."

Exhibit C (Order to Abate the Nuisance).

"The plaintiff sued for $1,500, and for injunction. The complaint alleges that some 30 acres of land on a creek has been rendered unfit for cultivation for six years next before action brought, by reason of poisonous agencies let loose in its mining operations. Compensation therefor was demanded, and, further, that defendant be restrained from fouling the said stream of water any more. The jury rendered a verdict for $1,200. Now defendant moves to set same aside, and the plaintiff moves for an injunction. The verdict was special. The defendant pleads a prescriptive right to foul the stream. On the issue the jury found against the defendant.

"I see no ground to disturb the verdict, or any of the issues submitted. There is no question but the defendant has used the stream in its mining operations for more than 20 years, but the sharp issue was made that within recent years, that of the statutory period, the defendant installed what the witnesses called a 'chlorinating process,' which process is ruinous to vegetable life. On that issue the jury found for the plaintiff. The amount of the verdict might well be sustained by the testimony of the witnesses for the defendant. The matter that has given me more concern than all else is the remedy by injunction.

"The contention of the defendant is that injunction would harm the defendant and all those interested as employes of it, and those to supply it with wood to run the engines, etc., and that such harm is out of all proportion to the damage its operating may inflict upon the plaintiff's lands. Abundant authority is cited to that effect from other states than this. But the case of Mason v. Apache Mill, by our own court, makes against the contention, and it seems to me is conclusive against the contention. Nor do I think the defendant's plea of laches has been sustained. I do not think the plaintiff has been guilty of laches in asserting her rights.

"I am therefore of the opinion that the special verdict should stand, and that the plaintiff shall have at the foot hereof an order of injunction to stop the nuisance complained of, and it is so ordered."

Order of Injunction.

"Ordered that you, Charles D. Jones and Leonard W. Amerman, receivers of the Haile Gold Mining Company, do show cause before me, at Chester, S. C., on May —, 1910, at 11 o'clock, why you should not be perpetually restrained and enjoined, as receivers of the Haile Gold Mining Company, from operating and discharging acidulated or chlorinated water, or other harmful substances, into the waters of the Mine branch and the waters of Little Lynches creek, and to effectually and perpetually restrain and enjoin you, as such receivers, and your agents and servants, to continue the trespasses and damages to the plaintiff, and to abate the nuisance found to exist in the case of Emma E. Williams, Plaintiff, v. Haile Gold Mining Company, Defendant. That in the meantime, and until the further order of this court, you, the said Charles D. Jones and Leonard W. Amerman, your servants and agents and representatives, are hereby restrained and enjoined from emptying from the chlorination system, plant, or process chlorinated water or discharges into the waters of said branch and creek, whereby the waters thereof may become polluted and rendered unfit for cattle to drink, or be in any way liable to damage or injury to the property and rights of this plaintiff. The question whether the said receivers, their servants, and agents have a right to discharge into the said streams the tailing, not at all affected by the said chlorinating process, is a matter not herein determined, but is left open.

"But the court does effectually and expressly restrain and enjoin until the further order of this court any system or operations employed by said receivers, their servants or agents, which in any degree or to any extent does damage to the lands of the plaintiff, or pollutes the water rights of said plaintiff or property of the plaintiff, and the said receivers are forbidden from emptying any chemicals or substances into said waters, whereby the same may in any way corrupt or pollute the said waters.

"Ordered, further, that a copy of this order, after being certified to by the clerk of this court, be served upon said receivers, or any one of them."

Order.

"On May 4, 1910, one of the defendants called it to my attention that the order of 30th April is broader in its terms than that of 22d December, 1908. The last-named order enjoined the letting loose on the lands of debris poisoned by the chlorination process. The first order enjoins (temporarily) the letting loose of, not only that character of debris, but of 'other harmful substances,' and 'any system or operations which, to any extent, does damage to the land or pollutes the water.' It is true this is a new action, and puts in issue matters not before determined in the first suit. But the temporary order (of April 30th) ought to be modified, or security ought to be required of the plaintiff pending the hearing. I am more fully of this opinion since the hearing fixed for the 7th day of May must now be postponed at the request of Mr. Blakeney, through Mr. Foster, evidenced by a letter of the latter to me. The order of the 30th April, in enjoining the letting loose of other harmful substances, and any system or operation which to any extent does damage to the land or pollutes the water is too indefinite; and it lays a burden on the defendants which is uncertain, yet it is therefore ordered that pending the hearing those words be eliminated from the order. Ordered, further, that the hearing be had at Chester, on Monday, the 16th May, 1910, at 10 o'clock a. m."

Order.

"This is an action to enjoin a nuisance. The nuisance alleged is the letting loose by defendants into a stream which traverses the plaintiff's lands of acidulated water, chlorinated water, or any other deleterious substance or chemicals from the defendant's mining operations thereabout. Just now the motion is for a temporary order of injunction of the nuisance to stand until the issues shall have been tried.

"I heard the motion just on the eve of my departure for the Twelfth circuit, and I have just returned therefrom. In the meantime I am advised that Judge Prince has made the final order of injunction authorized by the circuit court in the action entitled Emma E. Williams v. Haile Gold Mining Company. The answer is not in, but the defendants have made return to a rule signed by me on the 30th April. The third paragraph of the return alleges what is now irrelevant matter, for since the return was made Judge Prince has handed down an order.

"The first and fourth grounds of the return must be overruled; for leave was granted the plaintiff to sue, and this is not a motion for permanent injunction.

"The second paragraph of the return is of a more serious character. Therein it is alleged that the wrongs detailed in the complaint herein were pleaded, or ought to have been pleaded, in the cause entitled Williams v. Haile Gold Mining Company; and that such wrongs were, therefore, settled by the judgment in that cause. It is not worth while now to further refer to such wrongs and such injuries as may result from the chlorination process. That process has been found to be hurtful, and its practice enjoined.

"But the complaint herein sets out other ways than those which result from the chlorination process. I have no clear conception of them, because the whole subject is one about which I have a meager knowledge, to wit, the mining for gold. But the defendant's return, in effect, sets up res adjudicata. If that plea should be sustained now, it would be equivalent to finally determining the action now on a motion. That ought not to be done, and cannot be done. I have such serious doubts, however, about the plaintiff's right to maintain this action, that I have concluded to grant the temporary injunction only upon the execution by the plaintiff to the defendants of a bond for $5,000, conditioned to save the defendants harmless in the event of a failure of the plaintiff's action.

"It is therefore ordered that upon the execution and delivery of such a bond to the clerk of this court then the defendants are restrained from casting upon the plaintiff's lands any sulphides, tailings, acids, or chemicals which may be hurtful to lands or to vegetation. It is further ordered that the bond shall be signed by one or more sureties to be approved by the clerk of this court. It is further ordered that the plaintiff may move to decrease the bond, or the defendants may move to increase it."

Rule to Show Cause.

"The respondent C. D. Jones, as one of the receivers of the Haile Gold Mining Company, defendant herein, in return to the rule to show cause herein issued by Hon. Geo. W. Gage, dated April 30, 1910, why the injunction prayed for in the complaint herein should not be granted for cause, shows:

"(1) That it does not appear in the complaint herein, or any exhibits attached thereto, upon which the rule herein was obtained that leave or permission to commence and maintain this suit was granted by the court having jurisdiction and authority to grant the same.

"(2) That it appears fully from the complaint herein, and the exhibits thereto attached, that all the matters of fact and law alleged by the plaintiff for a cause of action herein against these defendants, and all of the plaintiff's rights and remedies, in respect to the matters alleged herein, have been fully adjudicated and determined in a previous action entitled Emma E. Williams v. Halle Gold Mining Company, the pleading and final judgment wherein are made a part of the complaint in this action, from which it fully appears that the parties defendants herein are in privity with the defendant in said previous action, as is recognized and alleged in paragraph 9 of the complaint herein. That the right of the plaintiff herein to injunction in respect to the matters complained of and the scope of such injunction having been already defined and established by decree of the circuit and Supreme Courts, as against the Halle Gold Mining Company, and these defendants in privity therewith, the plaintiff has a clear and adequate remedy for the grievances complained of by enforcement of said decree through the administrative forms of the court, and therefore cannot maintain this action.

"(3) That there is now pending before his honor, Judge G. E. Prince, an application presented to him on behalf of the plaintiff while presiding in the Fifth circuit at Camden, S. C., on the 18th day of March, 1910, for an order of injunction enforcing the decree in the case of Emma E. Williams v. Halle Gold Mining Company, copy of which proposed order is hereto attached and marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this return. That at the hearing of said application for injunction counsel were heard on behalf of the plaintiff and defendant, and his honor, Judge Prince, declined to grant the said order to the broad extent proposed, but stated orally that he would limit the scope of such order to restraining the discharge of the debris from the chlorinating process, according to his construction of the decision of the Supreme Court, and that he would dispose of such application accordingly. That thereupon he marked the said case 'heard March 18, 1910,' upon the calendar, and, the court being about to adjourn, he directed plaintiff's attorney to present to him at his chambers, in Columbia, S. C., an order for injunction in the terms indicated by him, which order he would sign. That no further order in the premises has been made so far as this defendant is informed and believes. That an order for the enforcement of plain-tiff's right to injunctive relief being pending in another, and the proper jurisdiction, plaintiff cannot maintain this action or this motion.

"(4) That this court has no jurisdiction at chambers without consent to grant a permanent injunction upon the merits before trial of the issues in this action."

Exceptions.

"The defendants appellants, Charles D. Jones and L. W. Amerman, receivers, hereby except to the order of his honor, Geo. W. Gage, herein, dated June 20, 1910, upon the following grounds:

"(1) That his honor erred in holding that leave to sue was granted by any court of competent jurisdiction, so far as appears by the complaint, and in holding, by implication, that mere permission granted to plaintiff 'to commence and maintain this suit, as she may be advised,' without notice to defendants, in any wise precluded consideration of the adequacy of these pleadings to support a cause of action or injunction, as it does not follow that the court granting leave 'to commence this suit,' predetermined that any complaint the plaintiff might be advised to frame would suffice to constitute a cause of action, be immune from any plea apparent on its face, or that it would support an injunction temporary or otherwise.

"(2) That his honor erred in holding that in considering the rule and return herein he could not consider whether or not the plea of res judicata was established upon the face of the complaint, and exhibits submitted therewith; whereas, he should have held the same showed an adjudication upon the very acts complained of in another suit, to which the parties herein were privy, and that a motion for permanent injunction, based upon practically identical cause of action and allegations, was pending in such other suit, and should have consequently refused the application for injunction in this case.

"(3) That his honor erred in holding the return irrelevant in showing the pendency of a motion in another jurisdiction for the same injunction sought in the present motion, and in not discharging the rule and refusing the motion after it appeared that the order of Judge Prince referred to had been granted."

E. D. Blakeney, of Kershaw, and T. J. Kirkland, of Camden, for appellants. J. Harry Foster, of Yorkville, and M. L. Smith, of Camden, for respondent.

BYNUM, A. A. J. This case comes up to this court on appeal from an interlocutory or preliminary injunction issued by Judge Gage on June 20, 1910, on the following exceptions, viz.:
